as more care, in fact though not in law, may be required to avoid colliding with an obviously lame or blind adult than with a vigorous man in full possession of all his faculties. But all this is true only where it is admitted or proved that a duty exists. 'In considering the question as to whether a duty exists, there is no distinction between the case where an infant is injured and one where the injury is to an adult, though where the duty is imposed the law may exact more vigilance in its discharge as to the former.' [Citing Denman, J., in Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 60, 38 L. R. A. 573, 41 S. W. 62.] So if it be conceded or proved that the defendant was negligent, and that his negligence constituted part of the legal cause of the plaintiff's damage, then the incapacity and immaturity of a child plaintiff may furnish a good answer to the defense of contributory negligence. Conduct of the plaintiff, which would have been negligent in an adult, may not be held negligent in a child. But the fact that the child plaintiff was not 'capable of contributory negligence' does not necessarily establish that the adult defendant was negligent. It does not per se prove that the defendant owed to the plaintiff a duty, or that he failed to perform a duty. 'If there was no breach of duty, then there was no wrong, irrespective of the boy's capacity to know that what he was doing was dangerous.' [Citing Lurton, J., in Felton v. Aubrey, 20 C. C. A. 436, 43 U. S. App. 278, 74 Fed. 353.] 'The fact that injury has resulted, and to a child himself incapable of negligence, will not import the negligence of the defendant, which is the sole ground of liability.' [Citing 1 Beven, Neg. 2d ed. 183; Culbertson v. Crescent City R. Co. 48 La. Ann. 1380, 20 So. 902; Emerson v. Peteler, 35 Minn. 481, 29 N. W. 311; Catlett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 57 Ark. 461, 21 S. W. 1062.] Obviously, cases of the two foregoing classes do not furnish arguments from analogy in favor of creating a duty towards children in situations where no duty at all would exist towards adults. Why should innocent children have greater rights than innocent adults, in respect to damage resulting from the nature of the premises upon which they enter without permission? Remedy against the landowner for harm happening from the condition of the premises is denied to adults who are entirely free from intent to violate rights, and whose presence upon the land is due to pardonable mistake or to irresistible external force. The test is not whether their motives were innocent, or even laudable, or whether their conduct was careful, but whether they entered without the owner's permission. If so, they cannot claim that the owner was under a duty to make things safe for their access, or to give warning of nonapparent danger. [Citing Morgan v. Hollowell, 57 Me. 375; Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684.] It may possibly be suggested that an adult trespasser is barred upon grounds inapplicable to a childish intruder. It may be urged that the adult is barred by his own wrong, both (1) because he must always be regarded as guilty of contributory negligence; and (2) because, even if not negligent, he is a tortfeasor in the technical sense, whereas a young child may be incapable of negligence, and ought not to be regarded as even technically a tortfeasor. But this argument entirely misconceives the true reason why an adult trespasser fails to recover in the case supposed. The decision turns, not upon the presence of fault in the plaintiff, but upon the absence of fault in the defendant. The plaintiff's action is defeated, not because his own wrong bars a recovery against the landowner who has neglected to perform a duty owing to him, but because he has not succeeded in establishing the primary proposition that the landowner owed to him the duty in question. His trespass is not necessarily and always a negligent act, and hence does not invariably bar him on the ground of contributory negligence. [Citing 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. §§ 97, 98.] Nor does his tort, even when he is a conscious and morally inexcusable trespasser, prevent his recovering against the landowner for negligently bringing force to bear upon him by a positive act done after his entry, i. e., by what Clerk & L. Torts, 2d ed. 14, call 'a negligent act of commission.' But when an adult, who entered without permission, seeks to recover against the landowner for harm happening from the condition of the premises, he fails even though he were morally blameless. He may be a technical tortfeasor, but recovery is not denied to him by way of punishment for his own 'wrong.' He fails because the landowner owed him no duty to have the premises in safe condition for his entry. [Citing Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. §§ 97, 98, supra.] Why should the moral innocence of a childish intruder raise a duty on the part of the landowner which is not created by the moral innocence of an adult intruder? The youthful innocence of the child does not make restrictions on the right of user less damaging to the owner, or make the alleged duty of preventing entrance of an intruder, or of protecting him from harm after entry, less burdensome than in the case of an adult. . . . The child, it is said, is incapable of protecting itself, and hence it is eloquently contended that the law must impose the duty of protection upon landowners. The apparent assumption is that all the children in the world are mere waifs and strays, and that the duty of caring for them must be imposed upon the landowners because the law can find no one else to bear the burden. [Citing the language of Mr. Justice Agnew in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 336.] The fact is that the vast majority of children have protectors appointed alike by nature and by law, viz., their parents, who have legal power to control their actions, and whose moral duty to keep their children from entering upon dangerous premises is generally regarded as at least equal to the moral obligation of the landowner to fence them out. If the child, upon entering the premises, is hurt by the 'active negligence' of the owner in bringing force to bear upon him, it may well be that the negligence of the parent in failing to restrain the child's entrance does not bar the child's recovery for the force thus brought to bear upon him after his entrance. But it is going far beyond this to say that the child can recover for harm sustained by him through the condition of the premises without the immediate intervention of any human agency save his own. [Citing Felton v. Aubrey, 20 C. C. A. 436, 43 U. S. App. 278, 74 Fed. 353.] When a child wakes up in the morning in his father's house, the duty of providing a safe playground for him during the day rests upon his parents. Is this duty shifted from the parent to private landowners because the child chanced to escape from the parent's care? [Citing Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 577; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Dobbins (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 861.] If those who brought the child into the morning are unable, by reason of poverty, to provide him a playground, this may afford an argument for the passage of a statute imposing that duty upon the municipality, in which case each landowner would have to contribute his proportion of the expense. But this is quite another thing from assessing upon a single unfortunate landowner the entire damage arising from the want of such a playground. [Citing Ross v. Keith, 16 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, p. 89.]

An early case, and one often referred to, is that of Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1. There the plaintiff, as administrator, sought to recover damages for the death of his son, a child of tender years, who was killed by falling into a cistern which had been left uncovered on premises not immediately adjoining the highway. It was held: "Owners of private property are not responsible for injuries caused by leaving a dangerous place unguarded, where the person injured was not on the premises by permission, or on business, or rather lawful occasion, and had no right to be there." Mr. Justice Campbell, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Cases are quite numerous in which the same questions have arisen which arise in this case, and we have found none which hold that an accident from negligence, on private premises, can be made the ground of damages, unless the party injured has been induced to come by personal invitation, or by employment which brings him there, or by resorting there as to a place of business or of general resort, held out as open to customers or others whose lawful occasions may lead them to visit there. We have found no support for any rule which would protect those who go where they are not invited, but merely with express or tacit permission, from curiosity or motives of private convenience, in no way connected with business or other relations with the occupant." In Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 422, 6 S. W. 74, the eight-year old son of the plaintiff was drowned in a pond of water, not bordering on the highway, which had been formed in consequence of rock having been quarried on a lot owned by the defendant. It was ruled that the owner of the quarry was under no obligation to build a fence around it to keep trespassers away, nor liable for injury to them occasioned by the absence of such a fence. In Klitz v. Nieman, 68 Wis. 271, 60 Am. Rep. 854, 32 N. W. 223, the declaration alleged that the defendant was the owner and in possession of a vacant and uninclosed lot in a thickly-settled part of the city of Milwaukee, to which the public had free and unobstructed access; that for a long time there had existed upon the lot a deep and dangerous hole or excavation, partially filled with water, making a pond, which covered about the entire surface of the lot; that the water of the pond was roily, so that its depth could not be ascertained except by measurement, but that in places it was 9 feet deep, so that the pond was dangerous to the lives of children who might be attracted thereto, for amusement or otherwise; that the defendant, well knowing that the pond was dangerous to the lives of children residing in the vicinity of the same, wrongfully, negligently, and carelessly permitted it to remain unguarded by a fence or barricade; and that plaintiff's son, a lad nine years of age, "while playing upon and about said pond of water, being induced thereto by reason of the unguarded and unprotected condition of said hole as aforesaid, fell and was precipitated into the same, and was drowned." A demurrer to the declaration was sustained in the trial court, which ruling, on appeal, was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Chief Justice Cole, speaking for the court, said: "The single question presented is, Was it the duty of the defendant to fence or guard this hole or excavation on his lot (which it does not appear he made, or caused to be made), where surface water collected, in order to secure the safety of strangers, young or old, who might go upon or about the pond for play or curiosity? If the defendant was bound to so fence or guard the pond, upon what principle or ground does this obligation rest? There can be no liability, unless it was his duty to fence the pond. It surely is not the duty of an owner to guard or fence every dangerous hole or pond or stream of water on his premises, for the protection of persons going upon his land who had no right to go there. No such rule of law is laid down in the books, and it would be most unreasonable to so hold,"—citing 1 Thomp. Neg. 361.

The facts in the case of Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, are quite similar to those in the case under consideration. There the defendants "were the owners of a lot of ground in the outskirts of Philadelphia, upon which there was, and had for some time been, a deep well. The nearest paved highway ran 300 feet from the well, and the nearest road about 80 feet. There were houses about 300 feet off, but the built-up part of the city was nearly half a mile distant. Whether any paths led near the well was disputed. The well was uncovered, and was not hidden by bushes or shrubbery. It was not fenced round, nor was the lot in which it lay. The lot was a common place of resort for children and adults. A boy of a little less than eight years of age was found drowned in the above well, his hat being found on the side, together with a few small fishes. In a suit by the boy's father against . . . [the defendants] to recover damages for his death,—held that the boy was a trespasser, and that . . . [the defendants] had not been guilty of any such negligence as would render them liable for his death." In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Paxson said: "Nor do we assent to the broad proposition that 'the owner of premises in the neighborhood of a populous city, and opening on a public highway, must so use them as to protect those who stray upon them and are accidentally injured.' This doctrine rests chiefly upon the case above referred to [Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332], which was not intended to decide any such principle, and is in direct conflict with the recent well-considered case of Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684, in which it was held that 'where the owner of land, in the exercise of lawful dominion over it, makes an excavation thereon which is such a distance from the public highway that a person falling into it would be a trespasser upon the land before reaching it, the owner is not liable for an injury thus sustained.' . . . We are unable to see anything in this case to charge the defendants with negligence in not inclosing their lot or guarding the well. There was no concealed trap or dead fall, as in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. The well was open and visible to the eye. No one was likely to walk into it by day, and this accident did not occur at night. A boy playing upon its edge might fall in, just as he might in any pond or stream of water. In this respect the well was no more dangerous than the river front on both sides of the city, where boys of all ages congregate in large numbers for fishing and other amusements. Vacant brick yards and open lots exist on all sides of the city. There are streams and pools of water where children may be drowned; there are inequalities of surface where they may be injured. To compel the owners of such property either to inclose it, or fill up their ponds and level the surface so that trespassers may not be injured, would be an oppressive rule. The law does not require us to enforce any such principle, even where the trespassers are children. We all know that boys of eight years of age indulge in athletic sports. They fish, shoot, swim, and climb trees. All these amusements are attended with danger, and accidents frequently occur. It is part of a boy's nature to trespass, especially where there is tempting fruit, yet I never heard that it was the duty of the owner of a fruit tree to cut it down because a boy trespasser may possibly fall from its branches. Yet the principle contended for by the plaintiff would bring us to this absurdity, if carried to its logical conclusion. Moreover, it would charge the duty of the protection of children upon every member of the community except their parents."

In Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 577, the city of Manchester began filling a reservoir, but left a portion of the excavation, which contained water. The excavation was uninclosed. The plaintiff's boy, a little less than four years old, and living with his parents, about 150 feet from the reservoir, having followed, with a crowd of other boys, a band of music to the gate of a play or ball ground near by, and wandering by the reservoir excavation, fell into the water, and was drowned. On the facts stated, it was held that an action could not be maintained by the administrator of the child against the city, and the case was "discharged." Subsequently, the plaintiff amended his declaration by alleging "that the place of the reservoir, at the time of the injury, was an unguarded excavation, pit, and trap, near to the public street, and the residences of a large number of people, including that of the plaintiff, and the water therein, together with the work of filling the excavation, was calculated to and did allure to it young children; that the defendants had knowledge of the situation, and these facts were a license and invitation to the plaintiff's child to come there; and that, neither he nor his parents being in fault, he went there, fell into the pit, and was drowned." Mr. Justice Allen, rendering the opinion of the court, said: "If the facts stated in this count were proved, they would not establish the defendants' liability. The excavation for a reservoir was not made and filled with water for a trap, but for lawful use by the defendants on their own land. . . . The averment of license and invitation to the child to go there is one of argument by inference from the facts stated, and the facts positively averred do not warrant and support the inference. The fact that children went to the reservoir pit from curiosity or for pleasure, without objection of the defendants, was not an invitation nor a license to go there. The child was not upon the land by invitation, nor under circumstances which made it the duty of the defendants to protect him. He was there to gratify his curiosity, or for mere pleasure, and the defendants owed him no special duty. It was not a case of setting a trap for the children, nor one of wantonly and knowingly leading them into danger, and this one to destruction. It was the ordinary case of a landowner, managing, within the boundaries of his own land, his own property, in his own way, for his own use and benefit; and though in doing this he might find occasion to dig excavations, construct reservoirs, provide fish ponds, plant and cultivate fruit trees, erect and maintain useful structures, instruments and machinery, all of which are alluring, attractive, and dangerous to children, yet it could not be claimed that he must constantly guard these things against the approach of persons coming without license or invitation, and attracted by mere curiosity or pleasure, or suffer in damages for any injury they might receive. The rule that the owner of land may manage it in his own way, for his own benefit, and owes no duty to those who come upon it for no business purpose, but without license, express or implied, is too well established to need further comment, or to warrant a departure from it."

In Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, the allegations of the petition were, in substance, that the defendants had for a long time negligently permitted the surface water to accumulate on certain lots, which they owned and were in possession of, thereby creating a deep and dangerous pond, and that they had failed and neglected to fence such lots, or to erect barriers of any kind, to prevent children, lawfully in the vicinity thereof, from falling into said pond; that the lots were situated in the vicinity of one of the public schools of the city of Omaha, and that the pond was not only dangerous to persons passing along a named street adjacent thereto, but was in a public and much-frequented place, and was attractive to children of tender age, many of whom were accustomed to play about and upon said water; that on a given day the plaintiff's intestate, a boy of ten years of age, yielding to the natural impulse of childhood, went on said pond, upon a section of a wooden sidewalk out of which he had constructed a raft, and while floating thereon fell into the pond and was drowned. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, upon the ground that it failed to state a cause of action against the owners of the land, the court holding: "The owner of a vacant lot upon which is situated a pond of water or a dangerous excavation is [not] required to fence it, or otherwise insure the safety of strangers, old or young, who may go upon said premises, not by his invitation, express or implied, but for the purpose of amusement or from motives of curiosity."

To the same effect, see Omaha v. Bowman, 52 Neb. 293, 40 L. R. A. 531, 72 N. W. 316, where a boy seven years old was drowned by falling off a raft floating on a pond, which had been made by the city in constructing and filling up a certain street.

So, in Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 598, it was held: "The owner of a vacant lot upon which a pond of water has accumulated, by reason of an embankment erected by the city in the grading of the street, preventing the flow of surface water from the lot, owes no duty to trespassers to keep the water from accumulating upon the premises, nor to keep the lot guarded against trespasses by children, and is not liable for the death of a child from drowning in the pond while trespassing in the lot." In that case a boy eleven years old was drowned by falling into the pond from a raft thereon.

In Ratte v. Dawson, 50 Minn. 450, 52 N. W. 965, "where a child of tender years was taken by an older sister, to whose care it was intrusted, to vacant residence lots in a city, for recreation and pleasure, and was accidentally knocked down and killed by the caving in of an embankment, caused by excavations for sand, and which had been left unfenced, [it was] held that the landowner was not liable in damages, and that he owed no duty to persons coming upon the premises, without his invitation, to protect them from danger from excavations thereon." The court said: "There is nothing to take the case out of the general rule that where the owner of land, in the exercise of his lawful dominion over it, makes an excavation thereon, so far from the street that a person coming onto the land without his invitation, and falling into it, would be a trespasser before reaching it, such owner is not liable to an action for the injury sustained. . . . The maxim Sic utere tuo, etc., has no application to such a case. It refers to acts the effect of which extends beyond the limits of the property, and to neighbors who do not interfere with it or enter upon it. If the rule were otherwise, a landowner could not sink a well or dig a ditch or open a stone quarry on his own land, except at the risk of being made liable for consequential damages, which would unreasonably restrict its enjoyment."

It was held in Grindley v. McKechnie, 163 Mass. 494, 40 N. E. 764, that an owner who digs a deep hole on his unfenced land about 25 feet from the street, which fills with water, and is concealed by boards and shavings floating on the surface, is not liable in damages for the death of a child five years old, who, without the consent of the owner, goes on the land, and is drowned in the hole.

Among the cases relied on by defendant in error is that of Ferguson v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 75 Ga. 637, 77 Ga. 102, wherein this court held: "Where a railroad company leaves a dangerous machine, such as a turntable, unfastened in a city, on a lot which is not securely inclosed, and where people and children are wont to visit it and pass through it, this is negligence on the part of such company; and where an infant of ten or twelve years of age resorted to the turntable, and in riding upon it was dangerously and seriously injured, the railroad company is liable for damages for such injuries to the infant." The rule of the so-called Turntable Cases has been adopted by many of the courts, by others it has been severely criticised, and by some wholly repudiated. Some of the courts which have recognized the rule have limited its operation strictly to turntables and other dangerous and attractive machinery. It has been repudiated by the courts of last resort in New Hampshire, Tennessee, Massachusetts, New York, and New Jersey. See Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 9 Atl. 790; Bates v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 90 Tenn. 36, 15 S. W. 1069; Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 340, 13 L. R. A. 248, 28 N. E. 283; Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L. R. A. 724, 39 N. E. 1068; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L. R. A. 831, 40 Atl. 682. Liability was also denied in St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Bell, 81 Ill. 70, 25 Am. Rep. 269, on account of "the isolated position" of the turntable in question. The rule was recognized in Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 54 L. R. A.

Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, wherein Mr. Justice Young pronounced perhaps the ablest opinion ever delivered in support of the doctrine. The same court, however, in Twist v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 39 Minn. 164, 39 N. W. 402, clearly intimated that the doctrine of the Turntable Cases ought not to be extended; and in Stendal v. Boyd, 67 Minn. 279, 69 N. W. 899, said: "We did not mean by this [what was said in Twist v. Winona & St. P. R. Co.] that we would not apply the doctrine to any but 'turntable cases,' but merely that we would not extend the doctrine to cases which, upon their facts, did not come strictly and fully within the principle upon which those cases rest. We would not extend it to an ordinary case of a landowner merely allowing a pool or pond of water to stand on a vacant lot. To bring a case of such a pond within the principle of these cases, it would have to be exceptional and peculiar in its circumstances." And in Ratte v. Dawson and Dehanitz v. St. Paul, 73 Minn. 385, 76 N. W. 48, and in Haesley v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 46 Minn. 233, 48 N. W. 1023, the principle was considerably limited in its application. In the last-mentioned case the court held: "A railway company, maintaining what is known as a 'gravity' yard or side track, has undoubtedly performed its duty as to a trespassing child of tender years, strictly non sui juris, when it securely fastens, by means of the ordinary appliance or brake, such cars as it may have occasion to place upon the grade of its track." In Koons v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 65 Mo. 592, the doctrine of the Turntable Cases was followed, but it was limited, as has been seen, in Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 422, 6 S. W. 74; and again in Barney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 126 Mo. 372, 26 L. R. A. 847, 28 S. W. 1069, where the court held: "Railroad cars and similar machinery are not 'dangerous machines,' within the meaning of the rule declaring turntables to be such;" and also in Witte v. Stifel, 126 Mo. 295, 28 S. W. 891, where it was held: "The owner of a building in process of construction in a city is not liable for injuries to a child playing thereat without his knowledge, and without any inducement or invitation, implied or otherwise, on his part to the child to go upon the premises." In Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686, 31 Am. Rep. 203, and Union P. R. Co. v. Dunden, 37 Kan. 1, 14 Pac. 501, the doctrine of the Turntable Cases is recognized; but in Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Bockoven, 53 Kan. 279, 36 Pac. 322, where it appeared that a child was killed by falling off a defective gate of a railroad company, upon which it was swinging, the court said: "We are not willing to extend the rule declared by this court in the Fitzsimmons and Dunden Cases. In some of the courts the rule in those cases has been questioned, and in others denied." In Evansich v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 57 Tex. 126, 44 Am. Rep. 586, and other cases decided by the supreme court of that state, the turntable rule has been followed; but in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Dobbins (Tex.

Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 861, affirmed by the supreme court of Texas (91 Tex. 60, 38 L. R. A. 573, 41 S. W. 62), the rule is sharply criticised, the latter court holding: "The common law does not impose upon the owner of property the duty to use care to keep his premises in such condition that a child of tender years going thereon without invitation may not be injured. . . . A railroad company which constructs a platform for the reception of freight and passengers, and a path of plank leading thereto, would not be liable to anyone who fell from the path into an excavation, who was not going to or from the platform on business connected with the company." There it appeared that plaintiff's child, less than three years old, fell into such excavation and was drowned. The rule of the Turntable Cases was recognized also in Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666; but, as we have seen, in Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 598, the rule was not extended to a case where a child trespassing upon an unguarded lot fell into a pond thereon and was drowned. The rule was also recognized in Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Bailey, 11 Neb. 332, 9 N. W. 50; but, as we have already seen, in Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, it was not applied where the child of the plaintiff was trespassing upon the lot of the defendant, and was drowned by falling from a raft on a pond thereon. Adopting what we believe to be the wise course of these courts in limiting the doctrine of the Turntable Cases, we hold that the case of Ferguson v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 75 Ga. 637, 77 Ga. 102, is not authority which is applicable to the facts of the case under consideration. Our conclusion is that the evidence in this case does not disclose the breach of any duty lawfully due from the defendant railway company to the deceased child, and consequently did not warrant a finding that his death was occasioned by its negligence. Irrespective, therefore, of other questions presented, the verdict in favor of the child's father was without evidence to support it, and the trial court erred in not setting it aside.

of another by express or implied invitation of the owner may recover damages for an injury caused by a failure on the part of such owner to keep the premises in a reasonably safe condition.

2. In an action by an administrator to recover damages for the death of his intestate, under chap. 21, Comp. Stat., the petition must show a pecuniary injury to the widow or next of kin; but as against a general demurrer it is sufficient in that regard to allege that, "by reason of the death of the intestate, and the loss of the service and society and fellowship of the said intestate, the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $5,000."

3. In such action, unless the facts are undisputed, and are of such a nature that ordinary minds would not differ in their judgment of them, the question of negligence must be submitted to the jury.
4. Evidence examined, and found sufficient to warrant the trial court in submitting the question of negligence to the jury.
5. In such action for the death of a child the father, as administrator, being plaintiff, it is error to instruct the jury that contributory negligence of the father is no defense.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. W. Field, for plaintiff in error: In the absence of invitation, express or implied, there can be no recovery.

Plaintiff's action is based upon the theory that plaintiff's intestate was injured while on defendant's premises by invitation. The petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action on that theory.

Permitting a pond of water to remain on vacant land a short distance from a highway does not render the owner of the premises liable for the drowning of a boy while bathing therein.

Sedgwick, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff sued as administrator of his son, a child three years and three months of age, who was killed by falling into a well on the premises of the defendant. There was a trial with a jury, and verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment entered on the verdict. The case is brought here upon petition in error.

The defendant insists that the petition was insufficient, and that the general demurrer thereto ought to have been sustained by the court; and the first ground of this objection is that, as the accident occurred on the private property of the defendant, and in the absence of an express or implied invitation to the deceased child to go upon the premises, there can be no recovery; and that the facts alleged in the petition fail to show such invitation. There is some repetition and some incoherency in the petition, but it contains the allegations that defendant permitted the public in general to use the lots for hitching horses and teams, and permitted their use by the patrons of the saloon and other persons desiring places to hitch horses and teams during their temporary stay in the city of Lincoln, and the lots were thrown open to the public in connection with said saloon so as to better enable the tenant to rent said saloon, and make it bring a better rental and more money to the owners; and for said reason the public was, by defendant, notified and invited to go upon said lots and use them as above stated; and said lots and premises were by defendants thrown open to the public in general, and the general public was, by defendant, invited to enter and use the same as public property. As against a general demurrer, we think there is here an allegation that the lots were thrown open to the general public, and the general public was invited to use the lots as public property; and the deceased child, being one of the general public, he was, of course, embraced in the invitation.

The second objection to the sufficiency of the petition is, that there is no sufficient allegation of pecuniary loss to the plaintiff. The allegation is that, "by reason of the death of the said Harry Draper, the plaintiff has been damaged by reason of the loss of the service and society and fellowship of the said Harry Draper in the sum of $5,000." It is assumed that the society and fellowship of one's children have no pecuniary value. Some courts have so expressed themselves, but we do not find it necessary to discuss that proposition. In Hurst v. Detroit City R. Co. 84 Mich. 539, 48 N. W. 44, the supreme court of Michigan in a well-reasoned opinion, citing many authorities, concludes that "pecuniary injury must be alleged and proved." There was no allegation of loss of service, nor of actual pecuniary damage. The allegation was, "By reason of which negligence of said defendant and injury to and death of said Lorenzo Hurst an action hath accrued to the said plaintiff, as the representative of the next of kin of said Lorenzo Hurst, and in which he claims damages from the said defendant in the sum of $10,000." The court said: "It is argued, however, by the counsel, that this statute declares the liability of the person or corporation whose negligence caused the death, and that, therefore, no evidence of pecuniary damages was requisite to entitle the next of kin to maintain the action, and to recover such damages." The statute leaves it to the jury to give such damages as they shall deem fair and just; and held that there must be a special allegation of pecuniary loss in the petition, which must be supported by proof. See also Orgall v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 46 Neb. 4, 64 N. W. 450; Kearney Electric Co. v. Laughlin, 45 Neb. 391, 63 N. W. 941. In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Van Buskirk, 58 Neb. 252, 78 N. W. 514, the action was brought by the administrator of the estate of Charles P. Van Buskirk, deceased, and the petition alleged that "the said Charles P. Van Buskirk has neither wife nor children, but left Alonzo J. Van Buskirk, Mary P. Van Buskirk, his parents, and Gertrude G. Eledge, Lewis G. Van Buskirk, . . . brothers and sisters, who are heirs at law and next of kin, who have been damaged in the sum of $5,000." This petition was precisely within the rule announced in Hurst v. Detroit City R. Co. 84 Mich. 539, 48 N. W. 44, and other cases, and was clearly insufficient, and was so held. In the opinion it is said that it is necessary to aver a loss of means of support where, from the relation of the survivors, the law would not presume that from his death such survivors had been deprived of their means of support; but it was not intended to declare the rule that the action cannot be maintained unless it in some way appears that the survivors of the deceased have lost their means of support. Loss of means of support is pecuniary injury, but it by no means follows that it is the only pecuniary injury for which a recovery may be had in such actions. Friend v. Burlington, 53 Neb. 674, 74 N. W. 50. The services might be valuable to a parent entitled thereto, who was in such financial condition as not to be dependent upon such services.

The defendant insists that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant the submission of the issues to the jury. The case of Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, is cited as decisive of this question. In that case the court said: "The owner of a vacant lot upon which is situated a pond of water or a dangerous excavation is not required to fence it, or otherwise insure the safety of strangers, old or young, who may resort to said premises, not by invitation, express or implied, but for the purpose of amusement, or from motives of curiosity." A boy of about ten years of age, who was accustomed to play in and about a pond of water in a vacant lot, the property of defendant, fell from a section of sidewalk which he was using as a raft on the pond, and was drowned. The defendant had permitted the surface water to accumulate on this lot. He had nothing to do with causing it to accumulate there. The pond was formed in the course of nature. The boy formed a raft, and "went on said pond, floating thereon." He was capable of constructing, and did construct, the "raft" that caused his death. Negligence, and even recklessness, was properly chargeable against him, and it was held that the defendant was not liable. We have no doubt that under the facts in that case the law was correctly applied. The case of Omaha v. Borman, 52 Neb. 293, 40 L. R. A. 511, 72 N. W. 310, is similar in character. "A body of water—either standing, as in ponds and lakes, or running, as in rivers and creeks, or ebbing and flowing, as on the shores of seas and bays—is a natural object, incident to all countries which are not deserts. Such a body of water may be found in or close to nearly every city or town in the land. The danger of drowning in it is an apparent, open danger, the knowledge of which is common to all; and there is no just view, consistent with recognized rights of property owners, which would compel one owning land upon which such water, or part of it, stands or flows, to fill it up, or surround it with an impenetrable wall." Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 114, 598; Omaha v. Bowman, 52 Neb. 293, 40 L. R. A. 531, 72 N. W. 316. There is no hard and fast rule applicable to everyone under like circumstances. To an adult in full possession of his mental and physical powers, one standard may be applied; to a boy, particularly if he be of limited intelligence, another standard; and to an infant not sui juris, and totally ignorant of danger, still another. Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Cumberland, 176 U. S. 232, 44 L. ed. 447, 20 Sup. Ct. 380, 382; Huff v. Ames, 16 Neb. 139, 49 Am. Rep. 719, 19 N. W. 623. "Much may depend upon the character of the injury, the circumstances under which it occurred, and the size, intelligence, and maturity of the child. In such cases the jury must be allowed to pass upon the question of contributory negligence. It is error to rule it as a question of law." Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, 368. It is only where the facts are undisputed, and are of such a nature that ordinary minds would not differ in their judgment of them, that the question is one of law for the court. In Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, it is said that plaintiff can recover in case "where the plaintiff was injured while upon defendant's premises by invitation of the latter, and where the negligence consists in a failure to keep such premises in a reasonably safe condition." It appears that these premises, consisting of three lots in the heart of the city of Lincoln, had a saloon located at one corner of the tract; that the lots were so situated that teams could drive thereon immediately from the principal streets of the city, and that people had frequently been invited by the owner to use the lots for the purpose of hitching their teams and that the citizens generally did so, both those who patronized the saloon and others; that there had been shows or some kind of public entertainments upon the lots at different times, and people had frequented them at such times, the people being, as one of the witnesses expressed it, "as thick as they could stand;" that there were at one time stairs put in at least two places to enable the people to go on the lots directly from the sidewalk on one side thereof, and it does not appear how long these stairs so remained, or whether they were taken away. The evidence also tends to show that a neighbor was allowed to and did use the lots for storing sewer tiling, and that piles of said tiling 3 to 5 feet in height, and covering a considerable space, were at times upon said lots; that the well was located in an open part of said lots about 20 feet from the said tiling; that the well was something more than 20 feet deep, and that the top was surrounded by a curb 10 or 12 inches high, which had been covered over with boards; that these boards, or at least some of them, were loose, and had been removed, and had been allowed to remain so for six months or more immediately prior to the accident; that there was a path running somewhere in the lots, and within 3 or 4 feet of the well; that it was a very public place, and that the boys of the city had frequently played ball on an adjoining lot, and on such occasions had, in playing ball, run across the lot in question; that they were playing ball there on the day of the accident, and not long before the accident one of the boys, in chasing the ball, nearly ran into the well; that the health officer of the city, some two or three years before the accident, called the attention of the owner of the premises to the dangerous condition of the well, and was told by the owner to go to h—, that he would run his own business; and that the well had thereafter remained substantially in the same condition until the accident; that on the day of the accident the deceased boy, with his little brother, who was about five years old, walked down to the livery stable near the premises, where their father's family horse was kept to see the horse, and then walked from there over to these lots, and to the well in question; and the little boy in question, while standing by the well, and without any apparent cause, was seen by one of the witnesses to "just stand and fall into the well, apparently reaching for something;" that the persons employed by the defendant to take care of the premises must have known the condition of the premises, and how it was being used, and the apparent danger from the well. There may be, and often are, circumstances under which one owes some active duty to a trespasser upon his premises. If a man wilfully lies down upon a railroad track, the engineer must not wantonly run his engine over him. One may not set a snare or spring gun for trespassers, and, knowing that some stranger had placed the snare or spring gun, if he wantonly allows it to remain, he will be responsible for the consequences. A well may be so contrived as to act as a dangerous trap, and one who allows it so to remain upon his premises will, under some circumstances, be liable. If adults, or children of such age as to ordinarily be capable of discerning and avoiding danger, are injured while trespassing upon the premises of another, they may be without remedy, while, under similar circumstances, children of three or four years of age would be protected. If I know that there is an open well upon my premises, and know that children of such tender years as to have no notion of their danger are continually playing around it, and I can obviate the danger with very little trouble to myself, and without injuring the premises, or interfering with my own free use thereof, I owe an active duty to those children; and, if I neglect that duty, and they fall into the well, and are killed, it is through my negligence. I cannot urge their negligence as a defense, even though I have never invited or encouraged them expressly or impliedly to go upon the premises. In Kinchlow v. Midland Elevator Co. 57 Kan. 374, 46 Pac. 703, a boy ten years of age, who was, by permission of the company, assisting in sweeping grain cars for which he and other boys were paid by being allowed the grain which they so gathered, went to an exhaust-steam barrel to warm his feet. He had no permission from the company to go there, and in stepping upon the cover (which was loose) the cover tipped, and he fell into the barrel, scalding his feet and legs. The court said: "We think it ought to have been submitted as a question of fact for the jury to determine upon the evidence whether the defendant was guilty of negligence or not in placing the barrel in that position, and in maintaining it with such an insecure cover; and also whether or not, considering the age and incapacities of the plaintiff, he was guilty of contributory negligence in stepping upon the cover." The court also quotes the following from an opinion of the supreme court of Michigan: "A license to come upon one's premises, especially if in the licensor's interest, imposes upon him the duty to warn those who come of any danger in coming of which he knows or ought to know, and they do not." And the court also quoted the following from the supreme court of Pennsylvania: "While it is true, in general, that where no duty is owed no liability arises, this rule varies with circumstances; and where, therefore, an owner has reason to apprehend danger from the peculiar situation of his property and its openness to accident, the question of duty then becomes one for a jury, to be determined upon all its facts of the probability of danger and the grossness of the act of imputed negligence." The demurrer to the evidence, which the trial court sustained, was overruled by the supreme court. In Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1, the cistern into which the child fell was made for the lawful use of the owner, and was then being used in the customary way. There was no evidence of its having been abandoned, or that the owner knew that little children were accustomed to play around it. There was "nothing to indicate any wanton or inhuman disposition in the defendant." The defendant had not allowed the cistern to remain uncovered, but in using the cistern the cover had been temporarily removed. From the very interesting opinion of Mr. Justice Campbell it appears that, if there had been circumstances in the case indicating a wanton or inhuman disposition in the defendant, he would have been held liable. In Kline v. Niman, 68 Wis. 271, 60 Am. Rep. 854, 32 N. W. 223, 54 L. R. A.

a boy of nine years, while playing upon and about a pond of water on defendant's premises, was drowned. In holding the defendant not liable, the court said: "Unless we hold that the defendant was under a legal obligation to fence this pond for the protection of children reaching and playing upon it, there can be no recovery. And it is obvious that the fence would have to be very high and very tight to afford any effectual guard against children having access to the pond. But upon the facts we do not think the law imposed the duty upon the defendant of building a fence or guard to prevent children from reaching the pond." In the case at bar the well was apparently of no use to anyone. It ought to have been filled, or, at any rate, it could easily have been put in such condition as to have prevented this accident.

We are not called upon to say what finding we would make upon the evidence in this record. We think it was for the jury to say whether there was an implied invitation to go upon these lots which included this little boy, and whether there was on the part of the owners of the premises such recklessness of danger to little children as to "indicate a wanton and inhuman disposition in the defendant." The former question was submitted by the trial court with proper instructions, and defendant cannot complain of a failure to submit the latter.

The trial court excluded evidence offered by the defendant to show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. There were circumstances shown in the evidence sufficient to require this question to be submitted to the jury if, under the law, contributory negligence of the plaintiff would constitute a defense in this case; but the court instructed the jury that "contributory negligence on the part of either or both his parents under the law is no bar to this action," and this instruction is complained of as error. Under our statutes, if the "neglect" was such as would have entitled the party injured "to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof," then the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued "shall be liable to an action for damages." Under a statute which provides that all causes of action shall survive, an action was brought by an administrator for the benefit of the estate of a child whose death was caused by the negligence of the county. The negligence of the parents contributed to the injury. Neither the father nor mother was a party to the action. The court said: "It is claimed that appellant ought not to recover, for the reason that it is not shown that the parents of the child were free from contributory negligence; and, since they inherited his estate, the rule which would bar a negligent parent from recovering in such a case in his own right ought to apply. But plaintiff seeks to recover in the right of the child, and not for the parents," and "such negligence would prevent a recovery by the parents in their own right." Wymore v. Mahaska County, 78 Iowa, 396, 6 L. R. A. 545, 43 N. W. 264. It was clearly shown by the supreme court of Vermont in Ploof v. Burlington Traction Co. 70 Vt. 509, 43 L. R. A. 108, 41 Atl. 1017, that the case last cited is not in point under a statute like ours. Under our statutes the intestate's right of action does not survive. No action can be brought for the benefit of his estate. The petition must show a pecuniary injury to the wife and next of kin. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Van Buskirk, 58 Neb. 252, 78 N. W. 514, and cases cited. In this case the father is the next of kin. He is also the administrator, and the plaintiff in the case, suing for his own benefit. Shall the state say to the father: "If you know that your child is in danger of injury from the negligence of others, you are under no legal obligation to protect it from such injury; and, if you allow the child to be killed, you may recover, from one who is equally at fault with yourself, for any pecuniary injury you may suffer by reason of the death?" No such meaning can be derived from the statute. The negligence of the father cannot be imputed to the child, and in an action for the benefit of the child, or of his estate, where such action is allowed, the negligence of the father is no defense. Huff v. Ames, 16 Neb. 139, 49 Am. Rep. 719, 19 N. W. 623. But in an action by the father for his own benefit to recover for the pecuniary injury which he has suffered by reason of the death of the child, his own negligence contributing to the death will defeat his recovery. Atlantic & O. Air-Line R. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 26 L. R. A. 553, 20 S. E. 550. In the case of Consolidated Traction Co. v. Hone, 59 N. J. L. 275, 35 Atl. 899, the supreme court of New Jersey announced a different rule. The supreme court of Vermont, in Ploof v. Burlington Traction Co. cited above, criticises the New Jersey case, and says: "The opinion cites—evidently without careful consideration—the Iowa case as supporting the decision." But the New Jersey court of errors and appeals had already reviewed the decision of the lower court, and, being equally divided upon the question here considered, reversed the decision of the lower court upon another point. Consolidated Traction Co. v. Hone, 60 N. J. L. 444, 38 Atl. 759. We think that the question of contributory negligence ought to have been submitted to the jury, and for the error of the trial court in refusing to do so it is recommended that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Oldham and Pound, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Harry HICKSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE of Nebraska.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. An instrument in the following form is the subject of forgery: "Mr. Sage: Please let this boy have a single rig,—a good one,—and oblige. I will bring it back myself. [Signed] George Clinger."
2. Such instrument is not only an order or request for the delivery of chattels over which Clinger had no control, but is also a writing obligatory, within the meaning of § 145 of the Criminal Code.

ERROR to the District Court for Cass County to review a judgment convicting defendant of forgery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. N. Sullivan for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. F. N. Front, Attorney General, and Norris Brown, for defendant in error:

Section 145 of the Criminal Code provides, among other things, as follows: "If any person shall falsely make, alter, . . . any order or warrant or request . . . for the delivery of goods and chattels of any kind, every person so offending," etc.

Blackstone defines forgery to be "the fraudulent making or altering of a writing to the prejudice of another man's rights."

4 Bl. Com. 247.

The plain import of the language "for the delivery of goods and chattels of any kind" is the physical release of the possession of the horse and buggy by its owner, and placing the accused in the possession thereof.

Benjamin, Sales, 1st ed. p. 498; 1 Lawrence & Rapalje, Dict. p. 368.

Sullivan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Harry Hickson, the plaintiff in error, was convicted of the crime of forgery, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of one year. The information upon which he was tried alleges that "James Sage now is, and for more than one year last past has been, engaged in the livery business in the city of Plattsmouth, Cass county, Nebraska, and letting, for hire, horses, harness, and carriages; that in and by the words 'single rig' are meant, in said business, a horse harnessed to a carriage, and such is the custom, usage, and understanding in said business; that one George Clinger, a resident of said city for more than one year last past, has been during all of said time a customer of said James Sage; that one Harry Hickson, late of the county aforesaid, in the county of Cass and state of Nebraska, on the 18th day of July, A. D. 1900, then and there being, then and there did unlawfully, feloniously, maliciously, and falsely, and with intent to defraud, make, forge, and counterfeit a certain paper writing purporting to be an order for the delivery of certain goods and chattels, and being of the tenor and effect following, to wit: 'Mr. Sage: Please let this boy have a single rig,—a good one,—and oblige. I will bring it back myself. George Clinger.' (Meaning thereby an order to said James Sage to deliver a horse, harness, and carriage to the bearer of said instrument for the temporary use of said George Clinger, and that said George Clinger would return said horse, harness, and carriage to the said James Sage, when through with the use thereof.) All contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Nebraska."

*Headnotes by SULLIVAN, J.

It is, on behalf of Hickson, contended that this information does not charge a public offense, and that the judgment of the district court should be, therefore, reversed. "Forgery," says Mr. Bishop, is the false making or materially altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy or the foundation of a legal liability." 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 523. The instrument in question meets the requirements of this definition, and is fairly within the meaning of § 145 of the Criminal Code. If the order had been genuine, if it were what it purported to be, it would doubtless have enabled the defendant to obtain possession of a horse and vehicle, and it would have imposed upon George Clinger the legal duty of returning the same to the liveryman. The authorities are not in entire accord as to the character of instruments which may be the subject of forgery, but according to all the decisions, both English and American, the writing fabricated by the defendant was within the inhibition of the statute. It possessed, not only apparent, but real, legal efficacy. In addition to being apparently capable of effecting a fraud, it would, if it were genuine, have created a legal liability. It was not only an order or request for the delivery of chattels over which Clinger had no disposing power, but it was also a writing obligatory, within the meaning of the law.

The judgment is affirmed.

Oliver S. BROWN, Appt.,
v.
O. A. NEILSON et al.

(.....Neb.....)

*A stipulation in a lease of a farm for a term of years, as follows: "And it is further expressly agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that all property of every name, character, and description belonging to said parties, of the second part that shall be on said premises, or brought thereon by said second parties during the term of this lease, shall be holden as security for the payment of the rents above reserved until all be paid, and the same shall be and remain a lien upon the same from year to year until said payments of the rents for said entire term have been fully discharged and paid,"—is ineffectual to create a lien, legal or equitable, in favor of the lessor for rents due and in arrears, on the crops grown thereafter on the leased premises, and other property not in esse at the time, and afterwards brought thereon by the lessee.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Sarpy County in favor of defendants in a suit to enforce an alleged lien on a tenant's property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John P. Breen, for appellant:

The parties having agreed that there should be a lien upon the chattel property brought upon the place, and upon the crops raised thereon, equity would decree a specific lien upon the property proved upon the trial to be upon the place, and order a sale thereof to collect the amount of rent found due.

Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1235; Jones, Liens, §§ 540-544; De Vaughn v. Howell, 82 Ga. 336, 9 S. E. 173.

Messrs. Duffie, Gaines, & Kelby, for appellees:

In the foreclosure of a lien, the proof should show the property upon which the lien attaches, in order that the court may decree its sale to satisfy the debt. There is no lien upon any specific property by virtue of a clause in a lease like the one in the present case. The contract is nothing more than an agreement between the parties that the lessee will give to the lessor a lien upon the property which comes within the terms of the agreement, upon a breach of the covenant to pay rent, and such an agreement might be enforced in equity, but in doing so the property must be specifically and definitely set forth upon which the lien will attach, in order to decree a foreclosure and sale of it to satisfy the debt.

An equitable lien does not include exemptions unless the same are waived by the agreement.

Gear, Land. & T. § 141; Vinson v. Hallowell, 10 Bush, 538; Seiling v. Gunderman, 35 Tex. 544.

Nor does an equitable lien include property of the lessee which has been disposed of. Burgess v. Kattleman, 41 Mo. 480.

An attempted mortgage of personal property or growing crops not in esse is void.

New Lincoln Hotel Co. v. Shears, 57 Neb. 475, 43 L. R. A. 588, 78 N. W. 25.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit was instituted by the plaintiff below (appellant here) for the recovery of the sum of $900, alleged to be due as rental for the use of a farm occupied by defendants Nelson, appellees, as tenants under a written lease for a term of years. The rent claimed to be due was for the full year beginning March 1, 1895, and the first half year beginning March 1, 1896. The lease of the premises, upon which plaintiff based his right of action, was executed October 30, 1893, and being for the term of four years commencing on the 1st day of March, 1894. In the petition, joined with the allegations for a recovery of a money judgment, the plaintiff pleaded a certain stipulation contained in the lease, which, it is averred, gave to him a lien in equity on all the property of whatsoever description on the leased premises, or brought thereon, and belonging to the lessees, as security for the rent due and in arrears under the terms of the lease; and prayed a decree establishing a lien upon all such property for the amount for which judgment should be rendered in the action. On plaintiff's application a restraining order was also issued enjoining the lessees from transferring or removing any of their property from the leased premises. The answer denied the right of the plaintiff to a lien on any of the defendants' property for any sum, and raised other issues not here necessary to further notice. On the trial of the case the plaintiff recovered a judgment for the money prayed, with interest, but was denied any relief on his application to have the amount found due to be a lien on the defendants' personal property, as prayed for in his petition. From the finding and decree denying him a lien he appeals.

The clause in the lease, which is made the foundation for the plaintiff's claim to the enforcement of a specific lien in his favor on all the property of the defendants Nelson on the leased premises, is as follows: "And it is further expressly agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that all property of every name, character, and description belonging to said parties of the second part that shall be on said premises, or brought thereon by said second parties during the term of this lease, shall be holden as security for the payment of the rents above reserved until all be paid, and the same shall be and remain a lien upon the same from year to year until said payments of the rents for said entire term have been fully discharged and paid." Under these sweeping provisions the plaintiff contends that he is entitled to have a lien decreed in his favor for the amount for which he obtained judgment on all personal property of all kinds belonging to the lessees which they had belonging to them on the leased premises at the time of the service of the restraining order issued as aforesaid. Just what this property is, is more or less involved in doubt; but it is claimed by appellant that a schedule of the property and claim of exemption filed by the lessee with the sheriff of the county, who appears to have been about to levy an execution thereon in another action, furnishes sufficient evidence as to the description and identity of the property to which his lien should attach. The claim of exemption was made by the lessee as the head of a family, and filed with the sheriff after the issuance of the restraining order in the case at bar. In it the defendant claimed his specific exemptions allowed him by statute, and, in addition thereto, property of the value of $500; he being, as alleged, the head of a family, engaged in the business of agriculture, and having no lands or town lots. The schedule of property showed items of personal property ordinarily belonging to one engaged in agriculture,—such as cattle, horses, agricultural implements, and household goods; also about 50 acres of growing corn, and about 1,300 bushels of corn in the crib. It is suggested by counsel for defendants that a stipulation of the character under consideration cannot, in equity, be extended to cover and include the exempt property of the defendant, allowed by law as the head of a family engaged in the business of agriculture; citing in support thereof Vinson v. Hallowell, 10 Bush, 538, and Seiling v. Gunderman, 35 Tex. 544. We prefer to address ourselves to the principal question presented by the appeal, and that is whether a valid lien may be created on any property by the method adopted in this case, and, if so, in what manner can the lien be made effective. Whether any of the property was in existence at the date of the execution of the lease is doubtful. Certain it is that all of it was unidentified and in no way described in the instrument, except as it might afterwards be brought on the leased premises; and for the most part the property consisted of growing corn and corn in the crib, not in existence until some time after the defendant occupied the leased premises under the lease by which plaintiff claims. Plaintiff's counsel in his opening brief, concedes that the instrument conveyed no present lien on the property of the lessee afterwards raised or brought on the demised premises; but contends that the stipulation quoted should be construed as an agreement by the lessee to give a lien on all such property after being brought on the premises, which ought to be enforced in equity in a suit to collect the rents in arrears by a decree in the nature of specific performance, in pursuance of the familiar maxim that "equity regards as done that which ought to be done." In the reply brief by different counsel it is argued that the rule first stated is not broad enough, and that the instrument itself, and by virtue of its own force, should be treated as creating a lien or mortgage on the property, although not in existence at the time of the execution of the lease, and which attaches as an equitable lien when the property comes into being, and within the terms of the stipulation, and that the lien is capable of enforcement in a court of equity. The stipulation does not comprehend within its meaning that the lessee will, after the property is acquired, execute a mortgage or other instrument encumbering the property for the benefit of the lessor. No original and independent contract creating a new lien can be inferred as the intention and contemplation of the parties without doing violence to the language used. It does not purport to be an agreement to give, in the future, a lien on the property then owned by the lessees on the leased premises; but by its own terms and provisions the instrument evidences an attempt to establish a lien in futuro on property at the time not in esse. It is a contract, or attempt at contract, for a sale and transfer by way of mortgage, and not a contract to give a mortgage. If it is effectual to create a lien on the after-acquired property, we are of the opinion that it cannot, under any well-recognized rule, be made the foundation for a decree in the nature of specific performance, conceding that, in a proper case, a court of equity will decree specific performance of a contract of a sale of, or to give a mortgage on, chattel property. Unless the stipulation under consideration in the instrument can be upheld as creating, in favor of the lessor, a lien, legal or equitable, on the crops grown on the leased premises, or in property brought thereon after the execution of the lease, we think it must entirely fail as having any validity or force for any purpose. It is not argued, nor will it be seriously contended, that the clause quoted conveys any legal interest in or lien on the property of the lessee not then in existence, or owned by him, but which was afterwards brought into existence, and on the leased premises. The authorities are numerous that a legal estate or interest cannot be conveyed in property which has no existence.

The question, then, is, Will such an agreement create a lien of an equitable character, attaching to the property when it comes into existence and is brought within the terms of the stipulation in other respects? On this the authorities are divided. The exact 54 L. R. A.

nature of the contract, therefore, becomes material in arriving at a proper conclusion. Such a contract is usually defined as executory in character, requiring something further to be done in the future by the parties thereto before a good title will pass to and be perfected in the lessor or mortgagee. In an early case, and one that is frequently cited by the courts holding to the doctrine that property not in esse is not the subject of transfer by way of mortgage, it is said regarding the nature of such contracts: "A stipulation that future-acquired property shall be holden as security for some present engagement is an executory agreement of such a character that the creditor with whom it is made may under it take the property into his possession when it comes into existence, and is the subject of transfer by his debtor, and hold it for his security; and whenever he does so take it into his possession before any attachment has been made of the same, or any alienation thereof, such creditor, under his executory agreement, may hold the same; but, until such an act done by him, he has no title to the same; and that, such act being done and the possession thus acquired, the executory agreement of the debtor authorizing it, it will then become holden by virtue of a valid lien or pledge. The executory agreement of the owner in such case is a continuing agreement, so that when the creditor does take possession under it he acts lawfully under the agreement of one then having the disposing power, and this makes the lien good." Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 17, 32, 46 Am. Dec. 706. In deciding the validity of a contract executory in character, under which a lien was claimed, this court, in an early case, Lanphere v. Lowe, 3 Neb. 131, 138, citing with approval a decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts, held that a valid lien could not thus be created. Gantt, J., speaking of a stipulation in a lease of real estate similar to the one under consideration, says: "But it was an effort on the part of the defendant to create a lien somewhat in the nature of a chattel mortgage upon a something not in esse. Can a valid charge be made upon a thing not in existence? I think it cannot. It is a very ancient rule of law that a man cannot grant or charge that which he has not; and in Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 488, it is said that this 'is a maxim of law too plain to need illustration, and which is fully supported by all the authorities.' Bacon, Abr. Grants, D, 2; Codman v. Freeman, 3 Cush. 309; 2 Kent, Com. 703; Head v. Goodwin, 37 Me. 187; Robinson v. Macdonnell, 5 Maule & S. 228; Chynoweth v. Tenney, 10 Wis. 400. This doctrine is applied to mortgages of goods which may be subsequently acquired by the mortgagee. It is equally applied to sales of personal property and rights of property. Chesley v. Josselyn, 7 Gray, 490; Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 569." And again, after mature consideration, the doctrine enunciated in the Lanphere Case was approved, followed, and reiterated in New Lincoln Hotel Co. v. Shears, 57 Neb. 478, 43 L. R. A. 588, 78 N. W. 25. Speaking on the same subject, says Cobb, J., who delivered the opinion of the court in Cole v. Kerr, 19 Neb. 553, 555, 26 N. W. 598: "There is, to say the least of it, great confusion of the authorities on the point being considered, but, after a careful examination of those cited on either side in this case, I have reached the conclusion that, as a question of law, the lien of a chattel mortgage of a crop of corn not planted at the time of its execution and delivery will not attach to the corn when it comes into existence until it is seized by the mortgagee, or until, in the language of a member of the court in the case of Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, 'a new intervening act.' Until then it remains a mere license, and, until acted upon, it conveys neither a lien nor a right of property which the mortgagee can assert against a purchaser or execution creditor of the mortgagor." The authorities appear to be almost, if not entirely, unanimous in support of the rule announced in the case last cited, to the effect that no legal estate or interest in or lien upon property not in existence at the time of the execution of the instrument passes to the grantee therein named by virtue of the instrument itself, and that the agreement purporting to convey the property or give a lien on such property when not in existence is executory in character, in the nature of a license or continuing agreement requiring a further and new act in order to transfer any legal title or lien to the grantee or mortgagee. In addition to the authorities cited in the two decisions of this court heretofore quoted from, the following are directly in point: Chapman v. Weimer, 4 Ohio St. 481; Long v. Hines, 40 Kan. 220, 19 Pac. 796; Lunn v. Thornton, 1 C. B. 379; Williams v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 476, 23 Am. Rep. 518, and cases therein cited.

The more difficult question, as heretofore stated, arises with respect to an equitable lien being thus created which attaches to the property when it comes into being and title thereto is acquired by the grantor, and regarding which there exists an irreconcilable conflict in the authorities. It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in the case at bar, and held by many respectable authorities, that, notwithstanding the property on which he seeks a lien was not in esse when the lease was executed, after the crops were raised on the demised premises, belonging to the lessor, and still remaining thereon, a lien in equity attached thereto, the enforcement of which should be permitted by resort to and the application of equitable rules and principles. The same argument, of course, applies to the other personal property afterwards acquired, and, subsequent to the execution of the lease, brought on the premises. What counsel contends for amounts substantially to the enforcement of a landlord's lien, not only on the crops grown on the leased premises, but also on all the personal property of the lessee brought thereon after the execution of the lease, without any statutory authority therefor. This is sought to be accomplished by the very general terms of the stipulation in the lease heretofore quoted. It is admitted that no legal title passed when the lease was signed, and that there then existed no property on which a lien could operate. But it is said that the stipulation will in equity establish what in law it is incapable of doing. That is, although under the law no valid interest or lien passes to the lessor, yet an equitable lien arises in his favor and attaches to the property when it comes into existence; that notwithstanding it is void in law,—without a new act,—it is valid in equity; that, by the application of the equitable doctrine contended for, a valid equitable lien may be created, not only on the crops raised on the leased premises for the year in which the lease was executed, but also as many years thereafter as the term of the lease covers,—two, five, ten, or a quarter of a century; and that such lien covers, not only the crops raised on the premises, but as well all other property acquired and brought thereon by the lessee. We do not think this can be accomplished by the application of any sound equitable principle. In the view of the case now under consideration, the expression of Judge Cobb in Cole v. Kerr, 19 Neb. 553, 26 N. W. 596, becomes pertinent: "Soil alone," says he, "does not produce crops of corn in this degenerate age, if it ever did. It now requires, in addition to soil, seed and labor, both of man and beast. So that the proposition that a sale or mortgage of a crop of corn not yet planted carries with it a property in or lien upon such crop, to attach and come into efficacy, without 'a new intervening act,' upon the crops coming into existence, carries with it the proposition that a man may mortgage his labor to be performed,—something which I never heard contended for in this country, but which is a right which, under the name of peonage, is recognized in our sister republic to the south of us." In New Lincoln Hotel Co. v. Shears, 57 Neb. 478, 43 L. R. A. 588, 78 N. W. 25, it was contended by those arguing for the validity of a clause in a lease similar in its general terms to those in the present case that the subsequent mortgagees of the property, who it is admitted had notice of the provisions for a lien in the lease, could not, therefore, question its validity. To this it is observed by Ryan, C.: "We cannot see that the validity of the provision of the lease is affected by this consideration. Whether or not a chattel mortgage, or its equivalent, can be made so as to affect future-acquired property, is a question entirely dependent upon general principles independent of statute." In Steele v. Ashenfelter, 40 Neb. 770, 59 N. W. 361, Post, J., speaking for the court on the same subject, says: "It will be seen from this statement that the question presented is whether, as against Hale, the execution plaintiff, the mortgage includes the after-acquired property of the mortgagor. The question thus presented is one upon which the authorities are by no means harmonious. The doctrine of Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, has been recognized by many of the courts in this country. In those jurisdictions the rule is that while, at law, a mortgage of after-acquired property confers no rights as against purchasers and attaching creditors, in equity it is effectual to charge the property, when acquired by the mortgagor, with an equitable lien, which will prevail, not only as against the latter, but also as against attaching creditors. The distinction above noted between the rule at law and in equity can, of course, have no place under our practice, where the two remedial systems are blended into one. Therefore, if the corporation, for which the plaintiff stands, by its mortgage acquired a lien which is enforceable in equity as against the execution plaintiff, such lien is available to him in this action. If the question was an open one in this state, the cases which recognize the rule in Holroyd v. Marshall would be entitled to great consideration; but we regard it as settled by the case of Cole v. Kerr, 19 Neb. 553, 26 N. W. 598, in which it is distinctly held that a mortgage of a crop to be planted conveyed no lien upon crops subsequently raised by the mortgagor as against judgment creditors of the latter." Says the supreme court of Wisconsin in Chynoweth v. Tenney, 10 Wis. 397, 403: "But it is contended further that, although this interest may be inoperative at law, yet that it was effectual to establish an equitable lien, and the decision of Judge Story in Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, 630, Fed. Cas. No. 9,673, and the authorities by him cited, are relied upon to support this position. But we think the doctrine of this case had been so fully denied by subsequent cases that it cannot be considered as law,"—citing a number of cases. "And in Congreve v. Evetts, 10 Exch. 307, Parke, B., says that such a conveyance 'gave no legal title, nor even equitable title, to any specific goods.' Other cases to the same effect might be cited, but we deem it unnecessary." The rule adopted by the Wisconsin court, just cited, has been approved and followed in Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Commercial Bank, 11 Wis. 207; Single v. Phelps, 20 Wis. 399; Mowry v. White, 21 Wis. 417; Lamson v. Moffat, 61 Wis. 153, 21 N. W. 62; and other cases. See also Hutchinson v. Ford, 9 Bush, 318, 15 Am. Rep. 711; Blanchard v. Cooke, 144 Mass. 207, 11 N. E. 83. Loftin v. Hines, 107 N. C. 360, 10 L. R. A. 490, 12 S. E. 197, is a case involving the validity of a lien by virtue of an instrument in the nature of a mortgage on crops to be grown two or three years in the future, in which it is stated in the syllabus: "A mortgage executed in 1888 on crops to be cultivated during 1889, 1890, and 1891 conveys no title, legal or equitable, which can be enforced by claim and delivery." And in the opinion says Clark, J., voicing the views of the court: "Unless said mortgage conveyed to the plaintiff either a legal or equitable title to the crop of 1889, the plaintiff cannot recover. It is held by Davis, J., in Wooten v. Hill, 98 N. C. 52, 3 S. E. 846, that 'the authorities do not warrant the conveyance of an indefinitely prospective unplanted crop, and we 54 L. R. A.

think it should be limited to crops planted, or about to be planted, as the crops next following the conveyance,'—that is, the crops of the years current when the mortgage is executed. This case is to the same purport as the opinion by Pearson, Ch. J., in Martin v. Marlow, 65 N. C. 695, and it has been cited and approved by Smith, Ch. J., in State v. Garri, 98 N. C. 733, 4 S. E. 633; by Shepherd, J., in Smith v. Coor, 104 N. C. 139, 10 S. E. 486; and by Avery, J., in Taylor v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 344, 11 S. E. 156. We think the mortgage was invalid as a conveyance of title, either legal or equitable, to the crop of 1899, and the proceeding by claim and delivery must fail." It seems in that state that a valid mortgage may be executed on unplanted crop for the current year. In an early English case the rule is stated as follows: "That, if the agreement was to mortgage certain specific furniture, of which the corpus was ascertained, that would constitute an equitable title in the defendant so as to prevent its passing to the assignees of the insolvent, and then the assignment would make that equitable title a legal one; but, if it was only an agreement to mortgage furniture to be subsequently acquired,—to give a bill of sale at a future day of the furniture and other goods of the insolvent, then it would cover no specific furniture, and would confer no right in equity." Mogg v. Baker, 3 Mees. & W. 195.

The natural and logical deduction to be made from the authorities above cited is that the agreement under which the plaintiff claims, being executory in its nature, and not wholly executed, is insufficient to pass any legal interest in or equitable lien on the property on which the lien is claimed, because not then in existence, and that the trial court committed no error in denying the plaintiff any relief by way of enforcement of a specific lien thereon for the amount for which he obtained judgment. Our court has long been committed to this doctrine, and there appears no sufficient reason to depart therefrom. Our Code has blended the remedies at law and in equity, both of which are now to be administered by one form of action, denominated a civil action. It is a familiar maxim that "equity follows the law." Applying this maxim, it is frequently held that a contract imposing no legal obligation cannot be enforced in equity (Snell, Eq. p. 17); this rule, of course, having its proper application and limitations. The contract in the present instance is not the result of a mistake or failure of the parties to correctly express their intentions in the stipulation creating the alleged lien. It amounts only to a mere license, which, to become effective for the purpose of creating a valid lien, requires a change of possession of the property when or after acquired. Until a new act intervenes, no sufficient title passes to the lessor which he can enforce at law or in equity, nor is he entitled to relief by the application of any recognized rule of equity, under the doctrine of specific performance. In the examination of the case we have not been unmindful of the authorities to which our attention has been directed, as well as many others examined in our consideration of the questions involved, in support of the plaintiff's contention that the stipulation creates in his favor an equitable lien, which ought to be recognized. This line of cases is not in harmony with the doctrine of this court as heretofore expressed, and must, for that reason, be disregarded as authority. The precedents which we have heretofore established should, in our judgment, be followed and adhered to.

It is claimed by the appellant that the affidavit and claim of exemption made by the lessee, heretofore referred to, established a ratification and affirmance of the lien of the plaintiff under his lease. The affidavit was made in another case, and in no wise related to or connected with the contract of lease, except as referring to it as being a paramount lien on the property. It was made and filed with the sheriff holding an execution to save the property from levy on the ground that it was exempt under the statute. After claiming his specific exemptions, which were enumerated, the appellee stated that certain growing corn, describing it, and a quantity of corn in the crib, was claimed under the statutory exemption of property of the value of $500, the affiant not being the owner of lands or lots; and that all of said property (i. e. the property claimed under the exemption of $500 in value) "is encumbered by and subject to a lien for accrued rent due from me for the premises upon which the said corn was raised and is located to the owner of the land in the sum of $900, and that the same is an encumbrance upon all of said property prior and paramount to any claim for exemptions which I now assert or claim against it; that the encumbrance and lien for said rent upon said property was created and established by myself and wife signing a written contract to that effect long prior to the levy of the execution levied by you on said property." While the affidavit was, perhaps, evidence of the construction the defendant put upon the contract of lease, it in no way changes the legal relations of the parties, and, so far as the statement that a lien existed on the property by virtue of the stipulation in the lease is concerned, it, at most, was only his opinion of its legal force and effect, which would not alter or change the principles of law involved and applicable under the issues joined in the present action. The lien referred to could only be perfected by a new act, which had not then been performed.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. Where an attachment is levied on real estate fraudulently alienated by the attachment debtor and grantor for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding creditors, even though the legal title of record is in another, the attachment creditor acquires thereby a lien upon the interest of the debtor in the land attached, which he may enforce by appropriate proceedings after recovery of judgment.
2. Where, after attachment proceedings on land fraudulently alienated, the real estate is reconveyed and restored to the fraudulent grantor, the lien of the attachment becomes thereby effective and enforceable, the same as though the conveyance in the first instance had not been made.
3. Held, under the facts as disclosed by the record, attachment creditor not guilty of laches in enforcing the lien acquired by virtue of his attachment.
4. Where, pending litigation, after the levy of an attachment on real estate, a lien has been acquired by another on the same property, the person in whose favor the lien is created is charged with notice, and takes subject to the rights of the plaintiff in the action wherein the attachment was levied and final judgment rendered.
5. Where a copy of an order of attachment is left with the actual occupant of lands attached, having possession of the premises and apparent authority over and control of the same, the act will be a compliance with the provisions of the statute, requiring that, "where the property attached is real property, the officer shall leave with the occupant thereof, or, if there be no occupant, in a conspicuous place thereon, a copy of the order," although such occupant be not the owner or lessee of such premises.
6. Where real estate is attached by a creditor of a fraudulent grantee to whom the legal title has been conveyed in fraud of the rights of the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, and who has no actual interest therein, and who restores and reconveys the real estate to the fraudulent grantor, who voluntarily encumbers the same for the benefit of his creditors, such attachment creditor thereby acquires no valid lien on the property as against such creditors of the grantor under their liens thus acquired.
7. An attachment lien on land, the legal title to which is in the attachment debtor, is subject to every equity which exists against the debtor at the time of the levy of the attachment, and courts of equity will limit the lien to the actual interest of the attachment debtor in such real estate.

APPEALS by plaintiff and defendant City of Grand Island from a decree of the District Court for Hall County in favor of defendant Taylor in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage lien on property belonging to defendant Hagge upon which Taylor claimed a lien by attachment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. A. Abbott, for the appellant receiver:

Where the property attached is real property, the officer shall leave with the occupant thereof, or, if there be no occupant, in a conspicuous place thereon, a copy of the order.

Neb. Code, § 203; Shoemaker v. Harvey, 43 Neb. 75, 61 N. W. 109.

To sustain this levy the court must read into this statute the words "or any member of his family."

The legal title being in Mr. Vieths at the time of the attempted levy, it created no lien on the land.

Neb. Code, § 476, title, Execution.

Only the legal title of the judgment debtor can be levied on, not an interest of any other kind.

Dworak v. More, 25 Neb. 735, 41 N. W. 777; Connell v. Gallagher, 36 Neb. 749, 55 N. W. 229; Nessler v. Neher, 18 Neb. 649, 26 N. W. 471.

The same rule that governs in regard to executions must govern levies under writs of attachment. The legal title, and that alone, can be levied on in either case.

Shoemaker v. Harvey, 43 Neb. 75, 61 N. W. 109; First Nat. Bank v. Tighe, 49 Neb. 299, 68 N. W. 490. See also Baird v. Kirtland, 8 Ohio, 21; Loring v. Melendy, 11 Ohio, 355; *Morris v. Lands to which a party had an equitable claim were not bound by a levy made before the legal title was acquired, although it was acquired soon after.

Gorrell v. Kelsey, 40 Ohio St. 117.

Taylor by this levy alone cannot acquire a lien on the lands, but must file his creditors' bill before he secures any interest in them.

This is the case of the three creditors.

Boynton v. Rawson, Clarke, Ch. 584; Corning v. White, 2 Paige, 567, 22 Am. Dec. 659; Miers v. Zanesville & M. Turnp. Co. 13 Ohio, 197; Loring v. Melendy, 11 Ohio, 355; Rapple v. International Bank, 93 Ill. 396; Miller v. Sherry, 2 Wall. 237, 17 L. ed. 827; Lyon v. Robbins, 46 Ill. 276.

How can this defendant claim a lien under these attachment proceedings when he could not have acquired a lien by the levy of the execution?

Lyons v. Robbins, 46 Ill. 276; Weed v. Pierce, 9 Cow. 722; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 392.

The property was not Vieths' property, and should not in equity be taken to pay his debts, to the exclusion of the debts owed by Hagge.

Roberts v. Robinson, 49 Neb. 717, 68 N. W. 1035; Berkley v. Lamb, 8 Neb. 399; Dorsey v. Hall, 7 Neb. 460; Gahway v. Malchow, 7 Neb. 285.

On motion for rehearing.

An execution cannot be levied on real estate conveyed by the judgment debtor to defraud his creditors.

Dworak v. More, 25 Neb. 735, 41 N. W. 777.

An attachment cannot be levied on property conveyed to a third party to defraud creditors.

Shoemaker v. Harvey, 43 Neb. 75, 61 N. W. 109; First Nat. Bank v. Tighe, 49 Neb. 299, 68 N. W. 490; Foster v. Durant, 2 Gray, 538; Baird v. Kirtland, 8 Ohio, 21; Lowry v. Wright, 15 Ill. 95; Loring v. Melendy, 11 Ohio, 355.

An instrument that transfers all the title of the grantor, whether legal or equitable, to a third party, and thereby forever shuts the doors of the courts in his face when he seeks at law or in equity to get it back, cannot be void.

Nessler v. Neher, 18 Neb. 649, 26 N. W. 471; Dworak v. More, 25 Neb. 735, 41 N. W. 777.

If levies can be made on one man's land (or on land standing in his name on the records) for another man's debts, he may, by means of this writ, judicially hold up any number of people by clouding their titles. They cannot be allowed to appear in the suit and discharge the property.

Kimbrow v. Clark, 17 Neb. 403, 22 N. W. 783.

Messrs. F. W. Ashton and E. E. Thompson for the appellant city.

Mr. W. A. Prince for appellee Taylor.

Mr. J. H. Woolley for defendant Hagge.

Mr. E. C. Glanville for First National Bank.

Mr. C. G. Ryan for C. I. Banking Company.

Holecomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One William Hagge was the owner of certain real estate situated in Hall county, upon which different alleged liens and their priorities are involved in this controversy. At or about the time of the transactions hereinafter narrated, Hagge became financially distressed, because of his connection with, and liability as a stockholder in, the Citizens' National Bank of Grand Island, which closed its doors and suspended business about December 4, 1893. On December 6 there was placed on record in the office of the county clerk a warranty deed, conveying the real estate in controversy from Hagge and wife to one D. H. Veiths, a relative of Hagge, for an expressed consideration of $10,500. The deed bore date August 9 preceding, and was acknowledged on the 24th of the same month. A mortgage from Veiths and wife on the premises was executed at the same time for an expressed consideration of $9,500, and recorded December 26, 1893. Soon after the recording of the instrument conveying the land from Hagge to Vieths, attachment suits were instituted by the appellee Taylor and appellant city of Grand Island, and the real estate was attached at the instance of Taylor as the property of Hagge; it being alleged that he had and was about to convey his property for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and hindering and delaying them in the collection of their debts. In the suit brought by the city, the property was attached as the property of Vieths on a contract liability claimed to be due the city on a bond, on which he was an obligor, in favor of the city, given by one West, as city treasurer. Each of these two suits was prosecuted to final judgment, and the property attached was ordered sold in satisfaction of the judgments so rendered. On January 26, 1894, Vieths and wife transferred the real estate to Hagge, excepting in the covenants of warranty any lien or liens thereon by virtue of attachment proceedings in favor of the city of Grand Island, and all taxes. Afterwards, through a third party or trustee, the land was conveyed to Mrs. Hagge, the wife of William Hagge. Mortgages were then executed by Mrs. Hagge and her husband, one in favor of James H. Woolley, to secure certain notes evidencing an indebtedness against Hagge, and one to the appellant, as receiver of the Citizens' National Bank, to secure $6,000 of a judgment rendered against Hagge on his stockholders' liability in said bank. The receiver then brought an action in equity to foreclose his lien by virtue of the mortgage securing the judgment, making all others claiming an interest in or lien on the land parties to the action, and claiming a prior lien on the premises, except as to the mortgage executed in favor of Woolley, which, it was admitted, was superior to the lien in favor of the receiver. Issues were joined, in the formation of which Taylor and the city of Grand Island set up their attachment suits and the judgments rendered therein, claiming a lien on the land by virtue thereof superior to those created by reason of the mortgages subsequently executed. On the trial the court found in favor of Taylor, awarding him a first lien; in favor of the assignees of the indebtedness secured by the Woolley mortgage, giving them a second lien. The receiver was decreed to have a third lien. The court dismissed the action as to the city of Grand Island and one other cross petitioner, whose case is not here for review. The receiver and the city of Grand Island appeal from the decree.

In determining the respective rights of the appellants, we are required to consider different and distinct propositions of law, and it is therefore proper to treat the appeal under two heads. The decree of the trial court, giving to the appellee Taylor, on his cross petition, a first lien on the property by virtue of the attachment proceedings instituted by him December 8, 1893, and the judgment rendered thereon, is objected to on the ground, as argued, that the legal title to the property, at the time the attachment was levied, being in the said Vieths, and Hagge having only an equitable interest therein, attachment would not lie, and the plaintiff in the attachment suit acquired no lien on the property by reason of the levy on the land while standing in the name of Vieths, the grantee of Hagge. In Shoemaker v. Harvey, 43 Neb. 75, 61 N. W. 109, it is held in the second paragraph of the syllabus: "If there is no possession of real property by an attachment defendant having an equitable interest therein, no valid levy and sale can be made upon such equitable interest; neither can it, under such circumstances, be subjected otherwise than by invoking the aid of the court of chancery." The opinion in the case sustains the proposition thus announced in the syllabus, and we have no disposition to modify or recede from same, and, if it be proper to apply the same principle to the facts in the case at bar, then the decree pronounced by the trial court cannot stand.

But is the principle applicable? In the Harvey Case and all similar cases, the underlying principle is that where the interest of the attachment debtor in real estate is purely equitable, uncoupled with possession, then an attachment or execution cannot be validly levied, but resort must be had to a court of equity to bring together the legal and equitable estate, and decree the property to belong to the actual owner. To illustrate: In the Harvey Case, the legal title to the property had never been invested in the Harveys. Their interest and estate, if any, in the property sought to be attached, was equitable only, and could not be reached by the attachment as "lands and tenements" of the attachment debtor. In the case at bar, Hagge was the legal and equitable owner of the property, save only as his title may have been devested by the conveyance made by him to the said Vieths. By the conveyance he attempted to convey all his interest in the land, both legal and equitable. He evidently sought to put it out of the reach of his creditors, either by process out of a court of law or in an action in equity. Taylor levied his attachment on the land on the ground that Hagge had fraudulently disposed of his property with the intent to cheat, hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors. By § 17 of the statute of frauds, such a conveyance is fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the grantors. As to such creditors, the conveyance may be treated as absolutely void and a nullity, as though it had never been made, and the property remained, as it actually was, the property of the debtor. The conveyance is, at most, only a cloud on the title of the debtor, and, if required, may be removed in any proper proceeding brought for that purpose. The attachment laws would be ineffectual, and the provision for the attachment of property which has been fraudulently conveyed would be meaningless, if the construction contended for should prevail.

The proposition under consideration seems, however, to have been quite firmly settled by the prior decisions of this court. In Keene v. Sallenbach, 15 Neb. 200, 18 N. W. 75, it is held: "Where an attachment is levied upon real estate belonging to the debtor, whether held in his own name or not, the attaching creditor acquires a lien upon the interest of the debtor in the land which he may enforce after he recovers judgment." Says Maxwell, J., the author of the opinion: "But where sufficient cause is shown for an attachment, and one is issued and levied upon real estate belonging to the debtor, whether held in his own name or not, the creditor acquires a lien upon the interest of the debtor in the land, which he may enforce after the recovery of judgment. Where in such case it is necessary to set aside a conveyance alleged to be fraudulent as to creditors, an action may be commenced for that purpose against the alleged fraudulent grantee and other proper parties, and it is the duty of the court to render such decree in the premises as the testimony will justify." In Kimbrow v. Clark, 17 Neb. 403, 22 N. W. 783, on the same subject, it is observed (at page 406, 17 Neb., and page 789, 22 N. W.), by Reese, J., who wrote the opinion: "If the title to the property is held by another as a secret trust for the benefit of the debtor, who is the real owner, and if such ownership is merely colorable, such property will be deemed to be held for the benefit of creditors, and the conveyance, while good as between the parties, will be held void as to them (Sturdivant v. Davis, 31 N. C. [9 Ired. L.] 365; Bump. Fraud. Conv. 215; Power v. Alston, 93 Ill. 587), and is subject to the process of attachment." To the same effect is Kennard v. Hollenbeck, 17 Neb. 302, 22 N. W. 771, where the facts are quite similar. It is stated in Gormley v. Potter, 29 Ohio St. 597, 599: "The land in controversy was subject to levy on execution, and the levy upon it was properly made. The conveyance to Flynn by the judgment debtor, and by Flynn to the debtor's wife, having been made with intent to defraud creditors, . . . the land was still the property of the judgment debtor, and subject to execution, as fully as if the conveyance had not been made." Says the supreme court of Illinois in the case of McKinney v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 104 Ill. 181, 183: "The statute says such fraudulent conveyances shall be held void as against creditors. Creditors have the right to treat such conveyances as void. The moment appellees levied their attachments especially upon these lands, as the property of Patterson, their election to treat the former conveyances as void was declared, and such attachments became a lien against the lands, with the same effect as if the fraudulent conveyances by Patterson had never been made." The following authorities also sustain the proposition as announced by the prior decisions of this court, heretofore referred to: First Nat. Bank v. Hollerin, 31 54 L. R. A.

Neb. 558, 43 N. W. 392; McVeigh v. Ritenour, 40 Ohio St. 107; Westerman v. Westerman, 25 Ohio St. 500; Sockman v. Sockman, 18 Ohio, 302; Scott v. Hartman, 26 N. J. Eq. 89; Terhune v. Hackensack Sav. Bank, 45 N. J. Eq. 344, 19 Atl. 377; Pratt v. Wheeler, 6 Gray, 520; Arper v. Baze, 9 Minn. 108, Gil. 98.

These cases are all distinguished from the Harvey Case, and those similar, in that in the one class the attachment or execution debtor, being the owner of the legal and equitable estate, has sought to alienate his interest in the property in fraud of the rights of creditors, who may treat the transaction as a nullity, and enforce their rights in, and claims to, the property, notwithstanding the fraudulent transfer; while in the other class of cases the attachment debtor has only an equitable interest in the property, which can be reached only by resort to a court of equity, which can take hold of the legal and equitable title at the point of divergence, and direct them into the one channel of actual ownership. We reach the conclusion, therefore, that Taylor acquired a valid lien on the real estate by virtue of the levy of his attachment thereon as the property of Hagge, which might be enforced in that action or in subsequent proceedings, and that, if required, a resort might be had to a court of equity to remove the cloud on the title caused by the fraudulent conveyance to Veiths. In the case at bar proceedings for this purpose were rendered unnecessary by reason of the reconveyance of Veiths to Hagge, which again restored to and vested in him full and complete title of record to the property to the same extent as though the conveyance in the first instance had not been made.

It is suggested that the attachment creditor has slept on his rights, and ought not in equity to be given a lien in priority to that of appellant under the mortgage security. The record discloses that the attachment was levied on December 8, 1893; that final judgment was not rendered until December 2, 1895; that after the levy, and during the pendency of the action, the appellant obtained his judgment and mortgage security therefor. On April 4, 1896, he began an action in equity, and made Taylor a party defendant, who came in and pleaded his attachment suit as giving him a lien on, and interest in, the land, which he asked to have adjudicated. We do not think there was any such laches as would forfeit his prior lien, and that the equity action begun by plaintiff afforded him an opportune time to adjust by decree the priorities of liens on the premises involved in the proceedings. The appellant, having acquired its lien pendente lite, was charged with notice, and took subject to the rights of the plaintiff in the action wherein the attachment was levied and final judgment rendered. Wright v. Smith, 11 Neb. 341, 7 N. W. 537.

An objection is urged as to the validity of the levy of the writ of attachment, because, as claimed, a copy of the order was not left with the occupant of the land attached. The return of the officer shows a copy of the order to have been left with the occupant of the premises on which the writ was levied. The evidence shows that the person occupying the premises as tenant was absent from the county, and that the person to whom a copy of the order was delivered was occupying the premises with the tenant, and had the apparent control and possession, and had the actual possession, of the premises at the time of the levy. This is sufficient. The law does not require the officer to determine who may be the lessee and legal tenant of the owner. The person who is in possession and occupying the premises with the apparent authority and control thereof may be served with the order, and compliance is thereby had with the provisions of the statute, viz.: "Where the property attached is real, the officer shall leave with the occupant thereof, or, if there be no occupant, in a conspicuous place thereon, a copy of the order." The person upon whom the order was served at the time of the service was the actual occupant of the lands attached, and the demands and object of the statute were met and complied with by service upon him. The objection to the manner of service of the writ is not, we think, well taken.

With respect to the city of Grand Island, and its interest in the lands involved in controversy by virtue of the writ of attachment by it levied on the land as the property of the grantee, Veiths, it is argued, as it is by the appellant, the receiver, that the Taylor attachment could be levied only on an equitable interest in the property belonging to the grantor, Hagge, and therefore it was invalid, and no rights accrued to Taylor by reason of the proceedings taken by him in that suit. What has been said with relation to the contention of counsel for receiver in this regard applies with equal force and pertinency to the claims of counsel for the city. We are therefore under the necessity of inquiring only as to the relative rights of the city as an attaching creditor of the grantee, Veiths, and the mortgagees claiming as creditors of Hagge. It is argued, in a very elaborate brief by counsel for the city, that the mortgagees of Hagge and wife, after the reconveyance by Veiths to Hagge, take their rights to an interest in the property through the fraudulent conveyance from Hagge and wife to Veiths, and, in turn, from Veiths and wife to Hagge, and that, as a proposition of law, those claiming under the grantor, by way of deed, mortgage, or other security or conveyance, either directly or remotely, are conclusively bound by the transfers and the recitals contained in the fraudulent conveyances, and are estopped from questioning, except on the ground of fraud, the validity or legal effect of the different instruments of conveyance through which title, interest, or lien is claimed. The propositions announced are supported by well-considered cases, which are entitled to great weight as authority. If the premises upon which the argument is based are sound and well founded, we are of the opinion that the conclusion arrived at, as stated in the proposition, would be inevitable and logically follow. But do the mortgagees of Hagge claim through fraudulent conveyances, from the consequences of which they cannot escape, and by the recitals of which they are bound? That Hagge's property is morally and equitably pledged to pay his debts rather than the debts of some third party is a proposition that will not be seriously controverted. In fact, it is admitted by counsel for the city; but it is contended that the proper steps have not been taken to avoid the effect of the conveyance to Veiths, and subject the property to the payment of the debts of Hagge, the fraudulent grantor. On the trial of the case, the court found the conveyance was fraudulent and void as to the creditors of Hagge. This is made manifest by the decree in favor of Taylor, an attaching creditor. The conclusion reached by the trial court is the only proper one, under the evidence. The question is one of fact, properly triable by the trial court. Sherwin v. Gaghagen, 39 Neb. 238, 57 N. W. 1005; Houck v. Heinzelman, 37 Neb. 463, 55 N. W. 1062; Goldsmith v. Erickson, 48 Neb. 48, 66 N. W. 1029; Crites v. Hart, 49 Neb. 53, 68 N. W. 302.

It is shown by the evidence quite conclusively that Hagge transferred the property to Veiths wholly without consideration, and for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of creditors, and that Veiths had no interest in the land whatever, save the naked legal title by reason of the transfer, colorable only, made by Hagge, as he says, to hold for him, and to be reconveyed whenever he requested it, and to avoid it being taken in satisfaction of his liability on a bond to which his signature was obtained, as he claims, by misrepresentation. Veiths had no real ownership in the property, made no attempt to exercise any authority as owner, and took no steps to reduce the land to actual or constructive possession under the conveyance. The conveyance being in fraud of the rights of the creditors of Hagge, it was evidently so recognized by the parties thereto, and on January 26 following the whole transaction was repudiated, and the property restored to its rightful owner. The deed of reconveyance was grounded on no new or valid consideration. It involved no new agreement or contract based on any good consideration. It was an undoing of that which had been wrongfully done, thus placing the parties in the situation in which they were prior to the first fraudulent conveyance. The legal effect was to restore the property to the legal owner, and render unnecessary any action or proceeding to annul and vacate the fraudulent conveyance. No action in the nature of a creditors' bill would lie, and the fraudulent grantee had relieved himself of being charged as trustee of the property for the benefit of the creditors of Hagge. Such an action would have been useless and barren of results, because the grantee had done all that a court of equity could, by order or decree, require him to do. Swift v. Hol-dridge, 10 Ohio, 230, 36 Am. Dec. 85; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 4th ed. § 500; *Dolan

v. Van Demark*, 35 Kan. 304, 10 Pac. 848.

Can an attachment against Veiths, while he held the naked legal title under such circumstances, be held superior to that of the creditors of Hagge, the actual owner, whether a lien on the property was acquired through the voluntary act of Hagge, or by decree or process of court in litigation brought for the purpose of enforcing the rights of creditors and establishing a lien thereon? What the rights of Hagge are, or those claiming under him as subsequent creditors, grantees, or otherwise than as creditors at the time of the fraudulent alienation, it is unnecessary here to discuss or determine. In Dolan v. Van Demark, 35 Kan. 304, 10 Pac. 848, it is said by Valentine, J.: "While generally a fraudulent vendee cannot, as against the creditors of the fraudulent vendor, sell, assign, or transfer the property to a third person, who has notice of the fraud, nor transfer or assign the same to even a person who has no such notice, where such transfer or assignment is merely to pay a pre-existing debt of the fraudulent vendee, yet such fraudulent vendee may make a valid sale of the property to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the fraud, or may, with the consent of the fraudulent vendor, and probably without his consent, make a valid transfer or assignment of such property to a creditor of the fraudulent vendor, either in payment or partial payment of a bona fide debt of the fraudulent vendor, or as security for such debt, and whether such creditor has notice or not of the prior fraudulent sale. Butler v. White, 25 Minn. 432; Boyd v. Brown, 17 Pick. 453; Murphy v. Moore, 23 Hun, 95; Stark v. Ward, 3 Pa. St. 328; Webb v. Brown, 3 Ohio St. 246; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 3d ed. 499, 500. The fraudulent vendee may lawfully dispose of the property in any manner in which the fraudulent vendor himself might have disposed of the property if the fraudulent sale had not occurred." It follows, then, that, if the property may lawfully be disposed of by the fraudulent grantee in satisfaction of the claims of the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, it may be reconveyed to the fraudulent grantor, and by him disposed of in any lawful manner for the same purpose.

The attachment lien of the city as a creditor of Veiths, the holder of the naked legal title, like the lien of a judgment against him, can only attach to his actual interest as the holder of the legal title as against the creditors of Hagge, and this interest, as we have seen, is nothing, the transfer being colorable only. In Roberts v. Robinson, 49 Neb. 721, 68 N. W. 1035, says this court, in speaking of the lien of a judgment, and where the principle involved is applicable to the case at bar: "By § 477 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a judgment is made a lien upon the land of the judgment debtor; that is, the land owned by him. True enough, if the record shows the legal title to land to be in the debtor, the judgment is an apparent lien upon that land; but the fact that the record shows the legal title to land to be in a debtor is not conclusive evidence that the debtor actually owns the real estate. The rule is that, where the legal title to real estate is in the name of the judgment debtor, nevertheless the lien of the judgment against him attaches only to the actual interest which he has in the real estate. Uhl v. May, 5 Neb. 157; Mets v. State Bank, 7 Neb. 165; Galway v. Malchow, 7 Neb. 285; Dorsey v. Hall, 7 Neb. 460; Mansfield v. Gregory, 8 Neb. 432, 1 N. W. 382; Berkley v. Lamb, 8 Neb. 392, 1 N. W. 320; Harral v. Gray, 10 Neb. 186, 4 N. W. 1040; Dewey v. Walton, 31 Neb. 819, 48 N. W. 860; Mundt v. Hagedorn, 49 Neb. 409, 68 N. W. 610." In Galway v. Malchow, 7 Neb. 285, says Lake, J.: "It is well settled that a judgment lien on the land of the debtor is subject to every equity which existed against the debtor at the rendition of the judgment, and courts of equity will always limit the lien to the actual interest of the judgment debtor,"—citing Freeman, Judgm. § 357; Swarts v. Stees, 2 Kan. 236. See also Smith v. McCann, 24 How. 398, 16 L. ed. 714. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the city in this action cannot invoke the principle sought to be applied as against the creditors of Hagge claiming under the liens sought to be established by them on the property in controversy, and that the attachment on the real estate as the property of Veiths was unavailing to create a lien as against such creditors, because the fraudulent grantee had no actual or substantial interest in the property, to which, at the time, he held the legal title of record. The equities are clearly in favor of the creditors of the fraudulent grantor.

The decree of the District Court should in all respects be affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

ERROR to the District Court for Johnson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount which had been collected upon a policy of life insurance which plaintiff's intestate had assigned to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Isham Reavis, J. W. Doweese, and Davidson & Giffen, for plaintiff in error:

Butler had a perfect right to procure the issuance of the policy upon his own life. The policy thus obtained, like any other chose in action, was subject to sale and assignment, or to being pledged as security. The sale and transfer were complete and absolute, with the entire consent of, not only the insured, but also the insurer. Such a sale is not against public policy.

The company having consented to the assignment and paid the policy without objection, no third person can raise that question.

Shryock v. Shryock, 50 Neb. 889, 70 N. W. 517; Meyers v. Schumann, 54 N. J. Eq. 414, 34 Atl. 1066.

The assignment was valid and binding.

The policy in controversy is in no sense a wager policy.

Messrs. Edward C. Hall and M. E. Cowen, also for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff was bound to pay or tender defendant the amount paid out by him as assignee of the policy.

Mr. A. M. Appelget, for defendant in error:

If the allegations of the petition are true, 54 L. R. A.

that the assignment was absolute, in consideration of the sum of $75, the transaction was a nullity, the assignee having no insurable interest in the life of the insured, and for that reason constitutes a gambling transaction void, independent of statute law, on the grounds of public policy.

Messrs. W. H. Kolligar and E. Fermeau, also for defendant in error:

A wager policy is defined to be "a pretended insurance founded on an ideal risk, where the insured has no interest in the thing insured, and can therefore sustain no loss by the happening of any of the misfortunes insured against."

2 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 694; 3 Kent, Com. 225; Beach, Ins. 1142.

Butler had a right to insure his life. He did so. This policy was valid. Having this policy, he had a right to assign it to Chamberlain to secure anything he might owe to him, or anything Chamberlain might agree to assume or pay for him. Chamberlain had a right to agree to pay Butler's premium, and to take an assignment of the policy to secure his reimbursement. While the law will allow such transactions, it will not, we maintain, allow Chamberlain to go further, and by agreement and assignment acquire what has been fitly termed an interest in the death of the assured.

Where the disproportion between the amount of a policy taken out by a creditor on the life of a debtor and the debt thereby secured is very great, it is the duty of the court to declare the transaction a wager as a matter of law.

Mr. Frank Irvine, for the Home Life Insurance Company:

The assignments were both valid.

A contract of life insurance is an absolute agreement to pay a stated sum on the death of the insured, and if valid in its inception, and if the premiums are paid, the company must, upon the death and compliance with the terms of the policy, pay this sum to the persons entitled, although the insurable interest no longer exists.

Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251.

The burden was not upon Chamberlain to show that the assignment to him was in good faith. The plaintiff, in order to recover, must affirmatively show that Chamberlain's possession of the policy and his disposition thereof were wrongful.

The want of insurable interest can be raised in only one of two ways: In the first place, the company, when sued upon the policy, may plead the fact in defense; in the second place, in some jurisdictions a want of insurable interest does not affect the validity of the policy, but the beneficiary recovers upon the policy as the trustee of the personal representative of the deceased.

There is no foundation for this action, provided Mrs. Butler had a remedy either against the insurance company or Crandall, the recipient of the money.

Want of insurable interest is a defense available only to the insurer.

Meyers v. Schumann, 54 N. J. Eq. 414, 34 Atl. 1066; Handyside v. Hadden, 36 Scot. L. Rep. 524; May, Ins. 398 A.

Norval, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Florence M. Butler, as administratrix of the estate of Robert L. Butler, brought action in the district court of Johnson county against Charles M. Chamberlain and the Chamberlain Banking House, alleging in her petition, substantially, that said Robert L. Butler, in his lifetime, procured to be issued to him a policy of insurance on his life by the Home Life Insurance Company of New York in the sum of $5,000, payable to his executors, administrators, or assigns; that, after the issuance of this policy, said Butler assigned it to Chamberlain as security for the payment of a loan of $75, made by defendants to said Butler; that afterwards Butler died, the insurance policy being at that time in full force, and that plaintiff was the duly-appointed administratrix of his estate; that plaintiff made due proof of the death of Butler, but the company refused to pay the amount of the policy to her, and had in fact paid it to one Crandall, to whom the policy had been assigned by Chamberlain; and that the latter had converted the policy and insurance to his own use; and she prayed for judgment against the defendants in the sum of $4,750, with interest and costs. Chamberlain answered, alleging that the policy was by Butler sold and assigned to him absolutely for the sum of $75, paid Butler by defendant, and that by such sale and assignment Chamberlain became the owner thereof, and paid all premiums and dues thereon from the time of assignment to the death of Butler; that, after such death, defendant assigned the policy to one Crandall, of New York, who prosecuted a suit in said state against said company on said policy, secured judgment for the amount thereof, which was by the company paid to Crandall in full; that when suit was commenced the latter gave due notice thereof to plaintiff, who failed to appear therein. To this answer a reply in the nature of a general denial was filed, except she alleged that she was financially unable to appear in the case in New York. On trial in the district court the following statement of facts (not copying unnecessary documents) was agreed upon: "It is agreed: That on the 8th day of December, 1891, the policy in controversy, then being in force and subsisting, was sold and assigned to defendant Charles M. Chamberlain for the agreed price of $75. That an assignment thereof was then made and executed by said Robert L. Butler in due form, which was immediately forwarded to the insurance company to be examined, and, if approved, recorded by the company in the office of its secretary. That afterwards said assignment was so approved and recorded,—the assignment, in the first place, being executed in duplicate, both copies of the assignment being sent to the insurance company; and afterwards the same was approved and recorded, one copy was returned to the defendant Chamberlain with an indorsement upon it that it had been recorded by the company, and immediately upon the receipt of the assignment thus approved and recorded the said $75 was paid to said Butler by Charles M. Chamberlain. That said Chamberlain continued to hold and own said policy, which was turned over to him with the assignment, until the 12th day of November, 1895, when the same was sold and assigned and delivered to one Elbert Crandall, of the city of New York, by said Chamberlain, by written assignment duly and properly executed at that time; which assignment is in words and figures as follows. [Here copy of assignment follows.] That on the 12th day of November, 1895, said policy, with said assignment to Crandall, was forwarded to said Elbert Crandall at New York city, who thereafter brought suit in his own name in the supreme court of the county of New York in the state of New York, and recovered a judgment against the insurance company for the amount of the policy, interest thereon, and costs. That after the commencement of said suit, and before the trial thereof, and before answer day, the plaintiff in this case was notified by the said insurance company of the pendency of said suit, and she was requested to intervene, and assert whatever interest she had in and to said policy. This she declined to do, alleging as her reason that she was financially unable to go to the state of New York and maintain her case. This plaintiff was not made a party defendant in the suit brought in the supreme court of New York, and no service of summons was made upon her in that suit. After said judgment was rendered against said insurance company, the same was collected by said Crandall, no part of the amount of which has ever been paid to or received by these defendants, or either of them. After the original assignment of said insurance policy to said Charles M. Chamberlain, and while he remained the holder thereof under said assignment, he paid the annual premiums thereon as follows, to wit, $135.95 about the 12th day of December, 1891, $135.95 on November 26, 1892, $135.95 on November 26, 1893, $135.95 on November 26, 1894. It is further agreed: That after the death of said Robert L. Butler, which occurred on the 29th day of October, 1895, the plaintiff in this case notified the insurance company not to pay the amount of said policy to defendant Chamberlain, as administratrix of the estate of her husband. Both said Elbert Crandall and this plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her husband, made proof of the death of said Robert L. Butler, and forwarded the same to the insurance company at its office in New York city, and each demanded the payment of the amount of the policy from the company. After the death of said Robert L. Butler, the insurance company notified the plaintiff that, as the assignment to Chamberlain of the policy was recorded in their office, that she was not the proper party to make the proof of death. That the said insurance company did not deny its liability to pay the amount mentioned in the policy. It is also mutually agreed that Mr. Charles M. Chamberlain and Mr. Elbert Crandall are cousins." On trial the court found in favor of the Chamberlain Banking House, and rendered judgment against the defendant Charles M. Chamberlain and in favor of the plaintiff for the value of the policy, less premiums paid, and the money paid by him to Butler. Chamberlain brings the judgment here for review.

Several interesting questions are presented in the briefs of counsel, but we think it unnecessary to decide more than one, owing to the position we shall take on it. While the petition alleges that the policy was merely pledged, it is agreed by the stipulation quoted that it was in fact sold and assigned absolutely by Butler to Chamberlain. If such assignment was valid, then the latter was the owner of it, and had the right to dispose of it as he saw fit. We think the law is that under the facts it was lawful for Butler to dispose of the policy. We are aware that there is a sharp conflict of authorities in the several American courts relative to the validity of a sale of life insurance policy by one having an insurable interest to one not having such interest. In all the states, perhaps, it is held against public policy for one not having an insurable interest to procure insurance upon the life of another, even though it be with the consent of such person. In some of the states it is held against public policy for one who has taken out insurance upon his own life to transfer it to one having no insurable interest. In some of the states such a transaction is prohibited by express legislative enactment. But the question to be decided here is, assuming that Chamberlain had no such interest in the life of Butler, could he legally buy the policy in question, such policy in its inception having been valid, and taken out in good faith by Butler, with no intention or design on his part of assigning it subsequently to Chamberlain. Those courts which hold such a transaction void proceed on the ground of public policy. Originally, at common law, choses in action that were assignable were exceedingly few, but the tendency is now reversed, and those not assignable are the exception, rather than the rule. The modern policy being, then, as above stated, the reason for a rule contrary to such tendency should be exceedingly strong before a court, where the question is yet unsettled, should adopt a contrary rule in any given case. While public policy is a salutary thing, it has its limitations and dangers. Among them is the fact that it is an exceedingly indefinite term, has no lines of distinct demarkation, and may readily lend its aid to a court anxious to make a good case, rather than a safe precedent. For that reason, before a case is decided upon that ground solely, courts should be very sure that the reasons for so doing are clear, strong, and admit of no doubt concerning their reasonableness or applicability. Now, the principal reason for branding assignments of this nature as inimical to sound public policy is that the interest of a stranger in the death of the insured is so strong as to tempt to murder of the latter, the earlier to participate in the avails of the policy. Such interest doubtless tends to such a desire. But the same desire would exist on the part of a creditor, who has an insurable interest, or of one who advanced money on the policy, where his only hope of reimbursing himself for the loan might be the policy. It is exceedingly doubtful if strangers are any more apt to either desire or seek to accomplish the death of others than are those nearly related to them. The strength of this desire, where it exists, depends not so much upon the consanguinity of the parties as upon the moral stamina of him who holds the expectancy, be that expectancy an insurance policy, a devise, a remainder, or other acquisition which may not be had until the death of another. Another reason sometimes assigned for holding such assignments illegal is that an assignee having no insurable interest is in the position of one who, in the first instance, takes out a wager policy. But we think not. If an insurable interest exists in the beneficiary at the time the policy is issued, and it is taken out in good faith, the object and purpose of the rule against wager policies would seem to have been sufficiently attained (16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 846), and there is no more reason to apply the rule to policies taken out in good faith, and afterwards assigned in good faith, than there would be were the assured to retain it in his own hands.

Counsel rely upon Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924, as an authority to uphold the judgment of the lower court. That case and this present two very different questions. In that case the insured took out the policy in pursuance of an agreement that a third party, having no insurable interest in his life, should, in consideration of certain payments to be made by it, receive at his death nine tenths of the insurance money. In the opinion Justice Field says: "The assignment of a policy to a party not having an insurable interest is as objectionable as the taking out of a policy in his name." Under the facts involved in that case the language was appropriate, for there was collusion between the insured and the party to be benefited by his death by a receipt of the amount above mentioned. But the language is not applicable to this case, for there was no agreement between Butler and Chamberlain, at the time the policy was procured, that the latter should participate in its avails. The transaction with him was wholly independent of and subsequent to the original one between Butler and the insurance company. If their agreement had existed prior to the issuance of the policy, or contemporaneous therewith, then the words quoted would be applicable; otherwise not. That this is the meaning of the words is clear when we read Mina L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 567, 24 L. ed. 287, and Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251. In the France Case that court lays down the rule applicable to the facts in this case, viz., that any person has a right to procure insurance on his own life, and to assign it to another, provided it be not done by way of cover for a wager policy. The intention and good faith of the parties are the governing principles. In the Schaefer Case the court held that a life insurance policy originally valid does not cease to be so upon the intermission of the assured party's interest in the life insured. It was certainly not intended in the Warnock Case to overrule or modify either of them. They are not in conflict with that case when the facts are remembered. The language of the court in the Warnock Case is unfortunately somewhat misleading in several instances, although the ultimate conclusion reached is right. The comments therein on the New York cases (Valton v. National Fund Life Assur. Co. 20 N. Y. 32, and St. John v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 13 N. Y. 31, 64 Am. Dec. 529, are uncalled for, and not involved in the issues, for the questions of law decided in those cases are very different from, and not necessarily conficting with, the law involved in the War-nock Case. We are aware that several eminent American courts disagree with the New York cases cited, and with other courts of this country which agree with the latter. It seems that to hold contrary to that rule would have the effect mentioned in St. John v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co.,—"without the right to assign, insurances on lives lose half their usefulness;" a fact that should not be lost sight of in this day, when almost every person carries life insurance of some character, the commercial value and usefulness of which should be fostered, rather than crippled or minified. If such choses in action may be legally sold absolutely, it is plain that more can be realized from them in the day of need than if valuable only as security for loans. And until it shall be made to appear that in those jurisdictions where such policies are assignable absolutely crimes committed by such assignees are more frequent than in those where assignments of the nature of the one here involved are illegal, we are of opinion that the reasons for holding such transactions void are insufficient. Chamberlain, then, being, under the facts agreed on, the absolute owner of the policy, had the right to transfer it to Crandall, and such act was not a conversion of the policy or insurance, for he was entitled to the whole of the proceeds thereof, free from all claims of the plaintiff or the estate of the deceased.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

v.

PARK CITY BANK.

(22 Utah, 473.)

*1. While a creditor is under no obligation to accept the provisions of an assignment made for his benefit, yet he cannot hold an assignment good in part and bad in part. Neither can he receive the benefits of the assignment while he is in actual hostility to it, claiming in the courts that it is fraudulent and void, and refusing to accept its benefits.

2. A creditor is not entitled to two in-

*Headnotes by MINER, J.

NOTE.—Right of creditor to participate under assignment or deed of trust for the benefit of creditors which he has repudiated.

I. When creditor has successfully assailed assignment or deed of trust.

II. When creditor's attack on assignment or deed of trust has failed.

III. When creditor's attack on assignment or deed of trust is still pending and undetermined.

Upon the general question as to the necessity of acceptance of an assignment or deed of trust for creditors, see note to the case of Alliance Milling Co. v. Eaton (Tex.) 24 L. R. A. 869.

I. When creditor has successfully assailed assignment or deed of trust.

When, as in McLAUGHLIN v. PARK CITY BANK, the creditor has successfully assailed the assignment, and has avoided it, so far as it prejudicially affects him, it is clear that he is precluded by the doctrine of election from subsequently claiming any benefit under or through it.

Collumb v. Read, 24 N. Y. 515, referred to in the opinion in this case, was in principle somewhat like it. In that case a judgment creditor, who had succeeded in having an assignment for creditors set aside as to him upon the 54 L. R. A.

consistent, adverse, or conflicting rights. If he accepts the benefit of an assignment knowing the facts, he cannot, ordinarily, impeach or repudiate it thereafter on the ground that it is illegal and fraudulent; nor can he, having repudiated it, take under its provisions as other creditors who have accepted it.

3. An attaching creditor as well as a receiver has an insurable interest in the attached property, but in either instance the insurance would be a personal contract between the company and the party insuring, and, unless there be some contract or trust relation between them, in the event of loss the insurance money collected would belong to each in his individual or official right.

4. While an assignee, or a receiver as his successor, holds the assigned property in trust for such creditors as accept the provisions of the assignment, the trust relation cannot exist between the reground that it was fraudulent, tried to hold the assignee liable for rents, collected before the commencement of his action, of land included in the assignment. The court, however, held that he could not hold the assignee for such rents because, having claimed in hostility to the assignment, he must treat the assignee as a stranger.

So, also, it was held in People v. Chalmers, 60 N. Y. 154, that the sureties upon the bond of an assignee for creditors were not liable for the failure of the principal to account for assets of the assigned estate in his hands pursuant to judgments in favor of certain creditors, holding the assignment void as to them and directing the assignee to pay over the funds in his hands to apply on their debts.

A similar decision was made in Re Cantor, 31 App. Div. 19, 52 N. Y. Supp. 382, where it was held that a judgment creditor, who had procured a decree setting aside an assignment for creditors, as to him, and directing the assignee to pay over to the receiver appointed in the action a specified sum (which presumably represented the value of the assets that the assignee had received), was not entitled to have such sum paid out of a fund which a substituted assignee recovered from the sureties of the original assignee, the latter having absconded without paying over the amount in question to the receiver as directed by the decree, or otherwise ceiver and a creditor who repudiates the assignment as well as the trust relation.

5. An execution creditor is not entitled to possession and rents of the property levied upon, before sale and before the time for redemption has expired.
6. An attachment creditor who sits back during the pendency of legal proceedings, and allows the receiver of the estate to insure the attached property for the benefit of the estate, and who all the time is maintaining a hostile attitude towards the receiver and the assignment under which he holds, cannot, after money is collected by the receiver on an insurance policy, claim a trust in his favor on account of his attachment on the burned building, which might have satisfied his execution had it not burned.

(December 10, 1900.)

accounting for the assets that he had received. The court, in justification of the decision (which had the effect of giving to the other creditors, at the expense of the judgment creditor, a benefit that they would not have received but for the default of the original assignee), said that the attacking creditor could have shared with the other creditors, acting under the assignment, in the fund, but for the fact that he had lost that right by repudiating the assignment and obtaining a decree which, so far as he was concerned, wholly destroyed it.

The Massachusetts supreme court, in New England Bank v. Lewis, 8 Pick. 113, while holding that the prosecution, by a creditor who was preferred in a deed of trust, of an attachment action pending at the time of the execution of the deed, to a judgment adverse to him, did not show a waiver of his right to take under the deed, said that if he had prevailed in the action, and had then elected to rely on his attachment rather than on the deed of trust, it would undoubtedly have amounted to a waiver and disaffirmance of the trust.

So, also, it was held in Iselein v. Henlein, 16 Abb. N. C. 73, that a creditor who, after an assignment for the benefit of creditors, attached a part of the property, asserting that the assignment was fraudulent, and prevailed in the action, could not thereafter claim under the assignment.

See also Belfeld v. Martin, 4 Colo. App. 578, 37 Pac. 32, infra, II.

It is apparent, however, that a creditor may claim that he has certain rights paramount to the assignment without attacking the assignment itself or assuming an attitude hostile to it, and it is obvious that when that is the case his claim, even if successful, will not operate to preclude him from claiming under the assignment.

Thus, Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 33 L. ed. 696, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354, held that a creditor of an assignor for creditors, who obtained a decree subjecting property in the hands of the assignee to a trust in his favor because it was bought by the assignee with his money, was not estopped to claim under the assignment. The court said that it could not be assumed that the assignor intended to dispose of that which was not his, or that he intended, even if he could lawfully do so, to cut the creditor off from participating in the property assigned, by imposing the condition that he should purchase his share by parting with his own property.

So, also, in Comer v. Tabler, 44 Fed. 467, it was held that a creditor was not precluded from claiming under a deed of trust because certain preferences had been declared at his 54 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by intervener from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County dismissing his petition to intervene in proceedings for the settlement of the affairs of the insolvent Park City Bank, upon the assets of which petitioner claimed a prior lien by reason of attachment proceedings which he had instituted. Affirmed.

Statement by Mimer, J.:

On July 12, 1893, the Park City Bank made an assignment of its property to Edwin Kimball, who qualified as such assignee, and subsequently, in October following, said assignee died. On July 12, 1893, Thomas Cupit, the petitioner, and a creditor of the bank, commenced an action in attachment instance to be illegal. The court admitted that where one beneficiary interested under an assignment, mortgage, or deed of trust attempts to set aside the conveyance, he is not entitled to take anything under it, but said that the creditor in this case did not seek to invalidate the deed, and therefore was not within the rule.

In Patty v. City Bank, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 475, 41 S. W. 173, it was held that a creditor was not precluded from taking under an assignment for creditors by the fact that, after the assignment, he attached certain property of the assignor which was exempt by law from it, and which was so scheduled in the assignment, and so established on the trial. This decision, also, was upon the ground that the attachment, under the circumstances, was not an attack on the assignment, and could not be considered an election by the creditor not to take under it.

And it was held in Re Sawyer, 7 App. Div. 198, 40 N. Y. Supp. 204, that a foreign creditor who, after knowledge of the debtor's failure, but before knowledge that he had made an assignment for creditors, attached property of the debtor in the state where the creditor was domiciled, was not estopped to claim under the assignment, notwithstanding that the assignee intervened in the attachment action claiming the property, and was defeated therein because the court held that the creditor, having attached the property before knowledge of the assignment, had a prior right. It was held, however, that such creditor, before sharing under the assignment, must credit the amount collected on the distributive share. The ground of the decision is that the attachment in the foreign state did not constitute an attack on the assignment. See also Clark v. Gbboney, 3 Hughes, 391, Fed. Cas. No. 2,821, infra, II., and Coverdale v. Wilder, 17 Pick. 178, infra, II.

There is a class of cases, instances of which will be found in each of the subdivisions of this note, where one who has sold goods to an assignor for creditors rescinds the sale after the assignment, and replevies the goods, or part thereof, and subsequently seeks to claim under the assignment. In some of these cases it will be observed that the right of the creditor to claim under the assignment has been denied; but such decision is not necessarily based on the ground that the seller has elected to repudiate the assignment, and therefore cannot claim under it. Unless the assignment or deed of trust expressly provides, or clearly implies, that such property shall be deemed assets of the assigned estate, the act of the seller in rescinding the sale and claiming as his own property that, upon this theory, did not pass to recover $6,000 from said bank, and levied his attachment upon the property in question in this case, consisting of real estate and a bank building located thereon. The attachment proceedings were subsequently held regular by a decision of this court. See Cupit v. Park City Bank, 10 Utah, 204, 37 Pac. 564. In July, 1896, Cupit recovered judgment for $7,256.88, and $441.75 costs, and in October, 1897, brought a suit in equity to set aside the assignment of the bank, claiming that it was fraudulent as to him, and to subject the property levied upon to his attachment lien, and the supreme court directed a decree in his favor, and for the enforcement of the lien against the property. See 20 Utah, 292, 58 Pac. 839. On October, 1893, after the death of Kimball,

D. C. McLaughlin was appointed receiver to hold and take charge of the assigned property, and has since continued to act as such receiver. When the receiver took possession the bank building in question was insured, and thereafter, in the years 1895, 1896, 1897, and 1898, said receiver kept the property insured in his name as receiver. The insurance agent knew of the situation of the property and of the attachment upon it. The premiums were paid out of the funds in the hands of the receiver. In June, 1898, the bank building was destroyed by fire, said building being covered by $5,000 insurance, which was paid to the receiver. Mr. Cupit knew of the insurance, but paid nothing towards the premiums. The receiver occupied the building after his appointment under the assignment, would not seem to involve a repudiation of the assignment, precluding him from claiming thereunder. Thus far, there is no room for the application of the doctrine of election because the two remedies invoked by the seller may be perfectly consistent; but at this point another factor enters into the problem. While the replevin action is not inconsistent with, and does not involve a repudiation of, the assignment, yet such action is inconsistent with a claim, whether against the buyer himself or his assignee, for the purchase price of the goods, as such claim necessarily assumes a valid sale as its basis. Therefore, while it would seem that a seller, under such circumstances, would not be precluded from making any claim against the assignee which he might have made against the assignor, had there been no assignment, he may be precluded from making a claim against the assignee for any part of the purchase price, not because he has repudiated the assignment, but because, leaving the assignment out of the question, he has assumed two inconsistent positions, and would be precluded from making such a claim against the assignor. It is not intended to assert here that the seller would, in fact, be precluded by bringing such an action from holding the buyer for any part of the purchase price. That question is not treated in this note.

The distinction above suggested seems to be supported by Farwell v. Myers, 59 Mich. 179, 26 N. W. 328, where it was held that a seller of goods who, after an assignment for creditors by the purchaser rescinded the sale, brought an action of replevin to recover the goods, and procured a judgment in his favor, but was unable to find all the goods, could not properly file against the assignee a claim as for goods sold and delivered, deducting the price of the goods replevied. This decision was not put upon the ground that the seller had repudiated the assignment, but upon the ground that, having elected to rescind the sale, and having procured a judgment on that theory, he could not base a claim on the theory of a sale. That the court made the distinction above suggested is shown by its concession that a claim based on the conversion of such of the goods as were not replevied would have been good. It will be observed that such a claim would be consistent with the theory on which the action was based, but if the bringing of the action were deemed to constitute an election not to take under the assignment, it would be as fatal to a claim based on a conversion as to one based on a sale. See also Wright v. Zeigler, 70 Ga. 501, infra, II.; Hargadine-McKittick Dry Goods Co. v. Warden, 151 Mo. 578, 52 S. W. 593; and Re Wilcox, 1 Am. Bankr. Rep. 544,—infra, III.

A creditor does not, by proving his claim in bankruptcy without disclosing that he was entitled to a pro rata dividend under a general assignment by the debtor, waive his right to a dividend under the assignment, where he did not know of his rights under the assignment at the time he proved his claim in bankruptcy. Re Woodward, 67 How. Pr. 359.

II. When creditor's attack on assignment or deed of trust has failed.

There is an irreconcilable conflict between the authorities upon the question whether a creditor whose attack on the assignment has failed, and has been finally determined by an adverse decision, or by a discontinuance or dismissal, is thereafter precluded from claiming under the assignment. The affirmative of this proposition, i. e., that the creditor is precluded under such circumstances, is supported by the following cases, which will be hereafter cited at greater length: Adler-Goldman Commission Co. v. People's Bank, 65 Ark. 380, 46 S. W. 536; Belfield v. Martin, 4 Colo. App. 578, 37 Pac. 32; Vernon v. Morton, 8 Dana, 247; Valentine v. Decker, 43 Mo. 583; Fellows v. Greenleaf, 43 N. H. 421; Furman v. Fisher, 4 Coldw. 626, 94 Am. Dec. 210; Farquharson v. McDonald, 2 Helsk. 419; Ewing v. Cook, 85 Tenn. 333, 8 S. W. 507; O'Bryan Bros. v. Glenn Bros., 31 Tenn. 107, 17 S. W. 1030; White v. Sterling, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 553, 32 S. W. 909.

In Adler-Goldman Commission Co. v. People's Bank, 65 Ark. 380, 46 S. W. 536, supra, a creditor who attached part of the assigned property and prosecuted the attachment action to a judgment adverse to himself was held to have lost his right to take under the assignment, notwithstanding that in attaching the property he acted on the advice of the assignee's attorney to the effect that he had better attach the property as a matter of precaution, and that his rights under the assignment would not be affected by so doing. The court took the position that a creditor who thus repudiates an assignment is estopped to claim under it upon the same principle that if he accepts a benefit under it he is estopped to repudiate it (but see Re Van Norman, 41 Minn. 494, 43 N. W. 334, and Mills v. Parkhurst, 126 N. Y. 89, 13 L. R. A. 472, 26 N. H. 1041, infra, III.). The court also said in support of its position that the right of a creditor to share in the benefit of an assignment is based, in part, upon his assent, and that while ordinarily his assent will be presumed, such presumption is not conclusive.

In Belfield v. Martin, 4 Colo. App. 578, 37 Pac. 32, a creditor after an assignment for creditors attached part of the property and prosecuted the attachment suit to a judgment for his own purposes as receiver, and for the benefit of the bank, and collected rents from tenants occupying portions of it, and paid the taxes, insurance, and for the repairs thereon. The appellant claims:

That the receiver occupied the building for fifty-six months, and that a fair rental value would be.....	$ 2,800 00
That said receiver collected rents of.....	4,346 45
Received insurance money.....	5,000 00
Total.....	$12,146 45
That he paid for taxes..	$1,803 67
Paid insurance.....	240 00
Repairs.....	281 91
Heat, light, water, etc..	2,768 40
	5,093 98

Leaving a balance in his hands of $ 7,052 47

In his own favor, under which the property was sold and the proceeds of the sale turned over to the creditor, who, so far as appears, still retained them. The case is therefore, upon its facts, one of a successful attack on the assignment; but the court takes the broad position that a seizure and sale by one creditor, under summary process, of a portion of the assets, diminishes to that extent the general fund out of which the debts are to be paid. It says: "And it is immaterial whether the attempt of the petitioners by their attachment proceedings to secure a preference for themselves results in ultimate success or failure. By success they will have appropriated to themselves assets which should have been administered for the equal benefit of all the creditors, and a failure does not restore property which has been sold, and the value of which it may require a considerable outlay of expense and costs on the part of the estate to recover from the petitioners." The court also said that the presumption of the assent of the creditor to the assignment was not conclusive.

In Vernon v. Morton, 8 Dana, 247, supra, bills were filed by certain creditors to set aside a deed of trust which was limited to the benefit of such creditors as should come in and assent to its provisions. The court, after holding that the deed was valid, said that if there were any probability that the proceeds of the effects would more than pay the assenting creditors and other liens upon them, it would direct the case to be retaken to ascertain the surplus and grant relief to that extent under the general prayer; but, as it was evident that there would be no surplus, the bills were dismissed.

In Valentine v. Decker, 43 Mo. 583, supra, a creditor attached property in possession of an assignee under an assignment for creditors, and the attached property was sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt. The creditor, however, had given an indemnifying bond to the sheriff, and the assignee had brought suit on that bond which was pending at the time of the decision in this case (which was rendered on appeal from a decision below approving the rejection by the assignee of the claim filed by the creditor). It thus appears that the creditor's attack on the assignment had not been determined at the time he filed his claim, but the opinion is broad enough to exclude his right to file the claim, even if his attack had been finally determined adversely to him. The court says: "If they [the attaching creditors] succeed in their proceeding, they swallow up and appropriate the assets; but if they fail, can they be permitted, after having sacrificed the goods, perhaps at a forced sale, and accumulated costs by their litigation, to come in on an

On January 29, 1900, Mr. Cupit's judgment aggregated $10,266.55, and on that day the land was sold on execution for $4,500, which sum was credited upon the judgment, leaving unpaid thereon $5,766.55, with interest. The petitioner in this proceeding claims that this sum should be paid him by the receiver out of the $7,052.47 so claimed to be in his hands.

The general creditors, with the exception of Cupit, have all assented to the assignment, and have received from the funds of the bank their respective dividends, amounting to 25 per cent of their respective claims; but Cupit, the petitioner, refused to receive any of said dividends, and has denied the validity of the assignment, and the right of the receiver to the title or possession of the property, claiming that the as-equality with the other creditors for a pro rata share? The very proposition is monstrous, and its bare statement carries with it a sufficient refutation."

In Fellows v. Greenleaf, 43 N. H. 421, supra, the court said that the assent of a creditor to an assignment for creditors is ordinarily presumed in the first instance, but that the presumption is not conclusive, and if a creditor dissents, sues the debtor, and summons in the assignee, he will only take the surplus in the hands of the assignee after all the other creditors who do not dissent are paid.

Furman v. Fisher, 4 Coldw. 626, 94 Am. Dec. 210, supra, held that creditors, named in a deed of trust for the benefit of certain creditors, who attach the property conveyed by the deed, thereby reject its provisions, and are entitled to nothing under it. The attachments in this case proved ultimately unsuccessful, the deed of trust being upheld.

In Farquharson v. McDonald, 2 Helsk. 404, supra, certain creditors filed bills of attachment attacking a deed of trust for creditors, and praying that it be set aside. The trustee filed a cross bill in which he insisted that if the deed should be declared valid the attaching creditors had forfeited all right to claim benefits under it by attacking its validity. The validity of the deed was upheld, and the court, apparently in approval of the prayer of the cross bill, said that all beneficiaries under a trust deed are presumed to accept its benefits, but they may repudiate and reject it, and that any distinct and unequivocal act of renunciation by any of the creditors intended to be benefited will operate as an estoppel against further claims under the deed.

In Ewing v. Cook, 85 Tenn. 332, 3 S. W. 507, supra, a creditor brought a bill to have his debtor's right of redemption in property sold under execution sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debt. Pending the bill the debtor made an assignment for creditors which secured the debt in question so far as the "debt has a priority or is a lien on said property, by reason of levy, sale, or otherwise, but no further." The court held that a bill in equity would not lie to subject such an equity to the payment of a debt, and that the debt was not a lien on the land at the time of the assignment, and therefore was not secured by the assignment; but expressed the opinion that the same result would have been reached, even if the debt had been a lien, since the creditor had not accepted the assignment, but had resisted it in every way possible, and ought not to be permitted to claim under it.

In O'Bryan Bros. v. Glenn Bros. 91 Tenn. 107, 17 S. W. 1030, supra, the court held that assignment was fraudulent, and was made for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the bank, and was invalid, illegal, and inequitable. In his petition in intervention the petitioner alleged that said assignment was fraudulent and void as to the petitioner, and that he, the said Thomas Cupit, had never assented or in any way participated in said assignment, or the benefits thereof, and prayed that said assignment be declared fraudulent and void as to the petitioner and all other creditors joining with him in this request, and that the property levied upon by virtue of said execution against the bank be discharged from such receivership. This court held, on appeal of said cause, that neither the assignee nor receiver acquired any title to the property in controversy, and that it was subject to petitioner's attachment lien. The petition in intervention in this cause was denied by the lower court, and petitioner, Cupit, appeals to this court.

Messrs. Richards & Varian, with Mr. W. I. Snyder, for appellant:

The title to this property never passed to or vested in the assignee or the receiver.

Cupit v. Park City Bank, 20 Utah, 292, 58 Pac. 839; Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 236, 34 L. ed. 346, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1013; Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 408, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019.

When the receiver took possession he found the property charged with the attachment lien, and it was manifestly his duty to hold and preserve the property for creditors, intended to be benefited by a deed of trust for the benefit of certain creditors, elected to renounce and repudiate the benefits of the deed and could not thereafter claim thereunder, where they filed an attachment bill to have the deed declared fraudulent and void, with a full knowledge of the facts, though under a mistaken view of the law, induced by the advice of their attorney that the deed of trust was invalid, notwithstanding that the bill was dismissed before any loss or injury had occurred in consequence of filing the same. The court in this case stated the general proposition that any distinct and unequivocal act of renunciation of the benefits of a deed of trust by any of the creditors intended to be benefited will operate against any further claims under the deed.

In White v. Stersing, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 553, 32 S. W. 909, supra, a creditor named in a deed of trust for the benefit of certain creditors attached property in the hands of the trustee. The latter brought an action of trover against him, and the creditor sought to reduce the damages by having credited upon the same the share to which he would have been entitled under the deed. The court rejected the contention upon the ground that, by attaching the property, he had waived his right to take under the deed.

The official report of Jones v. Burgess, 115 Ala. 700, does not embody the opinion, but the opinion is reported in 19 So. 851. It was there held that a creditor who, after an assignment for creditors, sued out an attachment, and had it levied upon property included in the assignment, but, before the meeting of the court to which the attachment was returnable, released and discharged his levy, which release and discharge were carried into effect by the court, did not do enough to determine his election not to take under the assignment. The voluntary character of the discharge is pointed out, and it is intimated that the result might have been different if the attachment had been prosecuted, though unsuccessfully. The court said: "It will not be denied, the general assignment having been voluntarily made for the benefit of creditors, that appellants, as creditors of the assignor, had the right of election to accept its provisions, or to assert their rights independently of the assignment; that, being free to accept or reject the assignment, they could not at one and the same time claim and repudiate its benefits. The extent of this principle, as declared in our adjudged cases, is, not that a creditor may not question the validity of a conveyance at any time without being forever thereafter estopped from acknowledging its validity, and claiming a benefit under it; but it is, as the expressions run, 'he cannot claim under it and against it,' 54 L. R. A.

he cannot elect to accept the rights and benefits it confers, and at the same time have its uses set aside, and the property appropriated to other and different uses; 'it is not permissible to take both under and against an assignment made for the benefit of creditors.'"

In Wright v. Zeigler Bros. 70 Ga. 501, the court said: "A creditor cannot be permitted both to assail and claim under an assignment: one or the other of these alternatives he must take. His election should be made before he commences his proceedings, and he should not be permitted to wait the result of his suit in order to make his election." This was an action of trover against the assignee in his individual capacity by one who had sold goods to the assignor, the seller having attempted to rescind the sale for fraud. The point arose by reason of the refusal of the plaintiff to answer a cross-interrogatory as to whether, if he failed to recover in the action, he would still claim to be a creditor of the assignor to the amount of the sale. The court held that the refusal was immaterial, apparently upon the ground that the plaintiff had made his election by bringing the action, and, as a matter of law, could not thereafter claim under the assignment. It is doubtful, however, whether this case is authority for anything more than the proposition that if a creditor, under such circumstances, elects to rescind the sale and bring an action of trover, and fails in such action, he cannot thereafter base a claim against the assignee on the theory of a sale. If this is the extent of the decision, the case, for the reasons pointed out in subdivision I., is not an authority for the position that the commencement of the action of trover under such circumstances is a repudiation of the assignment precluding the creditor from claiming thereunder.

Even in those jurisdictions which maintain the doctrine that an attack by a creditor upon the assignment or deed of trust, though unsuccessful, is an election of remedies which precludes him from thereafter claiming under the assignment or deed of trust, such doctrine is undoubtedly subject to the same qualification as the general doctrine of election, i. e., the creditor must act with a full knowledge of the facts. Thus, in Sexton v. Anderson, 95 Mo. 373, 8 S. W. 564, the court, while holding that one who attached property included in a bill of sale to a third person, and attached that sale as fraudulent, could not obtain relief in the attachment suit upon the ground that, by virtue of an extrinsic agreement of which he had no knowledge when he commenced his attachment action, the bill of sale was converted in a voluntary assignment for creditors, said that his ignorance of the benefit of those who should eventually be adjudged to be entitled to subject it to their claims; either Cupit on the one hand, or the creditors on the other.

Money received by a trustee upon a policy that agreement might be a very good reason why he should not be precluded from proving up his demands in a proper proceeding.

A creditor who, under a bona fide belief that certain property in the hands of an assignee for creditors belonged to a firm of which the assignor was a member, attaches the same as property of the firm, does not lose his right to a distributive share in the assigned estate, although it is finally adjudged that the property belonged to the assignor individually, and therefore passed to the assignee. The decision is upon the ground that the election, to be binding, must be made with a full knowledge of the facts, and that in this case the creditor did not have a full knowledge of the facts. Anderson v. Risdon-Cahn Co. 13 Wash. 494, 43 Pac. 337.

So, also, Tennant v. Stoney, 1 Rich. Eq. 224, 44 Am. Dec. 213, held that a simple contract creditor, secured by a bond and indenture for the benefit of certain creditors containing a provision that they should be void if the debtor paid the debts secured within a specified time, did not waive his right to take thereunder by bringing an action on his claim before the expiration of the time mentioned. The decision was upon two grounds, one that the bringing of the suit was no infringement of the terms of the bond and indenture, and the other, that it was brought in ignorance of their execution, and was abandoned as soon as the creditor learned thereof. See also Re Woodward, 67 How. Pr. 359, supra, I.

Haliday Bros. v. Croom, 9 Lea, 349, limits the rule that a creditor who attacks a deed of trust for creditors must stand by his election, and, if he fail, can take nothing under the deed, to cases where the entire deed is impeached, and denies its application to a creditor who merely attacks a preferred claim secured by the deed.

So, also, Cowan v. Gill, 11 Lea, 675, holds that a creditor who unsuccessfully seeks to set aside, as fraudulent, a prior deed of trust recognized by an assignment for creditors is not thereby precluded from claiming under the assignment.

In McKindley v. Nourse, 67 Iowa, 118, a seller of goods rescinded the sale after an assignment for creditors by the purchaser, and replevied the goods from the assignee. Pending the action, the plaintiff therein filed a claim with the assignee, giving credit therein for the goods taken in the replevin action, and received his pro rata share on the claim. Subsequently the replevin action was determined against him, and he then, but after the expiration of the time allowed for filing claims, filed a claim for the amount for which he had given credit when his 54 L. R. A.

first claim was filed, i. e., the value of the goods which in accordance with the judgment in the replevin action he had paid to the assignee. The court held that he was not entitled to the allowance of the last claim; but this decision was upon the ground that it was not filed in time.

So, also, in Lovenberg v. National Bank, 67 Tex. 440, 2 S. W. 874, 5 S. W. 816, it was held that a creditor who took property from the possession of the assignee by virtue of a chattel mortgage, which was subsequently held invalid as in contravention of the assignment law, had lost the benefit of the assignment because he had delayed too long in filing his claim, the court holding that the pendency of the action in which the chattel mortgage was finally adjudged invalid was not a sufficient excuse for the delay. Any implication that there may be in this decision that the creditor in question might have taken under the assignment if he had filed his claim in time, notwithstanding his claim under the mortgage, may, doubtless, be reconciled with the doctrine that a creditor, by attacking the assignment, even if unsuccessfully, thereby waives his right to take under it, upon the ground that the assertion of the chattel mortgage was not inconsistent with, and did not involve a repudiation of, the assignment.

A number of courts, however, have held that where a creditor's attack on the assignment has been unsuccessful, and has been finally determined against him, he is not thereafter precluded from claiming under the assignment. It is so held in Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 33 L. ed. 696, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354. This doctrine is also supported by the following cases, which will be hereafter cited at greater length: New England Bank v. Lewis, 8 Pick. 113; Re Van Norman, 41 Minn. 494, 43 N. W. 334; Jewett v. Woodward, 1 Edw. Ch. 195; Mills v. Parkhurst, 126 N. Y. 89, 13 L. R. A. 472, 26 N. E. 1041; Sternfeld v. Simonson, 44 Hun, 429; Clark v. Ward, 12 Gratt. 440.

In New England Bank v. Lewis, 8 Pick. 113, supra, a creditor who was given a preference by a deed of trust for creditors thereafter continued an attachment action that was pending against the debtor at the time of the execution of the deed of trust, until a judgment was rendered against him. It was held that the creditor by so doing did not waive his right to take under the deed. As already shown in subdivision I., the court in this case intimated that if the attachment had been successful the creditor could not have claimed under the assignment.

In Re Van Norman, 41 Minn. 494, 43 N. W. 334, a creditor, after an assignment for credit-covering the trust property is the property of the cestuis que trust.

McLaughlin's possession all this time was subject to the lien of Cupit. Therefore it was quasi-wrongful to that extent as ors, pursued in the Federal court an attachment that was levied the day of the assignment but was apparently subordinate to the assignment if the latter was valid, and successfully resisted a motion by the assignee in the Federal court to dissolve the attachment. He recovered a judgment, and caused the attached property to be sold on execution, but subsequently paid the assignee the value of the property because of a judgment recovered by the assignee in the state court in an action against the marshal who levied the attachment. It was held that the creditor had not lost his right to take under the assignment. This decision was the logical result of the view taken by the court of the doctrine of election. The court said in that connection: "A mere attempt to pursue a remedy or claim a right to which a party is not entitled, and without obtaining any legal satisfaction therefrom, will not deprive him [the attaching creditor] of the benefit of that which he had originally a right to resort to or claim."

In Jewett v. Woodward, 1 Edw. Ch. 195, supra, it was held that a creditor did not, by commencing proceedings against an assignee as an absent debtor and giving the assignee notice, lose his right to come in under the assignment where the proceedings proved unavailing or were abandoned. The court said: "The doctrine of election does not apply to a case like the present; where the question is merely as to the remedy or mode of proceeding. If one remedy fails, the party may oftentimes resort to another. Nothing is more common than to leave a party to his bill in equity after a fruitless attempt at law, and vice versa."

In Mills v. Parkhurst, 128 N. Y. 89, 13 L. R. A. 472, 26 N. E. 1041, supra, the court held that the pendency of an appeal by a creditor from a decree sustaining an assignment in an action brought by him to set it aside as fraudulent did not prevent him from coming in and sharing in the distribution under the assignment. In this case it was urged that the creditor, by bringing his suit to set aside the assignment, was precluded, under the doctrine of election, from taking under it; but the court of appeals held that the doctrine of election did not apply, saying: "The basis for the application of the doctrine is in the proposition that where there is, by law or by contract, a choice between two remedies which proceed upon opposite and irreconcilable claims of right, the one taken must exclude and bar the prosecution of the other. . . . So, it is conceivable that the rule may be so extended as to apply to the case where a creditor comes in under an assignment by his debtor for the benefit of creditors, in such way and with such attitude as 54 L. R. A.

should preclude him from thereafter assailing its validity." The court also points out that an assignment for creditors is involuntary as to creditors, and does not depend for its validity upon their assent. Again, the court says: "If there is any election for him [the creditor] to make it can only be with respect to what remedies may be available to him in order to right himself upon his judgment against the assignor, and to avoid the assignment."

In Sternfeld v. Simonson, 44 Hun, 429, supra, it was held that the commencement of an action by the creditor upon his claim against the assignor for creditors, in which an attachment was issued, but not levied, did not prevent him from claiming under the assignment, although the action proceeded to judgment in favor of the creditor, the execution and attachment being returned nulla bona. The court takes the same view of the doctrine of the election as Re Van Norman, 41 Minn. 494, 43 N. W. 334, supra. It said that if the creditor by means of the attachment had secured any of the property covered by the assignment a different question might be presented, and distinguishes Iselin v. Henlein, 16 Abb. N. C. 73, supra, 1, upon the ground that that case proceeds expressly upon the ground that the attacking creditor had seized and obtained possession of the assignee's estate under his attachment.

That a creditor secured by a deed of trust for specified creditors sues out an attachment and attacks the deed of trust as invalid does not, if he fails on such attack, preclude him from demanding and receiving of the trustees his ratable portion of the proceeds of the property in their hands in accordance with the provisions of the deed. Clark v. Ward, 12 Gratt. 440, supra.

Re Hobson, 81 Iowa, 392, 11 L. R. A. 255, 46 N. W. 1095, held that the holder of a note was not estopped to claim under an assignment by its maker for the benefit of creditors by the fact that, being compelled either to permit the sureties to bring suit or to release them, he permitted them to bring an attachment in his name and attack the validity of the assignment, where the attachment suit has been dismissed. The decision in this case, however, was based, in part at least, upon the fact that the permission granted by the holder of the note to the sureties to bring the suit in his name was involuntary.

A creditor does not waive his rights under an assignment for creditors by bringing an action, which has been dismissed, on a note secured by the assignment. Clark v. Gibboney, 8 Hughes, 391, Fed. Cas. No. 2,821. In this case, however, the court held that the remedies were against him, excepting in so far as Cupit sees fit to ratify his action; and to that extent, and pro hac vice, Cupit is a superior cestui que trust for the amount of his claim.

This property, in the form of money, is still in the hands of the receiver, a dividend not having been paid since the fire. It is not dissipated, and may be traced and appropriated to Cupit's superior claim.

The rule of equity in such cases is that the proceeds go to the one who suffered the loss, and in the order the property would have gone, regardless of who effected the insurance.

Williams v. Lilley, 67 Conn. 50, 37 L. R. A. 150, 34 Atl. 765; Gilbert v. Port, 28 Ohio St. 276; Pennefeather v. Baltimore Steam Packet Co. 58 Fed. 481; Home Ins. Co. v. Baltimore Warehouse Co. 93 U. S. 527, 23 L. ed. 868.

Suppose a fire had occurred during the lifetime of the policy in force when the assignment was made. Since the insurance money merely represents the property, there would be no question but that Cupit would get it.

This being so, the same rule must necesconcurrent, and were not inconsistent, and therefore the doctrine of election would not apply in any view.

In Coverdale v. Wilder, 17 Pick. 178, a deputy sheriff had levied an attachment upon certain property. The debtor subsequently made an assignment for creditors, which provided that the assignee should first pay all claims or encumbrances that such deputy sheriff might have upon the property. The latter became a party to the assignment, but the attachment action proceeded and, upon the death of the assignor, was continued against his administrators, and finally resulted in a judgment in the plaintiff's favor. Execution, however, was staid upon a suggestion of the insolvency of the estate. It was held that the continuance of the attachment action did not amount to a waiver of the right to take under the assignment. The decision, however, was upon the ground that the intention of the assignor as expressed in the assignment was not merely that the lien of the attachment should be discharged, but that the debt should be paid.

In Eppright v. Kaufman, 90 Mo. 25, it was held that where a claim of a creditor has been submitted to the assignee and allowed by the latter, thus passing in rem judicatum, the creditor's right to a dividend cannot be affected by the fact that he subsequently recovers a judgment against the assignor, and attempts by legal procedure to have the judgment satisfied out of what, at that time, were not considered as passing as assets into the hands of the assignee, though it was afterwards held that they did pass to him.

In Golden's Appeal, 110 Pa. 581, 1 Atl. 660, it was held that the fact that after an unauthorized and invalid reassignment by an assignee to an assignor for creditors, a creditor procured the issuance of an attachment execution against a debtor of the assignor, did not amount to a waiver of such creditor's right to insist upon the enforcement of the assignment. The court said that the issuance of the attachment execution was doubtless prompted by the unauthorized reconveyance of the trust property, and was resorted to for the purpose of acquiring a lien on the fund in case the reassignment should be adjudged effective for the purpose of reinvesting the assignor with the title to the property.

It is apparent from the cases cited in this division that the determination of the question whether an unsuccessful attack on the assignment that has been finally determined will preclude the creditor from claiming thereunder, assuming that the creditor acted with a full knowledge of the facts, depends upon the view that the court takes of the general doctrine with respect to the election between inconsistent remedies. If the mere commencement of an action attacking the assignment, though unfounded in fact or law, be deemed the election of a remedy, such remedy is inconsistent with a claim under the assignment, and under the general doctrine of election must be held to exclude such a claim. If, however, the view expressed in Re Van Norman, 41 Minn. 494, 43 N. W. 334, supra, is correct, a mere attack upon the assignment which proves unsuccessful does not constitute an election of remedies, because in such a case what is supposed to be a remedy is in fact no remedy at all, and therefore, though the position of the creditor in attacking the assignment is inconsistent with a claim under it, yet the doctrine of election does not apply because there has been in fact no choice between remedies.

III. When creditor's attack on assignment or deed of trust is still pending and undetermined.

It is obvious that in those jurisdictions, in which it is held that an attack on the assignment, even if it has been determined adversely to the creditor, precludes him from thereafter claiming under the assignment, the pendency of an attack not yet determined will, a fortiori, preclude him.

It is held in Lehman v. Meyer, 67 Ala. 396, that a bill filed by certain creditors for their own benefit cannot be properly framed in a double aspect, so as to have a conveyance executed by the debtor declared in one alternative fraudulent and void, and in the other alternative, to have the same sustained as a general assignment inuring equally to the benefit of all creditors. The decision is upon the ground that the two reliefs sought are inconsistent, and a contrary decision in Crawford v. Kirksey, 50 Ala. 590, is overruled. The doctrine of Lehman v. Meyer, 67 Ala. 396, was approved in Moog v. Talcott, 72 Ala. 210, and applied to the case of a general creditor's bill, the court sarily apply when a mere trustee, an officer of the court, for the court, and as the act of the court, procures the policy.

As between vendor and vendee under an executory contract of purchase, the interest of the vendee relates to the date of the contract, and upon the exercise of his right to purchase, any insurance money received for damage or loss to the property, by equitable conversion represents the property itself.

The primary purpose of insurance money is to rebuild the property.

Williams v. Lilley, 67 Conn. 50, 37 L. R. A. 150, 34 Atl. 765.

Since as between vendor and vendee the insurance money represents the property itself, and goes to the one entitled thereto, the same rule must apply as between a receiver and a creditor whom he in his trust capacity represents, and who has during all the receivership a superior lien on the corpus of the property, which equity follows into the insurance money.

The loss therefore inures to the benefit of those creditors who would take the property, and in the order that they would take it.

holding that the principle is the same whether the suit is by a general creditor's bill or a bill filed by one or more creditors for their own benefit.

In Leinikauff v. Forchheimer, 87 Ala. 258, 6 So. 149, it was held that a creditor who attacks a sale of property by his debtor to a third person and attaches the property cannot, at least while prosecuting such remedy, claim under the agreement of the purchaser to pay, out of the purchase price, certain specified sums to certain creditors including the creditor in question. See also Valentine v. Decker, 43 Mo. 583, supra, II.

A seller who, after an assignment for creditors by the buyer, rescinds the sale and repleves the goods from the assignee cannot, while action is still pending, have a claim as for goods sold and delivered against the assigned estate. Hargadine-McKittrick Dry Goods Co. v. Warden, 151 Mo. 578, 52 S. W. 593.

In Ke Wilcox, 1 Am. Bankr. Rep. 544, the referee in bankruptcy for the district of Tennessee held that the pendency of a replevin action by the seller of goods against the assignor and the assignee in an assignment for creditors, in which goods of a certain value have been repleved, does not deprive the seller of the right to a pro rata share under the assignment upon the amount of his entire claim, less the value of the goods repleved. The decision rests upon the ground that the replevin action was not an attack upon the assignment, and did not seek to withdraw from the hands of the assignee any property which was confessedly an asset of the assignor. The Tennessee cases cited in subdivision II. are distinguished upon the ground that in those cases the attitude assumed by the creditors who were held to be precluded from taking under the assignment was necessarily hostile to and involved a repudiation of the assignment. In this case the claim exceeded the demand of the complaint in the replevin suit. With respect to this excess, as is pointed out in the opinion, there could be no pretense for denying the right of the creditor to a pro rata share, unless upon the principle that any claim, no matter of what nature, is forfeited by the bringing of the replevin suit. With respect to so much of the claim as was covered by the demand in the replevin suit, it would seem that the distinction pointed out in subdivision I. 54 L. R. A.

might apply, and that, as to this part of the claim, the decision that the creditor had not waived the benefits of the assignment would not necessarily be conclusive, unless the claim filed with the assignee was based on a conversion of the goods. If the claim were for part of the purchase price based on the theory of a valid sale, another question would be presented, which would not be materially affected by the assignment, namely, whether the seller, having elected to rescind and replevin the goods, could take the inconsistent position that there was a valid sale, and file a claim for the purchase price.

An assignee, under an assignment for creditors who shall accept their proportionate share of the assigned estate and discharge the debtors, properly refuses to act upon an acceptance by a creditor which, in effect, reserves the right to maintain garnishment proceedings for a debt due the assignor instituted after the assignment; and if the creditor does not give an unconditional acceptance he is precluded from sharing in the trust estate. Moody v. Templeman, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 874, 56 S. W. 588.

While, as already pointed out, the position that a creditor, even by an unsuccessful attack on the assignment, is precluded from claiming thereunder, necessarily involves a denial of the right to claim under the assignment pending an attack thereon, the contrary position that an unsuccessful attack does not preclude the creditor leaves that question open, and different views may be taken of it by courts which hold in general that an unsuccessful attack will not preclude the creditor. Thus, the general term of the supreme court in Mills v. Parkhurst, 30 N. Y. S. R. 138, 9 N. Y. Supp. 109, while conceding that if the attack on the assignment in that case had terminated it would not be held to have constituted an election precluding the creditor from claiming under the assignment, yet held that the creditor could not claim under the assignment pending an appeal from a decree adverse to him and sustaining the assignment. The court of appeals, however, in the same case (126 N. Y. 89, 13 L. R. A. 472, 28 N. E. 1041) held that the pendency of the appeal did not preclude the creditor.

Messrs. Brown & Henderson, for respondent:

At the inception of the assignment the intervener was one of the class for whose benefit it was made, and if he had accepted it he could have claimed under it; but he has repudiated it, and has not only contested it, but has obtained a decree of the courts that as to him it is void, and therefore he can claim no rights under it.

McLaughlin, the receiver, owning the fee in the land subject only to such claim as the intervener had under his inchoate lien by attachment and execution, was entitled to the possession of the property, subject thereto, until the lien ripened into a title.

He was entitled to use it, and entitled to the rents, issues, and profits thereof. It must be remembered that the building was consumed by fire, and that the receiver received the money in dispute long before there was any sale under the execution, the sale only having occurred the day before this hearing. The execution or attachment creditor had also an insurable interest.

There was no obligation whatever on the part of either to insure for the benefit of the other.

An attachment creditor has an insurable interest which he can insure for his own protection.

The owner of the equity of redemption also has an insurable interest to the full value of the property, notwithstanding it may be encumbered by a mortgage or other liens.

Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044.

The insurance is a personal contract between each insured and the insurers, and unless there is some contract between the debtors and creditors to the contrary, they each hold their insurance in their own right.

Miner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By his petition, Thomas Cupit seeks to obtain the proceeds of the fire insurance policies, amounting to $5,000, in the hands of the receiver of the Park City Bank, and received by him at a time when Cupit, by virtue of his attachment levy, had a lien upon the property upon which the buildings were burned; and claims that McLaughlin, the receiver, was a trustee, and a representative of a court of equity, and, whether he was Cupit's trustee for any other purpose than merely to see that this insurance money should go in satisfaction of the debt which the property it represented would have paid, and to see justice done, he was certainly Cupit's trustee for that purpose, and should be held liable for the insurance money; that, as the court had possession of the property through its receiver, whose title is fraudulent as to Cupit, equity will convert him into a trustee, to prevent fraud, and to restore the insurance money to the lienors; that because Cupit had rights under the attachment as a creditor of the bank, and because the insurance was upon the property he had attached, although his equity of redemption had not expired, he was still entitled to the insurance money, although he paid nothing towards the premiums, and refused to recognize the rights of the receiver in the premises. We cannot concede such asserted rights upon the part of Mr. Cupit, the intervener. At the inception of the assignment Mr. Cupit was one of a class of creditors who were entitled to its benefits, and, had he accepted it, and claimed under it, he would have been entitled to the rights of a general creditor. So, also, after the attachment proceedings against the property of the debtor, if they had proved unavailing, or when they were abandoned, a creditor may, under certain circumstances, still assent, and take under the assignment. But the petitioner did not accept or claim under the assignment; on the contrary, he rejected the assignment, and has continually refused to claim under it, and has obtained a decree of court, which, as to him, rendered the assignment void.

The right of a creditor to share in the benefits of an assignment is based in part upon his assent. This is one of the conditions upon which he takes under an assignment, and this assent is presumed, unless his repudiation is made known. While a creditor is under no obligation to accept the provisions of an assignment made for his benefit, yet he cannot hold an assignment good in part and bad in part. If he ratifies it at all, he must stand by it. He cannot accept that part which is beneficial to him, and repudiate the balance of it. Nor can he receive the benefits of the assignment while he is in actual hostility to it, claiming in the courts that it is fraudulent and void, and refusing to accept its benefits. He cannot claim benefits under it, and at the same time attack it for fraud, and utterly destroy its validity as to him. Burrill, Assignm. §§ 476-479; Jefferis's Appeal, 33 Pa. 39; Valentine v. Decker, 43 Mo. 583; Beifeld v. Martin, 4 Colo. App. 578, 37 Pac. 32; Adler-Goldman Commission Co. v. People's Bank, 65 Ark. 280, 46 S. W. 530; O'Bryan Bros. v. Glenn Bros. 91 Tenn. 107, 17 S. W. 1030. If a creditor accepts the benefits of an assignment knowing the facts, he cannot, ordinarily, impeach or repudiate it thereafter, on the ground that it is illegal and fraudulent. So, having repudiated it altogether, he cannot take under its provisions as other creditors would do who have accepted it. The reason of this rule is that he is not entitled to two inconsistent, adverse, or conflicting rights. One is necessarily a denial of the other. Burrill, Assignm. 6th ed. 441; Adler-Goldman Commission Co. v. People's Bank, 65 Ark. 380, 46 S. W. 530.

Because of the continued, open, and hostile acts of the petitioner towards the assignment, and his continued refusal to accept its terms, he is not in a position to claim benefits under it, as other creditors who have assented to it are entitled to.

But Mr. Cupit still claims that he is entitled to the $5,000 insurance obtained by the receiver on a policy of insurance procured by said receiver when he held an attachment lien upon the property. The property in question was assigned by the bank. The receiver had possession of it, and received the rents, and repaired it as receiver. As to the creditors of the bank who had accepted the assignment, the receiver had title, and was entitled to take charge of the property, and hold it until such time as Mr. Cupit's attachment lien would ripen into title by sale thereunder, and until the time for redemption from the sale should expire. The receiver had the same right to the property that the bank would have had had no assignment been made. As such receiver, he had the right to insure the property for the benefit of the creditors of the bank, and to pay the premiums from any assets in his hands. He had an insurable interest in the property, and was entitled to use it, receive rents from it, repair it, and preserve it from loss, the same as any other owner would have; and this right would continue until the title was lost by sale on the execution and the time for redemption had expired. So Mr. Cupit, as attaching or execution creditor, and owner of an equity of redemption, had an insurable interest in the property. 1 May, Ins. § 83; International Trust Co. v. Boardman, 149 Mass. 158, 21 N. E. 239; Royal Ins. Co. v. Stinson, 103 U. S. 25, 26 L. ed. 473; Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044. The receiver and the attaching creditor had an insurable interest, and could insure the property for their own benefit. Under such circumstances the insurance would be a personal contract between the insurance company and each party insuring; and, unless there be some contract or trust relation between the insured parties to the contrary, each would hold the money derived by loss of the property by fire in their individual or official right. In such cases the contract is personal, and does not run with the title to the property. As held in Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044, the insurance is a mere special agreement with a party seeking to insure himself against apprehended loss on account of his interest in a particular subject-matter, and not at all incidental to and transferable with the subject-matter, and in case of loss satisfaction must be to the person insured. 2 May, Ins. § 6; International Trust Co. v. Boardman, 149 Mass. 158, 21 N. E. 239; Plimpton v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 43 Vt. 497, 5 Am. Rep. 297; King v. State Mut. F. Ins. Co. 7 Cush. 1; McDonald v. Black, 20 Ohio, 185, 55 Am. Dec. 448; Charles v. Clayton, 87 Tenn. 308, 3 L. R. A. 170, 10 S. W. 505. There are many cases holding that, as between a vendor and vendee, the insurance money, in case of a distribution of the property, represents the property itself, because of some express or implied contract relation existing between the parties. Many cases so hold because of a contract, express or implied, existing between the parties. In this case no such relation is shown or exists. See Grange Mill Co. v. Western Assur. Co. 118 Ill. 396, 9 N. E. 274. Had the petitioner insured the property in his own right to cover his interest therein, it could not be claimed that the receiver would have any right therein. So, where the receiver insured it, and paid the premiums out of funds in his hands belonging to the estate, the insurance became a personal indemnity to the receiver for the benefit of the creditors of the estate he represented. Mr. Cupit is not one of the creditors who had acquiesced in the assignment. He had never consented to the assignment in any manner, and has continually opposed it on all occasions, and still continues to do so. He is not now asking to come in as a common creditor, and receive his just proportion of the estate, including the insurance money, in accordance with the provisions of the assignment; but he now demands at the hands of the court the entire fund received under the policy of insurance, while refusing to acquiesce in the assignment, and while still holding the proceeds of the sale of the real estate under his execution. The property of the bank was, in effect, conveyed in trust for such creditors of the bank as should come in and accept the provisions of the assignment. The assignee and receiver no doubt held the property in trust for such creditors, and this trust relation could not exist between the receiver and a creditor who wholly repudiates the assignment as well as the trust relation. There was no contract relation between the receiver and Mr. Cupit. The real estate in controversy was rightfully held by the receiver with the right to the use, rents, and profits thereof for the benefit of the estate until Cupit should acquire title by a sale on his execution. He held an equity of redemption, and had and would have the same rights as the bank would have had no assignment been made. An execution creditor is not entitled to possession and rents of the property levied upon before sale, and before the time for redemption has expired.

The case of Cupit v. Park City Bank, 20 Utah, 292, 58 Pac. 839, is not in conflict with this position. In that case it was no doubt the intention of the court to hold that the receiver acquired no title to the property that conflicted with the right of Cupit under his attachment lien, and it did not intend to hold that Mr. Cupit would have the right to the title of the property, and the possession thereof, before sale upon his execution. Under such circumstances Cupit had no right to charge the receiver with the rents and use of the premises, which at most would about cover the expense of operating and keeping the building, etc., in repair; nor has he any right to recover the insurance money claimed in this case. As said in Collumb v. Read, 24 N. Y. 515: "If the plaintiff and the other creditors had affirmed the assignment, the trustee would have been compelled to account for these rents according to its provisions; but the plaintiff, claiming in hostility to it, must treat the trustee as a stranger, whose only fault has been in suffering himself to be made an instrument by means of which the debtor has been enabled to apply the rents towards the payment of other creditors." The receiver was not a trustee for Mr. Cupit in the sense that it was his duty to see that the money collected on these insurance policies should be held for the benefit and be paid over to Mr. Cupit to satisfy the execution which the property might have paid if the building had not been consumed by fire. After careful consideration of the very able arguments and briefs of counsel, we can arrive at no other conclusion than as before expressed.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed, with costs.

Baskin, J., and McCarty, District Judge, concur.

v.

John BLAZZARD et al., Respts.

(.....Utah.....)

- *1. A guardian has no power to make a contract binding upon the ward or upon his estate, however beneficial to the ward the contract may be; and such contracts made by him impose a personal liability upon himself, and his protection from loss lies in his right to charge the expenditures to the ward's estate in his account.
2. Neither guardians nor the courts having jurisdiction over the estates of incompetent persons have power to bind the person or estate of such persons unless expressly authorized to do so by law.
3. Under the provisions of § 4007, Rev. Stat. 1898, a guardian may only mortgage the real estate of his ward when necessary to provide for the suitable maintenance of the ward and his family.
4. Section 4008, Rev. Stat. 1898, makes it the duty of the guardian to pay all just debts of the ward out of his personal estate and the income of his real estate, if sufficient; if not, then out of his real estate; and § 4015 provides that, when a sale of the property of the ward is necessary to pay the debts and expenses of guardianship, the guardian may sell, upon the order of the court, the ward's real estate for that purpose.
5. Sections 4013, 4014, Rev. Stat. 1898, provide for the expenses and compensation of the guardian, and for allowance of such items in his account.
6. Nowhere in the statutes is there a provision allowing the guardian to mortgage the real property of his ward for the purpose of paying debts, and the guardian who so acts binds himself, and not the ward.

7. When the facts are within the knowledge of both parties to a written contract, and the language used is such as they intended, a mistake as to the legal effect of the contract or that its legal effect is different from that intended, is not available as a defense at law, and is not ground for a reformation of the contract in a court of equity, and cannot be shown by parol.

8. Inasmuch as the terms of the note in question were such as the parties intended to use, and their legal effect was to bind the guardian personally, parol evidence showing a different understanding was inadmissible.

9. An order of a probate court, made without authority of the statute, is void.

10. Inasmuch as parol evidence is not admissible to defeat the legal effect of a written contract the terms of which are such as the parties intended to use, such evidence, if the beneficiaries of the note in question had brought suit thereon, would not have been admissible over their objection, and is therefore not admissible in a suit by any subsequent owner and holder thereof for value.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. J. Dimiany, for appellant:

When an administrator undertakes to bind the estate, and fails to do so for want of authority, he binds himself personally, and may be sued upon his contract individually; and in such case it avails him nothing that he intended only to bind himself in his representative capacity.

McCalley v. Wilburn, 77 Ala. 549; White-side v. Jennings, 19 Ala. 784.

Neither a guardian nor a trustee can bind anyone but himself by a note signed by himself as guardian or trustee for another, unless he provides in the note that it is payable out of the estate which he represents. He is not an agent, and the rule of law as to agents does not apply.

Messrs. Bennett, Harkness, Howat, Sutherland, & Van Cott, for respondents:

The note on its face is the note of John Blazzard. It does not purport to bind the defendant Hurd; it contains no words of personal obligation on the part of the defendant Hurd. An agent or trustee cannot be held upon a contract which he assumes to execute for another, unless there are apt words of personal obligation on the part of such agent or trustee in said contract.

It is not true that somebody must be bound by the note. This note fails to bind the ward for want of authority upon the part of the guardian to execute it, and it fails to bind the guardian, not only for the reason that it does not contain words of personal obligation, but also because the payee, with a knowledge of all the facts, relied on the power of the guardian to make a binding contract for his ward, and the mistake was one of law.

Baskin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears that a promissory note, at the date thereof, was made in the following manner and form, to wit:

Salt Lake City, Utah, Aug. 19, 1893.

Two years after date, we jointly and severally promise to pay Frank E. McGurrin, or order, at McCornick and Co.'s Banking House, in Salt Lake City, eleven hundred and fifty-four dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent per annum, payable quarterly at the said bank, for value received. If the interest be not paid as stipulated, the legal holder of this note may declare the principal due, and proceed by law to recover both principal and interest.

James Blazzard,

by Edward B. Critchlow, His Attorney in Fact.

Thomas Blazzard,

by J. L. Rawlins, His Attorney in Fact.

John Blazzard,

by Joseph H. Hurd, His General Guardian.

Mariam Blazzard Steers.

On the same date a mortgage on certain real estate was made and signed in the same manner as said note, to secure the payment of the same. This note and mortgage was, after the maturity of the note, assigned to plaintiff. The amended complaint contained three counts. The first was based upon the note and mortgage, and prayed that the mortgage be adjudged to be a valid and subsisting lien upon the interest of the said John Blazzard in the premises mortgaged, and that the same be sold to satisfy the plaintiff's debt, interest, costs, and attorney's fees; the second was on the note alone, and sought to charge the said John Blazzard and Joseph H. Hurd personally thereon; and the third was on the note alone, and sought to charge the said Joseph H. Hurd personally thereon, as one of the several obligees thereof. On motion of the said Joseph H. Hurd the first and second counts were stricken out on the ground that the ward was not bound by either the note or mortgage. Thereupon the said Joseph H. Hurd answered the third count, and, among other matters, alleged that: "For a further and separate answer and defense, defendant alleges that on or about the 19th day of August, 1893, the probate court of Salt Lake county, Utah territory, duly made an order in the matter of the estate and guardianship of John Blazzard, an incompetent person, authorizing, ordering, and directing this defendant, in the name and for the act and deed of the said John Blazzard, to execute said note, and, to secure the payment of the same, likewise, in the name and as and for the act and deed of the said John Blazzard, to secure said mortgage upon his undivided five twenty-eighths interest of, in, and to the real estate described in the mortgage; that in obedience to the said order of the said probate court, and not otherwise, this defendant signed to the said note and to the said mortgage the name of the said John Blazzard by himself as general guardian, upon the express and distinct understanding and agreement, however, that this defendant should not thereby be or become personally obligated or bound in any manner whatsoever by reason thereof, but that the same should, if legally sufficient and competent therefor, bind the estate of the said John Blazzard, and nothing more, which said understanding and agreement was then and there expressly brought to the attention of and assented to by the said McGurrian, and was also well known to and perfectly understood by the plaintiff at the time of the assignment of said note to him as alleged in the complaint. Defendants further allege that neither the said principal sum of $1,154, nor any part thereof, was ever paid to or received by this defendant or the said John Blazzard, and that the said note and mortgage were directed by the said court to be given in the manner and form aforesaid for the purpose of paying the attorney's fees incurred by Mariam Blazzard Steers as guardian ad litem of the said John Blazzard in the prosecution of certain litigation in behalf of herself and others."

It appears from the evidence that previous to the execution of said note the said James Blazzard, Thomas Blazzard, John Blazzard, and Mariam Blazzard Steers were parties to five cases pending in the third district court of the territory of Utah, and which were consolidated into one, in which were involved their titles to a certain estate; that in pursuance of the mandate of the supreme court of the territory the said district court awarded to each of the makers of said note and other parties to the action certain interests in the real estate involved, and ordered conveyances to be made in accordance with the decree, and that the said James Blazzard, Thomas Blazzard, John Blazzard, and Mariam Blazzard Steers, who were plaintiffs and interveners in said actions, pay to the defendants therein \$8,500; that the defendant in the pending case, Joseph Hurd, as the general guardian of the said John Blazzard, on the same day that said note was executed filed in the probate court of Salt Lake county a petition setting out the foregoing facts, and in addition thereto the following, to wit: "That neither the plaintiffs nor interveners have any estate or money other than the land decreed to them, and, except as hereinafter stated, are unable to comply with the decree requiring them to pay the money aforesaid. That \$1,000 which has been in the hands of the receiver had been paid. That it is necessary to raise by mortgage the sum of \$7,500 to comply with said decree. That in addition the sum of \$2,325.88 is required to pay Messrs. Rawlins & Critchlow and C. S. Varian, attorneys and counsel for plaintiffs, being the balance due them of the sum agreed by plaintiffs (John Blazzard, by his guardian ad litem, agreeing) to be paid. That the services of said counsel were contingent, of great value, and resulted in securing the property in lot six aforesaid, and that the compensation agreed upon was and is reasonable. That said property is not worth less than \$40,000. That plaintiffs and interveners have now an opportunity to procure a loan upon a mortgage on said property for the purposes aforesaid. That the amounts necessary to be raised, as estimated, are as follows: On the whole property, \$7,500; commissions, \$200; expenses of examining title, \$100; on $\frac{1}{4}$ interest of plaintiff, \$2,325.88. That all the parties in interest are now ready to complete the loans and perfect the title, and the deeds cannot be exchanged, nor the decree against the plaintiffs and lot 6 satisfied, until your petitioner is authorized with power in behalf of John Blazzard." That on the same day said probate court made and entered the following order: "Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Joseph H. Hurd, guardian of the person and estate of John Blazzard, a person of unsound mind, be, and he is hereby, authorized, as guardian aforesaid, and for John Blazzard, to execute with the plaintiffs and interveners aforesaid a note or notes, and a mortgage or mortgages, of the premises in lot 6, block 69, hereinbefore described, to procure a loan or loans sufficient to pay the sums hereinbefore mentioned, upon such terms and for such time as may be reasonable, and to execute the conveyances hereinbefore and in said decree mentioned. And it is further ordered that the said guardian report his acts and doings in the premises to this court." On the same day the aforesaid note and the mortgage on said lot were executed. While the said McGurrian was named as the mortgagee and payee of the note, it is admitted that the real beneficiaries were Joseph L. Rawlins, E. B. Critchlow, and C. S. Varian, the attorneys of the said James Blazzard, Thomas Blazzard, John Blazzard, and Mar-iam Blazzard Steers, in the cases before mentioned, and the consideration of the note and mortgage was their services as such in said cases, and that the note and mortgage were made to the said McGurrian as their trustee, and for their accommodation; that afterwards, and before the maturity of the note, the said McGurrian paid to said attorneys the full amount of said note, and became the legal holder and owner thereof; and that he, for a good and valuable consideration, subsequently and after maturity of the note transferred the same, and also the mortgage, to the plaintiff. In addition to the above facts the trial court found that at and before the time the said McGurrian purchased and became the owner of said note he understood that the said Hurd was not to be bound personally upon said note, and that the said Hurd, in obedience to said order of the probate court, and not otherwise, signed said note and mortgage with the name of John Blazzard, an incompetent person, by himself as general guardian. The principal question raised by the assignments of error is whether the defendant Joseph H. Hurd is personally liable to the plaintiff on said promissory note. The court below held that he was not, and dismissed the complaint.

It is stated in 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 70, that "the prevailing doctrine is that a guardian has no power to make a contract binding upon the ward or upon his estate, however proper and beneficial the contract may be, but that contracts made by him impose a personal liability upon himself, and his protection from loss lies in his right to charge the expenditures to the ward's estate in his account." This text is supported by a very large number of well-considered cases. Thacher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass. 299, 4 Am. Dec. 61; Forster v. Fuller, 6 Mass. 58, 4 Am. Dec. 87; Rolins v. Marsh, 128 Mass. 116; Wallis v. Bardwell, 126 Mass. 366; Phelps v. Worcester, 11 N. H. 51; Hardy v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 61 N. H. 34-39; Turner v. Flagg, 6 Ind. App. 563, 33 N. Powers*, 131 Ill. 182, 22 N. E. 479. The case of Thacher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass. 299, 4 Am. Dec. 61, arose on the following agreed statement of facts: "The defendant, as guardian of A. L., signed the notes declared on in the two first counts, for just debts due from the said A. L. to the plaintiffs. At the time of signing them the defendant was guardian of the said A. L., an insane person, having been duly appointed to that office. After the notes were respectively payable, and before the commencement of this action, the defendant showing to the judge of probate that the said A. L. had recovered his reason and was of sane mind, the judge duly discharged him from his said office of guardian." In the opinion, which was delivered by Chief Justice Parsons, it is said: "The question to be decided on the facts agreed in this case is whether the defendant is liable in this action. If an action is maintainable against any person, it must be the defendant; for the guardian of an insane person cannot make his ward liable to an action as on his own contract by any promise which the guardian can make. . . . The defendant's description of himself in the notes as guardian cannot vary the form of the action; but it is for his own benefit,—that on payment of the notes he may not be precluded from charging the moneys paid to the account of his ward." This case is cited and followed in the foregoing cases, and in many others not mentioned. Neither guardians nor the courts having jurisdiction over the estates of incompetent persons have power to bind the persons or estates of such persons unless expressly authorized to do so by law. In this state the duties and powers of guardians of incompetent persons are fixed and limited by statutory provisions, as also the duties and powers of the courts. Section 4007, Rev. Stat., provides that, in case the income of the ward's estate is insufficient for the comfortable and suitable maintenance and support of the ward and his family, the guardian may sell, mortgage, or lease the real estate, upon obtaining an order of court therefor. Section 4008 makes it the duty of the guardian to pay all just debts of the ward out of his personal estate and the income of his real estate, if sufficient; if not, then out of his real estate; and § 4015 provides that, when a sale of the property of the ward is necessary to pay the debts and expenses of guardianship, the guardian may do so upon the order of the court. Section 4014 provides that every guardian must be allowed the amount of his reasonable expenses incurred in the execution of his trust, and he must also have such compensation for his services as the court in which his accounts are settled deems just and reasonable. Section 4013 provides for the allowance in the guardian's settlement for advancements made by him for the support or education of his ward. There is no provision in the statute authorizing the court to order the guardian to bind either the said John Blazzard personally or his estate by the note or mortgage in question. It was the duty of the defendant Hurd, as guardian, to pay the just debts of his ward out of the latter's estate, in the manner prescribed by the statute; and when he chose to do so in a different way than that prescribed by statute, and liquidated his ward's debt by the execution, as guardian, of a note and mortgage under an unauthorized and void order of the court procured at his instance, he, in the absence of any other controlling circumstances, bound himself as principal, and must look for reimbursement in the settlement of his accounts as guardian in the court which appointed him as such. From the nature of the relations of guardian and ward, the defendant Hurd could not be the agent of his ward, or act in any other capacity than principal, in making said note, because the foundation of an agency is the delegation by the principal of authority to the agent to act; and as the ward was an incompetent person, he could not delegate any authority to his guardian to bind him personally by any contract. Nor could the court, under the provisions of the statute, authorize the execution of either a note or mortgage by the guardian in payment of the ward's debt.

In the case of Brown v. Eggleston, 53 Conn. 110, 119, 2 Atl. 321, the court said: "It has been repeatedly decided in Massachusetts that a guardian has no power to bind the ward or his estate by his contract. Thacher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass. 299, 4 Am. Dec. 61; Forster v. Fuller, 6 Mass. 58, 4 Am. Dec. 87; Wallis v. Bardwell, 126 Mass. 366. Administrators and guardians in this respect are closely analogous to conservators. The powers and duties of a conservator are defined in a general way by statute. He 'shall have the charge of the person and estate of such incapable person.' 'The conservator shall manage all the estate of his ward, and apply the net income thereof, and, if necessary, any part of the personal estate, to support him and his family and to pay his debts, and may sue for and collect all debts due to him.' The statute neither expressly nor impliedly authorizes the conservator to make contracts in the name of the ward, and the ward is legally incapable of making a contract. A conservator, unlike an overseer, acts independently of his ward, and in all his transactions he alone is the responsible party. He is not, however, bound to contract debts and pay them from his own estate. The law places in his hands ample means for supplying himself with funds to meet all his obligations. If he suffers loss personally, it must be through his own neglect. Sabrina Main being in fact and in law incapable of making a contract when the services were rendered, it is difficult to conceive how she or her estate can be held liable on contractu." In the case of St. Joseph's Academy v. Augustini, 55 Ala. 493, the court quotes with approval the following from Sanford v. Howard, 29 Ala. 692, 68 Am. Dec. 101: "The purchases of trustees, including executors, administrators, and guardians, when made in obedience to the duties of the trust, impose upon them a personal liability. The seller, or, we may insert, the person to whom a debt is contracted, 'must look to them for payment, and they must look to the trust estate for reimbursement.' This is everywhere, in this country, as well as in England, held to be the law; and appellant's counsel admit it." In Hardy v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 61 N. H. 34, the court said: "In Thacher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass. 299, 4 Am. Dec. 61, it is held that a guardian signing a note as guardian cannot bind the estate of the ward. This doctrine was approved in Forster v. Fuller, 6 Mass. 58, 4 Am. Dec. 87,—the court there saying that, although the note states that he promises as guardian, yet he is personally bound. To the same effect are Tenney v. Evans, 14 N. H. 343, 40 Am. Dec. 194; Jones v. Brewer, 1 Pick. 314; Barnaby v. Barnaby, 1 Pick. 221; Bicknell v. Bicknell, 111 Mass. 266; Thompson v. Boardman, 1 Vt. 367, 18 Am. Dec. 684; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 271; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 464; 1 Parsons, Contr. 136. In Phelps v. Worcester, 11 N. H. 51, 53, the court says: The rule that the guardian, when he undertakes to act for the ward in contracts with others, should alone be liable, is sustained by the soundest reason. A different rule would subject the ward to numerous suits, the merits of which might be wholly unknown to him. In all expenditures arising under such contracts, the ward should be liable only to his guardian. He is then answerable to but one individual, and then only on a decree of court, on settlement of his guardianship account.'" In Sperry v. Fanning, 80 Ill. 375, the court quotes with approval the following from 1 Parsons, Contr. 136: "A guardian cannot by his own contract bind the person or estate of his ward; but if he promise, on sufficient consideration, to pay the debt of his ward, he is personally bound by his promise, although he expressly promises as guardian. And it is a sufficient consideration if such promise discharges the debt of the ward, and a guardian who thus discharges the debt of his ward may lawfully indemnify himself out of the ward's estate." In the case of Fessenden v. Jones, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 14, 75 Am. Dec. 445, the court said: "The guardian is charged with the duty of controlling and managing the person and property of the ward, and judging of the expenditures which may be needful for either, and he also is informed of the condition of the ward's resources. Hence the contract should be made with the guardian, and hence the guardian ought to be looked to for payment. To allow a departure from the above rule would, in the first place, have the effect to encourage in the youth of the country appeals from the judgments of their guardians, and, in the next, make the right to compensation on the part of the creditor depend upon a condition of things of which he had no means to judge, and therefore uncertain and precarious. . . . It will be seen from the foregoing considerations, a guardian is not in the condition of an ordinary agent or factor, and therefore the same legal relations, in all respects, do not subsist between them and those whom they respectively represent. The former represents one who has no legal capacity to contract for himself; the latter, one who is fully able to contract and bind, were he present. The former is substituted by the law, and stands in loco parentis. The latter is the appointee of his principal, and that principal can at any moment abrogate or modify his power. This want of analogies between the two in the sources and limits of their powers makes it obvious there can be no complete analogy between them as to liabilities or exemptions." In Hunt v. Maldonado, 89 Cal. 636, 27 Pac. 56, the court said: "The action is to recover an attorney's fee for services rendered to the guardian of a minor in pursuance of a written contract. The action is against the minor. If the guardian made a valid contract with the attorney, he may be held liable; and if he pays it, and the probate court shall deem the expenditure reasonable and necessary to protect the interests of the ward, it may be allowed from the ward's estate. But it is an expense incurred by the guardian in the performance of his duties, for which he is primarily liable." This language is quoted with approval in Morse v. Hinckley, 124 Cal. 168, 56 Pac. 896.

In the case at bar a just indebtedness of the ward to the attorneys heretofore mentioned has been paid, and it was the duty of the guardian to pay the same from the estate of his ward. He performed this duty by executing the note in question as guardian; and notwithstanding the form of the note, on the face of the same, and according to its legal effect, we think it is clear, under the authorities, that the guardian is personally bound, and must look to the estate of his ward in his settlement with the court for reimbursement. The court below, in the opinion rendered, and which appears in the record, evidently entertained the view that the note, unexplained by parol evidence, bound personally the guardian. In that opinion the trial judge said: "I think the words of the note sufficiently show that he signed as guardian, although he signed the name of John Blazzard, by Joseph H. Hurd, guardian. I think it would charge him, under the rule, with personal liability, if in the hands of an innocent indorsee." Respondents' counsel, in their brief, state that it "may be admitted that ordinarily a guardian who makes a contract as guardian binds himself, and not his ward." In the case at bar Hurd acted in the capacity of guardian, as the way in which he signed the note shows. The ward being civilly dead, the execution of the note was the act of the guardian, and the note his own, and not the ward's.

It is, however, claimed by counsel for respondents that notwithstanding a guardian who makes a contract as such thereby binds himself, and not his ward, still the guardian may show by parol evidence, as was permitted by the court, over the objection of the plaintiff, to be done in this case, that the parties did not intend to bind the guardian personally. No parol agreement, in express terms, was made that the guardian should not be personally bound. The only evidence upon that subject was the statements of the guardian and C. S. Varian and E. B. Critchlow, two of the beneficiaries. The guardian, in answer to the question, "What occurred at the time the note was made?" said: "My recollection is not as clear as it might be, but, as I remember it, the papers were all prepared—a petition to the court for authority to execute this note and mortgage—authorizing and directing the execution of the note on account of the incompetent, and the signing and waiver of notice; that the court, having heard the testimony, made the order. My recollection is that the other papers were prepared at the same time, and I signed them. I remember distinctly Mr. Varian calling my attention to the manner in which it was necessary to sign in order to avoid personal liability in a matter of this kind, and suggested that it be signed in the way it is." In the examination on this matter of C. S. Varian, the following occurred:

Q. Now, I will ask you, in taking that note of Mr. Hurd, whether you understood that he was not to be bound personally upon it.

A. I certainly did.

Q. I will ask you if there was any intention on your part to bind anybody except the person and estate of this incompetent person, by his signature to this note.

A. There was not. Hurd was an entirely independent person acting gratuitously as an act of courtesy.

Q. In taking the note from Mr. Hurd, signed in this way, did you, or did you not, depend entirely upon the order of the probate court?

A. Certainly.

In the examination of Mr. E. B. Critchlow, he stated:

Q. I will ask you whether or not in taking the note, you yourself understood that Mr. Hurd was in no manner personally responsible.

A. I certainly did.

Q. I will ask you to state whether or not Mr. Hurd was procured to act as guardian at the request of yourself, Mr. Rawlins, and Mr. Varian, who were interested in the note.

A. He was. He had absolutely no interest in the matter at all until he was asked to come into it at our request to act as guardian for the incompetent person.

Q. State whether or not he was asked to act as attorney or as guardian simply for your accommodation.

A. I can hardly say that. I suppose the interest of the incompetent needed attention, and he was appointed in his interest as well. As to the execution of the note, he was acting in our interest entirely. It was for our accommodation.

Q. One further question I will ask you,—whether or not it was understood by you that the order of the probate court did bind the estate of this incompetent person.

A. That was a matter of investigation by Mr. Varian and myself. I can't say whether Mr. Rawlins participated in that or not, and we came to the conclusion—formed the judgment—that the guardian of an incompetent person might be authorized by the court, upon proper proceedings taken, to give this note and mortgage; and upon that it was our intention to bind the estate of the ward, and nobody else, by the signature of Mr. Hurd.

The guardian and beneficiaries of said note were fully aware of all the facts regarding the transaction. There was no mistake respecting the language of the note, but it was in the form and was executed in the manner intended. It is not claimed that there was any fraud or mistake of fact in the transaction. The substance of respondent's claim is that he and the beneficiaries did not intend the note, in legal effect, should bind the guardian personally. When the facts are within the knowledge of both parties to a written contract, and the language used is such as they intended, a mistake as to the legal effect of the contract, or that its legal effect is different from that intended, is not available as a defense at law, and is not ground for a reformation of the contract in a court of equity, and cannot be shown by parol. Brown v. Wiley, 20 How. 442, 15 L. ed. 965; Martin v. Cole, 104 U. S. 30-38, 26 L. ed. 647-650; Fackner v. Lew Smith Wall Paper Co. 88 Iowa, 169, 55 N. W. 200; Bryan v. Duff, 12 Wash. 233, 40 Pac. 936; McAninch v. Laughlin, 13 Pa. 371; Davis v. England, 141 Mass. 587-590, 6 N. E. 731; Oiler v. Gard, 23 Ind. 212-218; Kelly v. Turner, 74 Ala. 513; Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 474-483; Conner v. Clark, 12 Cal. 168, 73 Am. Dec. 529; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 581-587, 6 L. ed. 166, 167; Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138. There are many other decisions in line with the foregoing cases, but they are too numerous for citation. In the case of Brown v. Wiley, 20 How. 442, 15 L. ed. 965, Justice Grier used this language: "When the operation of a contract is clearly settled by general principles of law, it is taken to be the true sense of the contracting parties. This is not only a positive rule of the common law, but it is a general principle in the construction of contracts. Some precedents to the contrary may be found in some of our states, originating in hard cases; but they are generally overruled by the same tribunals from which they emanated, on experience of the evil consequences flowing from a relaxation of the rule." In the case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 587, 6 L. ed. 167, the court said: "There is no rule of law better settled or more salutary in its application to contracts than that which precludes the admission of parol evidence to contradict or substantially vary the legal import of a written agreement." In the case of Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138, the legal effect of the terms of a contract was different from what the parties supposed they were, and parol evidence of the mistake was excluded. In the case of Fackner v. Lew Smith Wall Paper Co. 88 Iowa, 169, 55 N. W. 200, it was held that whatever the law implies from the language used in a written contract is as much a part of the contract as that which is expressed therein; and if the contract, viewed in the light of what the law thus implies, is clear, definite, and complete, it cannot be added to, varied, or contradicted by extrinsic evidence. In the case of Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 483, the court said: "When it is alleged that certain words, letters, or figures have been inserted or omitted by mistake, the proof should establish the facts alleged. If there be a failure to do this, and the testimony shows that by a legal construction the deed may operate contrary to the expectations of the grantor, and convey land which he did not intend to convey, a court of equity would not be authorized to reform the deed; for conveyances are not to be reformed, and made to read in such manner as may best carry into effect the intentions of the parties as ascertained from parol testimony, when there is no satisfactory proof that they did not use the language which they intended to use." In the case of McAninch v. Laughlin, 13 Pa. 371, the facts were within the knowledge of both parties, and the mistake was in the judgment they formed of the legal effect of them, but the court held that such a mistake was not a ground of relief. In the case of Oiler v. Gard, 23 Ind. 212, this language is used: "It is not proved that the language or import of the note was not well understood, or that either was different from what was intended by the parties when it was written and signed. The testimony of Gard fails to show that there was anything omitted in the writings of the 15th of August and the 10th of October, 1857, which was, at the time of their execution, intended to be inserted. Gard understood the language and import of the papers, but he did not understand their legal effect. This was a mistake of law, unattended by such circumstances as would entitle him to relief in equity. A mistake or ignorance of the law forms no ground of relief from contracts fairly entered into, with full knowledge of the facts, under circumstances raising no presumption of fraud, imposition, or undue advantage taken." In the case of Davis v. England, 141 Mass. 587, 6 N. E. 731, the note was, in form, "I promise," etc., and was signed as follows: "W. H. England, Pres. & Treas. of Chelsea Iron-Foundry Co." The defendant offered evidence to show that the consideration of the note was the sale of a bill of goods which was delivered to the company, and that at the time and after the note was given it was understood, intended, and agreed by both parties that the note was the note of the company. The court admitted the evidence over objection thereto. In the opinion rendered, it was said: "The learned justice who presided in the superior court rightly ruled that the note sued on is the note of the defendant, and not of the Chelsea Iron-Foundry Company. Tucker Mfg. Co. v. Fairbanks, 98 Mass. 101. But it was erroneous to admit oral testimony to show that at the time the note was given and afterwards it was understood and agreed by the parties that the note was the note of the Chelsea Iron-Foundry Company." In the case just cited, in legal effect, the note was the note of W. H. England, and not that of the company. In the case at bar the legal effect of the note in question was, as hereinbefore shown, the note of the guardian. In the case of Conner v. Clark, 12 Cal. 171, 73 Am. Dec. 529, the court said: "Story, Promissory Notes, § 63, says: 'As to trustees, guardians, executors, and administrators, and other persons acting en autre droit, they are by law generally held personally liable on promissory notes, because they have no authority to bind, ex directo, the persons for whom or for whose benefit or for whose estate they act; and, hence, to give any validity to the note, they must be deemed personally bound as makers. It is true that they may exempt themselves from personal responsibility by using clear and explicit words to show that intention, but in the absence of such words the law will hold them bound. Thus, if an executor or administrator should make or indorse a note in his own name, adding thereto the words "as executor" or "as administrator," he would be personally responsible thereon. If he means to limit his responsibility, he should confine his stipulation to pay out of the estate.' Story, Agency, 176, asserts the same doctrine. The question here is not, as the counsel for the appellant has ingeniously suggested, whether a principal can be bound on an unsealed contract where the writing intimates and notifies by general words the fact of agency, and parol evidence explanatory of the fact intimated is given. But here there is no doubt that the person signing as trustee was bound, but he wishes to prove that he was bound only in a certain way; that is, to pay out of a particular fund. It is not pretended that anyone else was bound by this contract. No authority is shown in Clark to bind the beneficiaries in this trust by this note. In form and legal effect the note binds him to pay this amount; but he wishes to add to this note another term, namely, that he was only to pay it out of a certain fund, and this, he wishes to prove, was a contemporaneous parol agreement. But the rule is that the written contract is considered the definitive agreement of the parties, and parol conversations and understandings are all merged in it. It is the only authentic evidence of the understanding of the parties."

As the terms of the note in question were such as the parties intended to use, and their legal effect was to bind the guardian personally, the parol evidence showing a different understanding was inadmissible, and the objection of the plaintiff thereto should have been sustained. The order of the probate court, being made without authority of the statute, is void, and does not, therefore, shield the guardian from personal liability. McCalley v. Wilburn, 77 Ala. 549; Whiteside v. Jennings, 19 Ala. 784, 788; Hudson v. Helmes, 23 Ala. 589; Beal v. Harmon, 38 Mo. 436-439; Woerner, Guardianship, 200, 219. It is elementary that a judgment or order of a court made without authority is void, and confers no rights on, and affords no protection to, persons acting in pursuance thereof. In the case of McCalley v. Wilburn, 77 Ala. 549, the court said: "If his petition to the probate court had contained all the requisite jurisdictional allegations, and the order of the court based on the petition had been otherwise regular, it is very clear that the obligation given by the administrator would have been binding on him only in his representative capacity, and he would not have been in any wise personally liable. Such is the express declaration of the statute. But this is the case only where the proceedings of the court are valid, so as to confer upon the administrator the legal authority to bind the estate by the execution of 'such note, bond, or bill.' Code 1876, § 2432. It is obvious that an administrator cannot shield himself from personal liability, by refuge under an order which is absolutely void. The rule of law which governs his liability is analogous to that governing trustees and agents in general. Where he undertakes to bind the estate, and fails to do so for want of authority, he binds himself personally, and may be sued upon his contract individually. Whiteside v. Jennings, 19 Ala. 784. And in such cases it avails him nothing that he intended only to bind himself in his representative capacity."

It appears that McGurrian was made payee of the note only as an accommodation to the attorneys beneficially interested. How this could accommodate them, or what induced them to resort to this indirect method, was not inquired into. It does appear, however, from the face of the note, that two of the beneficiaries signed the same as guardians of their respective wards, who, it is claimed, it was intended should be bound by the note so signed. It also appears that McGurrian had no personal interest in the matter whatever, that he took no part in the negotiations, that the note at its execution was delivered to the beneficiaries, and that previous to the time McGurrian purchased the same, on December 5, 1893, it had not been in his possession. Nor does it appear that he was present at the execution of the note, or that he was advised that it was not intended to bind the guardian personally by the note. The defendant stated in his testimony that he remembered distinctly that he, Critchlow, and Varian were present at the execution of the note, and, to the best of his recollection, McGurrian was there also. On cross-examination he said: "I am not certain about McGurrian being present when I executed the note and mortgage. Am certain as to the others." McGurrian, being placed on the witness stand by the defendants, testified, in substance, that he bought the note from Mr. Varian for a valuable consideration; that neither at nor prior to the time he purchased the same was anything said about his not looking to Hurd; that there was no understanding, express or implied, that he should not be liable on the note; that nothing was said about it at all; that at the time he saw the note and mortgage, and the manner in which it was signed, he took it for granted that when they signed their names in that way they had the authority; that he did not suppose Hurd was binding himself personally on the note, and understood that what he was getting was the note of John Blazzard, by Joseph H. Hurd, his guardian; that he took the note for what it was worth, and expected to hold Hurd if he had no authority to make the note, and had no understanding by which Hurd was not to be liable, but supposed he had authority to sign the note. It does not appear from the record that McGurrin had any knowledge that it was understood by the interested parties that the guardian was not to be personally bound. Evidently McGurrin supposed that the legal effect of the note was to bind the ward, and not the guardian; but would the fact that he was mistaken in this deprive him of the rights of an innocent holder for value, and prevent him from enforcing the note according to its legal effect? It would not, and, this being so, the plaintiff, notwithstanding he became the owner of the note, for value, after its maturity, is not deprived of such right. As parol evidence is not admissible to defeat the legal effect of a written contract, the terms of which the parties intended to use if the beneficiaries of the note had brought suit to recover on the same, such evidence, to defeat the legal effect of the same, would not have been admissible over their objection, it follows that such evidence would not be admissible, over objection in a suit by any subsequent owner and holder of said note for value. The attorneys have received their fee, and the debt of the ward has been paid; and, if the guardian were not personally liable on the note, the holder of the same for value would have no remedy, for neither can he hold the ward or guardian on implied assumpsit, nor do we know of any other available remedy. The guardian, however, has a remedy. Under the provision of the statute, he has the right to credit himself in his accounts with any sum legitimately expended or advanced in the discharge of his duties, and to have the same satisfied out of the ward's estate.

It is alleged in the answer that the said James Blazzard and Mariam Blazzard Steers, two of the makers of said note, by separate deeds conveyed to the plaintiff certain real estate, and that there was deducted from the consideration of said deeds a sum equal to one half of the amount of said note, and which was retained by plaintiff, who in consideration of such retention agreed to indemnify and save harmless the said James Blazzard and Mariam Blazzard Steers against and from all liability upon said note and the mortgage given to secure the same. The evidence shows that a portion of the consideration of said deeds was so retained, but the exact amount is not shown. Whenever the plaintiff became the owner of said note, whatever amounts were so deducted and retained should, as to him, be regarded and treated as payments on the note, and the guardian is only liable for the balance. It further appears from the testimony of E. B. Critchlow, before quoted, that the guardian was appointed at the request of the attorneys to whom the fee was due, and that "as to the execution of the note he was acting in [their] interest entirely. It was for [their] accommodation." In view of such action, and the other facts disclosed in the case, in connection with the lack of general authority of the guardian in the premises, the parties to the transaction, as against the holder of the note, who paid a valuable and good consideration for the same, should not have been allowed to say that they intended to bind the ward only.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, at respondents' costs, with directions to the lower court to grant a new trial.

Barteh, J., concurs.

Miner, Ch. J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the opinion of my learned associate, Mr. Justice Baskin. While it is true that ordinarily a guardian who makes a contract as such binds himself, and not his ward, yet there are exceptions to the rule that are quite as well settled as the rule itself. The guardian is held responsible where he has bought or contracted for the benefit of his ward, and the law implies an agreement on his part to pay, or where there was a written contract, entered into with apt words, to bind him personally. But the promise under consideration was made in the name of the principal, and as his contract, and not as the individual contract of Hurd. The makers and the payee understood, executed, and accepted the note as the note of the principal, and did not understand that Hurd was to be individually and personally bound as guardian. There are no apt words in the instrument that can be construed into a personal contract binding the guardian. The rule of law is well settled that an agent or trustee cannot be held upon a contract he assumes to execute for another unless there are apt words of personal obligation on the part of such agent or trustee written in the contract. In the present case the note did not contain a personal promise of the guardian to pay. It was not executed by Hurd as guardian, but by John Blazzard himself, by Hurd as general guardian. It was the note of John Blazzard, by his guardian, and not the note of the guardian. The note fails to bind the ward because of want of authority on the part of the guardian to execute it, and it also fails to bind the guardian because it does not contain apt words making it a personal obligation, and because the payee, with knowledge of the facts, relied upon the power of the guardian to make a binding contract for his ward; and therefore the mistake is one of law. While there is a conflict in the authorities on this subject, yet the general rule is as above stated. As to the first proposition, Mechem, Agency,

§ 550, says: "Where the promise is made in the name of the principal, and as his contract, the better opinion is that the agent cannot be held liable upon it, but only for the deceit or breach of warranty, even in the case of a written contract, where the assumed relation of agency appears upon the face of it. . . . The rule sometimes asserted, that wherever the agent fails to create a right of action against his principal upon the contract he makes himself liable thereon, cannot, therefore, be sustained as a general rule. The agent is only liable on the contract in those cases in which he has used apt words to bind himself, or has expressly pledged his personal responsibility, or in which the credit was given to him personally." Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 567, 89 Am. Dec. 64; Lander v. Castro, 43 Cal. 497; Johnson v. Smith, 21 Conn. 627; Mechem, Agency, § 550. In a note to the latter citation many cases are reported sustaining the principle announced. As to the latter proposition above, see 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1127; Michael v. Jones, 84 Mo. 578; Western Cement Co. v. Jones, 8 Mo. App. 373; Humphrey v. Jones, 71

Mo. 62; Taylor v. Shelton, 30 Conn. 122; Ogden v. Raymond, 22 Conn. 379, 58 Am. Dec. 429; Mechem, Agency, § 546.

I am also of the opinion that evidence was admissible to show the knowledge of the parties that the note was intended as the obligation of the principal, and not of the agent, and that it was given and accepted as such. There is some conflict of authority on this subject, but the weight thereof sustains the doctrine stated. The subject is fully discussed in Mechem, Agency, § 441, where the authorities are collected, and the author therein states that the weight of authority sustains the doctrine announced. See also 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 147. The cases of Metcalf v. Williams, 104 U. S. 93, 26 L. ed. 665, and Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat. 326, 5 L. ed. 100, also sustain the same doctrine. See also Kean v. Davis, 21 N. J. L. 683, 47 Am. Dec. 182; 2 Notes on U. S. Reports, p. 34; and Mechem, Agency, § 288.

In my opinion the judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Orin BURGESS

v.

SIMS DRUG COMPANY et al., Appts.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A druggist is not relieved from liability for injuries caused by a prescription negligently put up, by the fact that the negligence was that of a registered pharmacist employed by him, which class alone is allowed by statute to fill prescriptions.
2. Answering questions on cross-examination as to a matter of privilege between physician and patient will not waive the patient's right to object on the ground of privilege to the physician's answering questions as to communications made to him by the patient.
3. A waiver of the patient's privilege as to communications made to his physician must be confined to the trial in which it is made, and cannot avail to make the testimony of the physician competent at a subsequent trial.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by a physician's prescription erroneously put up by defendants. Affirmed.

Statement by McClain, J.:

The defendants, W. D. Sims and George

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to negligence in sale of drug, see note to Craft v. Parker, W. & Co. (Mich.) 21 L. R. A. 139; Meyer v. King (Miss.) 35 L. R. A. 474; and Wise v. Morgan (Tenn.) 44 L. R. A. 548.

As to waiver of privilege as to confidential communications to physician, see McConnell v. Osage (Iowa) 8 L. R. A. 778, and Mellor v. Missouri P. R. Co. (Mo.) 10 L. R. A. 36. 54 L. R. A.

C. Sims. are sued, as partners doing business under the firm name of the Sims Drug Company, to recover damages for injury alleged to have resulted to plaintiff from the negligence of defendants in putting up a prescription of medicine to be used in plaintiff's eye, the use of which resulted in injury to the eye and loss thereof. Defendants deny the negligence alleged, and aver that the prescription complained of was filled by a skilled, competent, and duly registered pharmacist in their employ. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $900. Defendants appeal.

Messrs. Spurrier & Maxwell, for appellants:

A witness may be asked on cross-examination any question tending to show bias.

Bradner, Ev. 2d ed. p. 32.

The cross-examiner has a right to ask, and require an answer to, any question concerning the situation of the witness with respect to the parties and to the subject of litigation.

Reynolds, Ev. p. 134; Starkie, Ev. p. 195; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 446; Taylor, Ev. § 1235; 1 Wharton, Ev. § 545.

Where a party himself testifies as to a consultation with a physician, and pretends to give the circumstances of the privileged interview, the opposite party is not precluded from assailing such evidence by the testimony of such physician.

If the defendants' registered pharmacist filled the prescription in controversy, it is apparent that the defendants, who were not registered pharmacists, could have in no manner known or avoided, even by the highest degree of care, the improper filling of the prescription.

When the proprietor of a pharmacy employs such a person as his pharmacist as the law declares competent, and furnishes a suitable place and necessary ingredients, he has done all that reason or the law requires of him for the safety of the public.

Messrs. Vernon O. Ford and Carr & Parker, for appellee:

Statements by the person injured as to the cause of the injury, made to the physician called to treat him, are privileged.

Raymond v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 152, 21 N. W. 495.

Disclosure in one case of privileged communications without objection does not defeat the right to insist upon the privilege in a subsequent trial.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Appellants contend that, having employed a skilful, registered pharmacist, they are not liable for his negligence, if any there was, in filling the prescription, and cite as illustrations cases in which it has been held that a railroad company contracting with an employee to furnish surgical aid and attendance in case of an accident was not liable for the negligent acts of the surgeon thus selected and furnished, if due care and diligence were used in the selection (Maine v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 260, 70 N. W. 630, 80 N. W. 315), and that a bank to which a draft is sent for collection is not liable for the negligence of the notary public to whom the draft is delivered for protest (First Nat. Bank v. German Bank, 107 Iowa, 543, 44 L. R. A. 133, 78 N. W. 195). These cases, we think, are not analogous. It was the duty of the railroad company by express contract in the one case, and the duty of the bank by implied contract in the other case, to secure for the other party professional services, which neither the railroad company, in the one case, nor the bank, in the other, held itself out as competent to perform. The railroad company did not pretend to be a surgeon, nor the bank to be a notary. But these defendants did pretend to be druggists, and held themselves out as able and willing to fill prescriptions. Whether they performed the services individually or by the aid of an employee was immaterial. The master who undertakes to perform a service is liable for the negligence of his servant in performing the service undertaken. This proposition is too elementary to require the citation of authorities. It is true that the legislature has provided, as a police regulation for the protection of the public, that no one who is not a registered pharmacist shall fill prescriptions; but when the defendants undertook, as a part of their regular business, that the prescription should be filled, it was wholly immaterial to the customer, so far as defendants' liability was concerned, whether the prescription was filled by one of the defendants or by an employee. McCubbin v. Hastings, 27 La. Ann. 713. In Martin v. Temperley, 4 Q. B. 298, it was held that defendant was liable for injury done by barges belonging to him navigated by persons specified by statute as qualified for such purpose, and selected by defendant. The court held that the statutory limitation of defendant's power of choice did not deprive the party injured of a remedy against him. The case is analogous to this, and the decision seems to be perfectly reasonable. We think in this case defendant was not relieved of his responsibility as employer by the fact that he was required by statute to employ a registered pharmacist.

2. Plaintiff claimed that his eye was injured by lime falling into it while he was at work at his trade as a plasterer, and that the application to it of a preparation secured from defendants on a prescription so aggravated the injury that its removal was necessary. When Dr. Amos, the specialist who performed the operation, was put on the stand by defendants as a witness, and asked to state what was said to him by plaintiff with reference to the cause of the injury to the eye, his testimony was excluded by the court on the ground that such communication to him was privileged, under the following provision of the Code: "Sec. 4608. No practicing attorney, counselor, physician, or surgeon . . . shall be allowed, in giving testimony, to disclose any confidential communication properly intrusted to him in his professional capacity, and necessary and proper to enable him to discharge the functions of his office according to the usual course of practice. . . . Such prohibition shall not apply to cases where the party in whose favor the same is made waives the rights conferred." The contention of appellants is that plaintiff had waived his privilege with reference to communications made to Dr. Amos—First, by testifying with reference to the same matter on the same trial; second, by testifying as to the same matter at a former trial of this case; third, by calling Dr. Amos to testify as a witness with reference to the same matter on a former trial of this case. Evidence of the testimony of plaintiff and of Dr. Amos on the former trial was introduced to show such waiver. With reference to the testimony of plaintiff on this trial, it is urged by appellee that the matter about which Dr. Amos was asked to testify was gone into by plaintiff only in answer to questions on cross-examination, and it is contended that this did not constitute a waiver. While, as to the testimony of plaintiff and Dr. Amos on the former trial, it is contended that nothing done on one trial will amount to a waiver of the objection to evidence as to privileged communications when they are attempted to be proved on another trial of the same case. The section of the Code above set out constitutes a partial statutory declaration of a rule of evidence which was recognized at common law with reference to privileged communications to attorneys, but in this respect it is only a partial declaration; for, with reference to attorneys, as well as physicians, it relates only to the testimony of the attorney or physician, whereas the common-law rule of evidence relating to communications to attorneys is broader, and excuses the client also from testifying as to such communications. It was not intended, however, by this partial statement to limit the common-law rule in this respect, for this court has held that the client is still entitled to claim the exemption. Barker v. Kuhn, 38 Iowa, 392. Further than this, the provision of the Code extends the privilege which at common law was recognized in regard to communications between client and attorney so as to cover communications between the patient and his physician; and we have no doubt that it was intended to extend to these communications the same complete protection, not only as to physicians, but also as to the patient, which by common law was recognized in regard to communications between client and attorney. We think that there is no question but that the patient is privileged from disclosing communications made to his physician, although the statute does not so expressly provide. With this construction of the statute in mind, we now proceed to determine whether in any of the three ways above specified the plaintiff in this case had waived the privilege of insisting that Dr. Amos should not testify in regard to the communications made to him in his professional capacity. It is proper to suggest further that the statute does not specify what shall constitute a waiver, leaving that to be determined by the general rules of evidence, which, without statutory authority, had previously been recognized as applicable to communications between client and attorney. It is well settled that the client or patient may waive his privilege, not merely by failing to make objection to the evidence of the attorney or physician when offered, but also by conduct from which a waiver may be imputed,—such as by himself testifying as to the subject-matter of such communications. People v. Gallagher, 75 Mich. 512, 42 N. W. 54 L. R. A.

1063; State v. Tall, 43 Minn. 273, 45 N. W. 449; Hunt v. Blackburn, 128 U. S. 464, 32 L. ed. 488, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 125; McKinney v. Grand Street, P. P. & F. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 352, 10 N. E. 544. But the testimony of the client or patient as to the communication which will constitute a waiver of the privilege so as to admit the attorney or physician to testify with reference thereto must be voluntarily given; for the privilege is that of the client or patient, and it exists in his favor until in some way abandoned. No doubt, under this privilege, the client or patient may refuse to answer on cross-examination when asked with reference to the privileged communication. Barker v. Kuhn, 38 Iowa, 392; Bigler v. Reyher, 43 Ind. 112; Hemenway v. Smith, 28 Vt. 701; State v. White, 19 Kan. 445, 27 Am. Rep. 137; Duitenhofer v. State, 34 Ohio St. 91, 32 Am. Rep. 362. But we are not willing to hold that the failure to insist on this privilege makes the testimony which he may give on cross-examination voluntary, in such sense as to constitute a waiver of his privilege with reference to the communication to his attorney or physician. In McConnell v. Osage, 80 Iowa, 293, 8 L. R. A. 778, 45 N. W. 550, this court said that even the voluntary act of the plaintiff in that case, as a witness, in testifying to her physical health at a particular time, would not constitute a waiver of objection to testimony by her physician as to communications made by her to him at that time showing that she was not in good health, and that the mere fact of the exclusion of the physician's testimony might result in putting the condition of her health at the time referred to in a false light before the jury would not be a sufficient reason for implying a waiver. And it was further said (and this is especially pertinent to our present inquiry) that it was improper to ask such witness on cross-examination whether she was willing that the physician might disclose any communications which she had made to him with reference to her health. Accordingly it was held that the propounding of such a question to the witness over the objection of her attorney, and to which her answer was, "No," constituted error; this language being used: "The statute gives the prohibition. It is a legal right, and a party should no more be required to state under oath that he did not want to surrender it, than any other legal right he possessed. We think a fair trial requires that such a matter should not even be referred to; that the jury should not be impressed with a belief that there is even reluctance to giving such assent. The subject-matter of such a waiver has no place for reference in the taking of testimony, except by the party permitted to make it." In the case before us it is evident that any objection of the witness on cross-examination to testify as to the communication might well have been prejudicial, and therefore that the answer of the witness with reference thereto cannot be treated as a waiver of the privilege, for it is essentially not voluntary. If counsel saw fit on cross-examination to inquire into this matter, he must be bound by the answer, and cannot afterwards claim that the witness, by answering without objection, voluntarily waived the privilege. As to the testimony at the former trial, it seems to us that the waiver resulting therefrom should be confined to the trial in which the waiver is made. Our statute relates to the giving of testimony, not to the publication in general of the privileged matter, and it seems to us clear that any waiver resulting from the giving or introduction of testimony on a trial should be limited to that trial. Briesenmeister v. Supreme Lodge, K. of P. 81 Mich. 325, 45 N. W. 977; Grattan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 274, 287, 44 Am. Rep. 372. In a later New York case a different conclusion was reached (McKinney v. Grand Street, P. P. & F. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 352, 10 N. E. 544); but we do not agree to the reasoning in that case, which would seem to lead to the result that, if the privileged communication is in any way made public by the patient, the privilege is waived for all time, whereas we understand it to be well settled that a communication to a third person by the patient or client will not be a waiver of the right to insist on the privilege when it is sought to have the disclosure made by the way of testimony in open court. Thus, it has been held that a waiver of the privilege as to one witness, by permitting him to testify as to the privileged matter, will not be a waiver of objection to the testimony of another witness as to the same matter. Mellor v. Missouri P. R. Co. 105 Mo. 455, 10 L. R. A. 36, 16 S. W. 849. See also Dotton v. Albion, 57 Mich. 575, 24 N. W. 786, cited in McConnell v. Osage, 80 Iowa, 293, 301, 8 L. R. A. 778, 45 N. W. 550.

3. Many other assignments of error are made and argued, some of them relating to the sustaining of objections to hypothetical questions propounded to witnesses called as experts, and others to instructions given; but a discussion of these assignments would unduly extend this opinion, without substantial benefit. We have carefully considered the objections made, and find them to be without merit.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Lucas County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dungan & Bartholomew, for appellant:

Defendant in violating the statute is liable as for "culpable negligence" per se.

Gould v. Schermor, 101 Iowa, 582, 70 N. W. 697; West v. Ward, 77 Iowa, 323, 42 N. W. 309; Liming v. Illinois C. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 246, 47 N. W. 66; Langhammer v. Manchester, 99 Iowa, 295, 68 N. W. 688.

The fact that the accident was so unusual and extraordinary that it could not reasonably have been expected to happen does not relieve the defendant.

Doyle v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 607, 4 L. R. A. 420, 42 N. W. 555; West v. Ward, 77 Iowa, 323, 42 N. W. 309.

The intervening cause, to relieve the defendant from liability, must be wholly independent of the original cause of the injury.

Where there is danger, peril, or risk of a particular injury, which occurs, it is the natural, and probably result of the act.

Everyone who does an unlawful or wrongful act is liable in damages to any person injured thereby, who is not himself guilty of contributory negligence.

Messrs. Stuart & Stuart for appellee.

Waterman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff was in the employ of defendant, and, among other duties, had the care of several horses. On the occasion in question, as plaintiff was leading into a shed with a halter one of the horses, defendant stopped him, and undertook to apply a wash to a galled place on the animal's neck. The horse was nervous and restless, and would not stand, so a twitch was put on him, and plaintiff held this with the halter while the wash was applied. After the twitch was removed, defendant noticed another bruised spot on the animal's shoulder, and he attempted, without replacing the twitch, to wash this. The horse jumped aside, and struck defendant, throwing upon his clothes the medicine, which he had in a tin can in his hand. This angered defendant, who seized the twitch, the handle of which was a heavy stick with a nail in the end, and began violently and brutally beating the horse, which struggled to escape. Plaintiff tried, without avail, to induce defendant to desist. Finally, a blow aimed missed the horse because of a slip by defendant, and plaintiff was struck in the face, breaking the bones of his nose and otherwise injuring him. There was no evidence tending to show that the blow so struck was intentional. The court submitted the case to the jury on the theory of defendant's negligence, instructing them that defendant would not be liable if in beating the horse he exercised reasonable care to avoid striking plaintiff, and the blow which inflicted the injury was caused by an accidental slip for which defendant was not to blame; and the jury was further told, in effect, this would be so even if defendant, in beating the horse, was guilty of an unlawful act.

We think the instructions omit one essential fact, viz.: Was it negligence for defendant to strike the horse in the manner he did and under the circumstances existing at the time? If it was, he is liable for the natural and probable consequences of his act, even though the precise result which followed may not have been anticipated. Doyle v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 607-610, 4 L. R. A. 420, 42 N. W. 555. An "accident" may be defined as an event happening unexpectedly and without fault. Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593. Now, it cannot be said that defendant was without fault for the slip of the foot, which he urges in excuse, if it grew out of or resulted from his negligent act. There was evidence tending to show that defendant, in brutally beating the horse while plaintiff was holding it, did so for no other purpose than to vent his rage by inflicting physical pain on the object of his fury. The slip of the foot that caused the blow to go amiss cannot, if this state of facts is true, be said to have been without defendant's fault. He could not reasonably have supposed the horse would stand quietly and receive the punishment administered. If, then, he was negligent in striking the animal as he did, he cannot escape because some intervening cause, growing out of his wrong, aided in producing the result of which complaint is made. Gould v. Schermer, 101 Iowa, 583, 70 N. W. 497.

The case at bar is stronger in its facts than the one cited, for here there is evidence tending to show the claimed intervening cause was brought about by defendant's wrongful act. But if it can be said the sixth instruction given by the court submitted to the jury the question of whether defendant was negligent as matter of fact in striking the horse, though we must say we are not inclined to give it that construction, there is still another point to be considered.

2. In the ninth paragraph of the court's charge, the jury were told: "It is not material or necessary for you to find whether or not the act of defendant in whipping or striking the horse was unlawful." It was claimed on behalf of appellant that, if defendant was engaged in the doing of an unlawful act which resulted in injury to plaintiff, such conduct would be negligence as matter of law. There was evidence going to show that defendant was guilty of a violation of § 4969 of the Code, which imposes a penalty for cruelty to animals. "The general rule of law, however, is that whoever does an illegal or wrongful act is answerable for all the consequences that ensue in the ordinary and natural course of events." 1 Addison, Torts, 7. In Messenger v. Pate, 42 Iowa, 443, defendant was sued for an injury caused by the unboxed tumbling rod of a threshing machine. The statute made it a misdemeanor to operate a machine with such rods unboxed. This court announced the following rule of law in that case: "We concur in the general proposition that whenever an act is enjoined or prohibited by law, and the violation of the statute is made a misdemeanor, any injury to the person of another, caused by such violation, is the subject of an action; and it is sufficient to allege the violation of the law as the basis of the right to recover, and as constituting the negligence complained of." So, likewise, it is held that, where one is unlawfully carrying a loaded revolver, he is liable for injuries done another by its discharge, although the person injured assented to the revolver being carried. Evans v. Waite, 83 Wis. 286, 53 N. W. 445. See also Weick v. Lander, 75 Ill. 93; Salisbury v. Herchenroder, 106 Mass. 459, 8 Am. Rep. 354; Conn v. May, 36 Iowa, 244. If the defendant was doing an unlawful act in beating the horse, he is liable for damages caused thereby, and the subsequent accidental slip would not shield him, for the reasons already stated. The well-known Squib Case is a leading authority illustrative of the principle that one who wrongfully sets in motion a force by which another is injured is liable, although an intervening agency, not in itself wrongful, aided in producing the result. Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 797. We do not regard the case of Tingle v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 333, 14 N. W. 320, cited by appellee, as in conflict with the views here expressed. In that case the unlawful act (operating a train on Sunday) was a condition, but not a cause, of the injury done.

For the reasons given, the case must go back for a new trial.

Reversed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FOURTH CIRCUIT.

Mrs. M. C. COBB, Appt.,
v.
J. P. OVERMAN.

(48 C. C. A. 223, 109 Fed. 65.)

Liability upon a penal bond conditioned for the payment of rents and annuities to another during life is within the provisions of § 63a of the bankruptcy act of 1898, allowing the proving against the bankrupt's estate of a fixed liability, evidenced by instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition, whether then payable or not; but the claim proved must be limited to the penalty of the bond, where the computed value of the expectancy exceeds that amount.

(May 10, 1901.)

NOTE.—What constitutes a fixed liability as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy.

I. Judgments.

- a. In general.
- b. For alimony.

II. Written instruments.

- a. In general.
- b. Bonds.
- c. Notes.
- d. Leases.

III. Conclusion.

As this provision of the present bankruptcy act, § 63a, subd. 1, as to the provability of debts which are a fixed liability as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against the bankrupt, whether then payable or not, is materially different from any provision contained in any former bankruptcy act, either in this country or in England, this note is confined to decisions arising under the present act.

I. Judgments.

a. In general.

As § 17a, subd. 2, of the bankruptcy act provides that a discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his "provable debts" except such as are judgments in actions for fraud or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for wilfully or maliciously injuring the person or property of another, it is evident that judgments of that nature were considered to be provable by the framers of the act.

Very few decisions have been rendered as to the provability of judgments of any kind except for alimony, as will be seen.

In Re Alderson, 98 Fed. 588, the district judge for West Virginia held that a judgment in favor of a state against a bankrupt, imposing a fine for unlawful retailing, was a provable debt, and was also released by the discharge of the bankrupt, and was not entitled to precedence in the distribution of his estate.

But in Re Moore, 111 Fed. 145, Evans, District Judge of Kentucky, who was a member of Congress at the time the bankruptcy act was passed, expressly refused to follow the preceding case, and held that a judgment for a fine in favor of a state in a criminal prosecution was not provable so as to be released by a discharge.

APPPEAL by claimant from a judgment of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of North Carolina rejecting a claim against the estate of G. W. Cobb, a bankrupt. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Goff and Simonton, Circuit Judges, and Waddill, District Judge.

Messrs. P. H. Williams and E. F. Aydlett, for appellant:

The claim of Mrs. M. C. Cobb is such an one that when the bankrupt is discharged in bankruptcy her debt is discharged, and for the debt to be discharged its full value must be ascertained.

Plaintiff has the right to have the contract valued, taking into consideration the expectancy of her life, for the $25 per month charge in bankruptcy, stating that while it might possibly appear to come within the letter of the statute he was persuaded that, as neither state nor national government is mentioned in the act in connection with the effect of a discharge, its obligation could not properly be held to embrace judgments imposed in executing the public criminal laws.

In Re Baker, 96 Fed. 954, the question at issue was whether or not a judgment for the support of a bastard child would be released by the discharge in bankruptcy of the putative father, and the court, while holding that a discharge would not operate as a release of the judgment, even if it were provable, states that it is not at all clear that it is provable.

And Re Hubbard, 98 Fed. 710, holds that a discharge in bankruptcy will not release the bankrupt from the obligation to obey an order of a state court for the payment of a certain amount weekly for the support of two minor children, and proceedings to compel the payment of weekly instalments subsequent to the filing of the petition will not be stayed. The district judge does not state in his opinion whether the reason for his holding is that it was not a judgment, but an order only, which was sought to be enforced, or whether the reason was that it was not a provable debt; but there seems to be nothing in § 17 which would justify a holding that the discharge did not operate as a release, other than that the debt was not provable.

Re Lipman, 94 Fed. 353, holds that a judgment which is barred by limitation at the time the petition in bankruptcy is filed is not a provable claim, even though it is inserted in the schedule by the bankrupt, as such insertion does not revive the claim.

b. For alimony.

Only one attempt to prove a judgment for alimony seems to have been made under the present law, the question as to provability arising in other cases in connection with the question whether or not the judgment has been or will be released by a discharge in bankruptcy, the only ground on which it seemingly can be held to be released, under § 17 of the bankruptcy act, being that it is a provable debt.

It seems now to be thoroughly decided that a judgment for alimony is not a provable debt so as to be released by a discharge in bankruptcy, as to instalments accruing either before or after the filing of the petition. In those states where such judgments are subject to modification by the court; and it seems very probable that annuity, and of G. W. Cobb's life, for the rent of the bank building, and to prove the amount she would be entitled to, and to ascertain its present value.

Re Ella, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 564.

The value of an annuity bond is such a sum as will purchase a similar bond in a solvent company for the remainder of the life.

Mr. G. W. Ward for appellee.

Waddill, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented for the consideration of the court is the correctness of the decision of the lower court in rejecting a claim of $4,300.98, allowed by the referee in behalf of the appellant on a debt asserted by her against the bankrupt estate. The case is one of involuntary bankruptcy. The petition was filed on the 30th of November, 1898, and adjudication had on the 30th of December of the same year. The claim was based upon the following penal bond, viz.:

Know all men by these presents, that I, George W. Cobb, principal, and M. B. Culpepper, surety, are held and firmly bound unto Mrs. Marie C. Cobb in the just and full sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000), to the payment whereof, well and truly to be made to the said Mrs. Marie C. Cobb, her executors, administrators, and assigns, we the ultimate decision will be that such a judgment is not provable so as to be released by a discharge in any state unless it has been rendered on an agreement of the parties.

Only four decisions have been rendered holding that such judgments are provable and released by a discharge. In Re Challoner, 98 Fed. 82, one of the district judges in Illinois held that alimony due under a decree of divorce prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy was a debt under the bankruptcy law according to the decisions of the Illinois court, such as would be released by a discharge in bankruptcy and consequently the wife would be restrained from bringing any proceedings in the state court pending the bankruptcy proceedings to enforce the decree for alimony. The judge stated that it was not necessary at the time to pass upon the status of any alimony which might become due after the adjudication, but restrained any proceedings in the state court as to alimony already accrued and that to accrue after the adjudication pending the bankruptcy proceedings. But in Barclay v. Barclay, 184 Ill. 375, 51 L. R. A. 351, 56 N. E. 636, and Deen v. Bloomer, 191 Ill. 416, 61 N. E. 131, 3 N. B. N. Rep. 1037, infra, the Illinois supreme court held that such decree for alimony was not provable, and would not be discharged.

In Re Van Orden, 96 Fed. 86, the district judge for New Jersey holds that a claim for monthly instalments of alimony as fixed by a decree of divorce is a provable debt, as the mere liability to support and maintain his wife, which existed before the decree of divorce, was thereby fixed and became a debt, and consequently a state court would be enjoined from prosecuting a suit for such alimony. But this decision seems to have been based largely on that of Wetmore v. Wetmore, 149 N. Y. 521, 33 L. R. A. 708, 44 N. E. 169, and it will be seen from the decisions below that in New York a decree for alimony is held not to be provable, or to be released by the discharge. And in Barclay v. Barclay, 184 Ill. 375, 51 L. R. A. 351, 56 N. E. 636, infra, the court states that they do not concur with the reasoning of the court in this case.

In Re Houston, 94 Fed. 119, Evans, District Judge for the district of Kentucky, who was a member of Congress at the time the bankruptcy act was passed, held that a judgment requiring the defendant in a divorce case to pay a fixed amount weekly to the plaintiff as alimony is, as to instalments due at the time of the adjudication, a provable debt against the bankrupt's estate, and consequently would be released by a discharge in bankruptcy; and said also that, while deciding only as to past-due instalments, he was strongly inclined to the opinion that the peculiar form of the judgment by which alimony was usually allowed might be properly classed among the unliquidated demands to be liquidated and made certain as to future instalments pursuant to the provisions of § 63 of the bankruptcy act. The real question at issue, however, in this case was whether the bankrupt could be adjudged in contempt by the state court for failure to pay alimony after the bankruptcy court had ordered a stay of proceedings, and the case was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals in Wagner v. United States, 43 C. C. A. 445, 104 Fed. 133, solely on the ground that the order of the bankruptcy court staying the proceeding was valid and within its jurisdiction, whether or not the claim for alimony was a provable debt, the court expressly stating that the question as to the provability of the decree for alimony was immaterial, and was not passed upon by it.

And in Fite v. Fite, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1638, 61 S. W. 26, the Kentucky court of appeals, following Re Houston, 94 Fed. 119, supra, held that a claim for monthly instalments of alimony, whether accruing before or after the adjudication in bankruptcy, was provable as a fixed liability, and released by the discharge. The court says in this case that some of the state courts have reached a different conclusion, but that the law in some of the states in regard to alimony differs materially from the law in Kentucky, and that the court has nothing to do with the question of sentiment which might be supposed to enter into the matter, nor could the moral duty, if any, to pay the alimony, be considered in determining the law governing the case.

On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court in Audubon v. Shufeldt, 181 U. S. 575, 45 L. ed. 1009, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 735, Reversing 2 N. B. N. Rep. 517, holds that alimony, whether in arrears at the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings or subsequently accruing, is not provable in bankruptcy or barred by the discharge. The court in this case said that permanent alimony was considered as a portion of the husband's estate to which the wife is equitably entitled, rather than as strictly a debt, and that alimony from time to time might be considered as a portion of the husband's current income, and the considerations affecting it might be better weighed by the court having jurisdiction of the relation of husband and wife than by a court of different jurisdiction, and that in the District of Columbia, whence the appeal was taken, an allowance of alimony was not in the nature of an absolute debt, and was not unconditional and unchangeable, but might promise and bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals, and dated this 28th day of April, in the year 1897. The conditions of the above obligation is such that whereas, there has grown up a dispute between the said George W. Cobb, both in his fiduciary capacity as guardian of the children of Kenneth R. Cobb and as the manager of a certain sum of money, the property of Mrs. Marie C. Cobb, the total of which is, including the fiduciary claim, $7,955.47, and which the said George W. Cobb claims to have paid in full, but which the said heirs at law and wards of the said George W. Cobb, the children of Kenneth R. Cobb, Sr., deceased, claim was not legally paid to them, but, if it was paid, was paid to their mother or others; and whereas, in consideration of the premises, and in order to finally adjust and terminate and close the said fiduciary account, and also any claim for the said sum of $7,955.47, the said Mrs. Marie C. Cobb, Kenneth R. Cobb, Jr., and Marie Celeste Cobb, his wife, Emma Heloise Anderson and James W. Anderson, her husband, Marie Celine Lewis and Arthur G. Lewis, her husband, and Lillian R. Cobb have this day signed, sealed, and delivered their receipt in full for the above-named sum, and have thereby fully released the said George W. Cobb, guardian, as to any claim they may have against him on account of his fiduciary capacity as such guardian, and have, as a further consideration, signed, sealed, and delivered unto the said George W. Cobb a deed of bargain and sale and quitclaim as to all of their right, title, and interest in and to a certain house and lot situated in the town of Elizabeth City, North and is founded on public policy, and is for the good of society.

And Justice Brown, one of the district judges in New York, held that overdue weekly instalments of alimony adjudged to the divorced wife by the decree of divorce would not be released by the husband's discharge in bankruptcy, and consequently the wife would not be stayed, pending the bankruptcy proceedings, from pursuing in a state court proper proceedings to collect the same, except where a preference upon assets was sought. Re Shepard, 97 Fed. 187; Re Anderson, 97 Fed. 321.

And in Turner v. Turner, 198 Fed. 785, Baker, District Judge of the district of Indiana, holds that a gross sum awarded as alimony by the decree of divorce before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy is not a debt which is a fixed liability as evidenced by a judgment absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition, as alimony is not strictly a debt due the wife, but is rather a general duty to support, made specific by the decree of the court, and that the alimony is not awarded as a debt but for the enforcement of a duty growing out of the marital relations, which is not severed by the husband's misconduct. The court also asks: "If a discharge will not release the bankrupt husband from his liability to furnish his wife support, why should such discharge absolve him from the performance of this duty when, on account of the violation of his marriage contract, a court has decreed the amount of money that he should pay in satisfaction of this duty?"

And Barclay v. Barclay, 184 Ill. 375, 51 L. R. A. 351, 56 N. E. 636, holds that a decree for alimony is a penalty imposed for failure to perform a duty, and is always subject to modification of the court according to the varying circumstances of the parties, there being some circumstances which would even authorize a change in the amount for which the husband is in arrears, and that in consequence such a decree is not a provable debt, even as to amounts which have accrued at the time of the filing of the petition, so as to entitle the husband to a discharge in bankruptcy. Boggs, J., stated that he concurred in the decision except so far as the opinion might be construed to hold that alimony which had accrued and become payable against the husband was not a provable claim.

And Deen v. Bloomer, 191 Ill. 416, 61 N. E. 121, 3 N. B. N. Rep. 1037, Reversing 93 Ill. App. 479, holds that a decree for alimony is not released by a discharge in bankruptcy, as it cannot be regarded as a debt owing from the husband to the wife, whether accruing before or after the bankruptcy proceeding, but that the duty which the law imposes on the husband and father to support the wife and children is a social obligation as well as a pecuniary liability, 54 L. R. A.

And in Re Smith, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 67, Hotchkiss, referee, holds that in New York alimony which had accrued before the adjudication in bankruptcy, whether temporary or permanent, is not provable, and therefore is not affected by the bankrupt's discharge, as it is not a debt because it is not assignable or suable or collectible except in certain specified ways, but is a natural duty reduced to dollars and cents, and is the obligation to support the wife which was taken on marriage and continuing through life which has been measured up and temporarily determined by a court, but which is absolutely inalienable and undischageable and, save in amount, beyond the control of the courts except with the consent or on default of the wife; and that the husband must, so long as he is able, stand between the state and the injured wife in order that she may not become a public charge.

And in Re Nowell, 99 Fed. 931, Lowell, District Judge, holds that in Massachusetts, where the decree for alimony is always open to modification on any change in the situation of the husband or wife, and where notice to the hus-and Young v. Young, 35 Misc. 335, 71 N. Y. Supp. 944, following the decisions of Justice Brown above, holds that a discharge in bankruptcy does not affect the bankrupt's liability to pay alimony, whether accruing before or after the filing of the petition.

And Malsner v. Malsner, 62 App. Div. 286, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1107, holds that a discharge in bankruptcy does not release the bankrupt from liability to pay alimony which had accrued prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, as a claim for alimony is not a debt which is a fixed liability, within § 63a, subd. 1, but that the decree is merely an admeasurement by the court of the material obligation of support, which obligation is thereby made a specific duty, the court having authority to provide in the decree for a modification of its terms if it chooses, and having power to compel obedience to its terms by other methods than those ordinarily resorted to to enforce a judgment.

And in Re Nowell, 99 Fed. 931, Lowell, District Judge, holds that in Massachusetts, where the decree for alimony is always open to modification on any change in the situation of the husband or wife, and where notice to the hus-

Carolina, and which was formerly the property of Mrs. Emma Cobb, deceased; and whereas, in consideration of the said quitclaim and the said deed, the said George W. Cobb covenanted on his part as follows: To rent the bank building now occupied by Guirkin & Company as bankers, situated in the town of Elizabeth City, North Carolina, and to pay a monthly rental for the same of $12.50, payable monthly to Mrs. M. C. Cobb, who is authorized to receive and receipt for the same for the term of the natural life of the said Mrs. M. C. Cobb, to keep the said bank building in reasonable repair, subject to natural wear and tear, to pay the taxes and insurance on the said building and land, the said building to be insured in the sum of not less than $500, and shall also pay to the said Mrs. M. C. Cobb during her natural life the sum of $25.00 per month at the end of each month, and shall pay off and satisfy the judgment obtained in favor of one Wheeler, and assigned to George W. Cobb, against the aforesaid Kenneth R. Cobb, deceased, and duly of record in the proper clerk's office in Pasquotank county: Now, if the said George W. Cobb shall well and truly perform each and every the covenants herein named, and in the manner named, this obligation to be null and void; otherwise, to be in full force and virtue.

Witness: J. P. Overman.

Should Geo. W. Cobb die prior to Mrs. M. C. Cobb, in that event the rent of the bank building shall cease upon the death of said Cobb.

The referee, in his report, certifies the following: band is necessary where the wife seeks to collect arrears by legal process, and where the husband, may, without modification of the original decree, move that the amount to be collected be reduced because of a change in the circumstances of either party, and where the husband's executors may have the arrears due at the husband's death modified on motion, a claim for arrears due at the time of the husband's bankruptcy is not a fixed liability absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition, and that in consequence the claim therefor will not be released by a discharge in bankruptcy, and the wife will not be enjoined from prosecuting proper proceedings in a state court to collect the same. Justice Lowell also holds that a claim for future alimony is not a fixed liability absolutely owing, but is contingent on many circumstances, such as the life of the husband and wife, or a modification of the decree, and that such contingent claim would be impossible of valuation, even if proof of contingent liability were permitted by the act.

And in Re Smith, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 67, the referee also holds that liability for future alimony under a decree of separation is not a fixed liability evidenced by a judgment within § 63a, subd. 1, so as to be capable of liquidation under § 63b, as, under the New York Code, § 1771, the court has power at any time to annul, vary, or modify its former directions. He also holds that the same is true as to alimony which has accrued since the adjudication in bankruptcy and before the time the attempt to collect it is made.

And in Re Lawrie, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 77, the referee holds that a judgment for alimony is not a final division or distribution of the husband's estate, but under the Wisconsin statute is a judgment for alimony "out of" the husband's estate for the wife's support and maintenance, and is subject to revision and alteration from time to time, and therefore is not a fixed liability. Another reason given by the referee for holding that a judgment is not provable is that the bankrupt would by a contrary holding be allowed to place his wife on a par with other creditors, and thus enable her to participate in the distribution of the estate, a thing not allowed by law.

And Sargent v. Sargent, 3 N. B. N. Rep. 516, decided in the Ohio common pleas, holds that a decree for alimony in the ordinary form, requiring the husband to pay a specified amount monthly as alimony until a designated amount should be paid, is subject to modification by the court at any time before it is satisfied on any ground subsequently arising that requires or justifies such modification, and that in consequence it is not provable as a fixed liability, and is not discharged by a judgment. But the court states that where the decree is of a kind or form which makes it absolute, as where it is an adoption by the court of an agreement between the parties, it is not the judgment of the court based on evidence, but simply an agreement of the parties carried into the decree, and cannot be modified by the court, and is accordingly a fixed liability.

And in People ex rel. Buckel v. Grell, 65 N. Y. Supp. 522, the court held that a decree for alimony is not a debt "founded on contract" within the meaning of the bankruptcy act, as there was a continual duty resting on the husband, arising out of the marital relation, to support his wife during her life, and therefore a decree for alimony was not affected by a discharge in bankruptcy. The court in this case did not discuss the question as to the provability of the decree as a fixed liability under § 63a, subd. 1.

Counsel fees.

Counsel fees pendente lite in a divorce suit are a part of the law's means to measure alimony, and an incident to a proper measure in money of the husband's duty, and therefore are not provable in bankruptcy, nor released by the discharge. Re Smith, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 67.

II. Written instruments.

a. In general.

In Re Chambers, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 864, the referee says that a "fixed liability" is a liability which is settled and determined, as opposed to an unsettled, undetermined, and uncertain liability, and that "absolutely owing" would mean unconditionally, wholly owing, as opposed to a liability which depends upon the fulfillment of some condition, or the doing of some act, or happening of some event, before it attaches.

In Re McCauley, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 1085, the referee holds that an open account due from the bankrupt is a fixed liability absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition, within § 63a, subd. 1.

An agreement by the holder, as trustee, of the naked legal title to land owned by a bankrupt corporation to mortgage such land as security for the debt of a third person does not constitute a fixed liability against the bankrupt, as such trustee has no authority to bind the corporation as an accommodation surety by the mortgage of its property. Re Columbia Real Estate Co. 8 N. B. N. Rep. 157.

Where a mortgage provides for the payment lowing facts in connection with the debt: That G. W. Cobb, the bankrupt, failed in October, 1898; that since the 1st of October, 1899, nothing has been paid on the said bond; that M. B. Culpepper, the surety on the bond, is insolvent; that the contract is for value; and that there is due on the bond $518.75, being arrearages from the time of discontinuance of payment to February 1, 1900, less $85.25, paid on account of rent. The referee further found that the age of Mrs. Cobb, the appellant, was fifty years, and that of G. W. Cobb fifty-six years; that Mrs. Cobb's expectancy was twenty and nine tenths years and G. W. Cobb's expectancy was sixteen and seven tenths years; and that, pursuant to § 1352 of the Code of North Carolina, Mrs. Cobb was entitled to prove her claim for $2,780.23, being the amount allowed as the value of her contract under the agreement to pay her $25 per month during her lifetime, and the sum of $1,200 for rent of the building during the lifetime of G. W. Cobb,—making a total sum of $3,980.23,—which two sums were allowed by the referee, together with the arrearages of $518.75, due as aforesaid on the bond, aggregating $4,300.98. The learned judge of the lower court excluded the claim as an entirety, holding that under the present bankruptcy act (§ 63a) a liability only existed for the amount of arrearages due on the bond at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and that no claim could be asserted, either for the instalments falling due after the filing of the petition to the date of the referee's report, or for any commuted value of the payments thereafter to become due thereunder, such claims not being debts ab-of specified attorneys' fees if the holder of the mortgage elects or it should become necessary to foreclose by suit or proceedings in court, and the mortgagor becomes bankrupt, and the creditor proves his claim as a secured debt, and the mortgaged property is sold by the trustee in bankruptcy at private sale under order of the court out of the proceeds of which the debt is paid, the mortgages cannot prove and recover the attorneys' fee, as the foreclosure on which the liability to pay the same depended did not take place. Re Roche, 42 C. C. A. 115, 101 Fed. 956

b. Bonds.

COBB V. OVERMANN holds that the liability of the principal obligor to the obligee on a penal bond in a certain amount conditioned for the payment of specified monthly rentals and annuities during the lifetime of the obligee is a fixed liability absolutely owing, as the penalty of the bond with the instalments thereon became absolutely owing at the time of its execution, and future instalments to become due thereon after the filing of the petition are covered by the provision "whether then payable or not." But where the value of such demand as ascertained from the life tables exceeds the penalty of the bond, only the debt for the penalty is provable.

But Goding v. Rosenthal (Mass.) 61 N. E. 222, holds that the liability of the principal to reimburse the surety, although evidenced by an instrument in writing and in one sense a fixed liability, is contingent upon the happening of a breach of the bond and a payment by the surety, and does not constitute a provable debt against the principal where no payment by the surety or breach of the bond occurs until several months after the filing of the petition, as merely contingent claims are not provable.

The liability of a defendant in replevin on a bond with sureties, given by him for the purpose of reclaiming the goods replevied, is so contingent that it is not a provable debt under the present bankruptcy act, and his discharge in bankruptcy pending the replevin suit does not, therefore, release him from such liability. Clemmons v. Brinn, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1066.

c. Notes.

The liability of the bankrupt as indorser of a note which is not due at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy is not a fixed liability absolutely owing, within § 63a, subd. 1, of the bankruptcy act, although it is held to be a provable debt under other provisions of the act.

Thus, in Re Gerson, 47 C. C. A. 49, 107 Fed. 897, affirming 105 Fed. 891, the circuit court of appeals of the third circuit holds that the liability of a bankrupt indorser of commercial paper, whose liability did not become absolute until after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, is provable as an "express contract, under § 63a, subd. 4." The court states that the contract created by such an indorsement is not governed by subd. 1, relating to fixed liability, but says that instruments like surety bonds under which the liability is contingent on future defaults and where the amount of the liability is wholly uncertain, depending on the nature of the default, are fairly referable to such subd. 1. The court also states that such subd. 1 does not qualify, and is not to be carried down and read into, subd. 4, but that they are distinct and independent clauses. In the court below (105 Fed. 891) the decision was to the same effect, that the claim was not provable as a fixed liability under subd. 1, but that, even before demand and notice of default, there was a contingent liability on the part of the indorser which would be fairly within the words "demand or claim" as used in § 1, defining "debt," and could be proved under § 63a, subd. 4, after the liability became absolute.

And Re Schaefer, 104 Fed. 973, holds that a note to a third person payable to the bankrupt and indorsed by him, which does not appear to have been given for accommodation, and which had not matured at the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, but had matured before the adjudication, is not a provable debt, under § 63a, subd. 1, the court stating that such clause made no provision for liabilities that were contingent only, and that an indorser's liability before the maturity of the note and the taking of proper steps to charge him with notice of nonpayment was contingent only. At a later date, as shown by a note at the close of the opinion, the previous order was remanded, and the referee directed to allow the claim, nothing being said as to the reason for the change; but from the decision of the same judge in Re Gerson, 105 Fed. 891, supra, it appears that the reason was that he considered the claim to be provable as an "express contract" under subd. 4, still holding that it was not a fixed liability provable under subd. 1.

And in Re Marks, 6 Am. Bankr. Rep. 641, the referee held that the liability of the bankrupt firm as indorsers on notes discounted for them by a bank, and which became due after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, continued contingent, notwithstanding the execution of an agreement in the firm name a few days before the bankruptcy and after the execution by the olutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy.

Section 63a (1) of the bankruptcy act is as follows: "A fixed liability, as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him, whether then payable or not, with any interest thereon which would have been recoverable at that date or with a rebate of interest upon such as were not then payable and did not bear interest." [30 Stat. at L. 563, chap. 541.]

The present bankruptcy act, unlike the one of 1841, does not provide specifically for the payment of annuities, or, like the act of 1867, in terms for the payment of contingent debts and liabilities generally contracted by the bankrupt; and hence the question to be determined is whether the language above quoted is sufficiently broad to include a liability of the character here presented. The debt asserted by the appellant was for the penalty of the bond, $3,000, claiming the same to be due, and that no part thereof had been paid. The statute of North Carolina (Code 1883, vol. 1, § 1352) provides a method for computing the value of an expectancy, and under such statute the referee correctly calculated the value of future instalments to become due under said penal bond. The section of the bankruptcy act in question seems sufficiently broad to cover the claim. The debts referred to, which may be proved, are "a fixed liability, as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition, whether then payable or not." We have here an instrument in writing creating a fixed liability, the maximum of which, so far as the right to recover on the firm of an assignment for creditors by which the firm assumed liability as makers of such notes, which agreement was delivered to one of the directors of the bank, but was not signed or assented to by it; and also held that their liability as indorsers was not provable as a fixed liability absolutely owing at the time of the bankruptcy, the expression "absolutely owing" having apparently been inserted solely to exclude contingent claims. He also held in the first part of the opinion that the claim was not provable under subd. 4, but in the latter part of the opinion states that in deference to the decision of the circuit court of appeals in Re Gerson, 47 C. C. A. 49, 107 Fed. 897, supra, which was announced after the first part of the opinion was written, he allowed the claim of the bank to be proved after deducting all payments by the makers up to the time of making the allowance, refusing the claim of the bank that no deductions should be made unless they so reduced the amount due on any particular note that it would be less than the dividend allowed.

And in Re Chambers, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 864, the referee held that a claim by a bank against a bankrupt on a note indorsed by him, which the bank had discounted for him, and which was not due at the time of filing the petition, but which had become due and had been protested before the filing of proof of claim, does not constitute a fixed liability absolutely owing, as the liability of an indorser before maturity is contingent on the maker not paying the note on demand and notice of nonpayment being given at maturity. The referee also upholds his decision under the provision of the bankruptcy act of 1867, relating to indorsers, which provides that if the bankrupt shall be bound as indorser upon any note, and his liability shall not have become "absolute" until after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the creditor may prove the same after such liability shall have become "fixed" and before the final dividend shall have been declared, stating that the use of the terms "absolute" and "fixed" in such section in connection with the liability of an indorser conclusively showed that the framers of that act did not regard the liability of an indorser before the maturity of the note as "absolute" and "fixed," and that the language of such act must have been in the minds of the framers of the present act, who undoubtedly gave to the terms "fixed" and "absolutely owing" the same meaning which had been attached to them in the previous statute.

In Re Dunnigan, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 755, the referee holds that where one of three joint makers of a note was adjudicated a bankrupt before the 64 L. R. A.

maturity of the note, and one of the other makers, who is conceded to be an accommodation party to the note, paid it in full at its maturity, the latter cannot prove against the bankrupt a claim for his proportionate share of the amount so paid as a fixed liability absolutely owing, as at the time of the adjudication the claim was but a contingent liability or mere possibility of a debt depending upon his being compelled to pay and actually paying the note in whole or in part.

And Lamolle County Nat. Bank v. Stevens, 107 Fed. 245, holds that a note executed by a bankrupt firm for a firm debt does not become a separate debt of one of the partners as between him and the firm because he was an indorser of the note and his liability as indorser has not been fixed, and that even if such liability had been fixed it would still be apparently a firm debt.

The liability of the bankrupt as guarantor of the payment at maturity, or any time thereafter, of a note given by the purchaser of a wagon sold by the bankrupt as agent for the claimant, which note was not due at the time of filing the petition, is not a fixed liability within such § 63a, subd. 1. Re McCauley, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 1085.

Smith v. Wheeler, 55 App. Div. 170, 66 N. Y. Supp. 780, holds that the bankrupt maker of a note to the payee who is compelled to pay it after the bankruptcy may prove the same under § 574, nothing being said as to a fixed liability within § 63a, subd. 1.

Notes executed by the bankrupt, and not due at the filing of the petition, are a fixed liability within such subd. 1. Re McCauley, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 1085.

As to notes given for rent which had not accrued at the time of the filing of the petition, see Atkins v. Wilcox, 53 L. R. A. 118, 44 C. C. A. 626, 105 Fed. 595, infra, II. d.

d. Leases.

According to almost all the decisions rendered, only a few cases in Pennsylvania holding the contrary, rent which had not accrued at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy is not provable as a fixed liability or otherwise.

Thus, in Re Collignon, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 250, the referee said that as to a claim for rent to accrue subsequent to the bankruptcy the law has been well settled, and seems to be, that instalments of rent accruing after the time of the bankruptcy are neither provable debts against the estate nor affected by the discharge.

And in Reed v. Phinney, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 1000, the referee said that from the decisions "a particular obligation, is $3,000. The language, "absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition," is clear. The penalty of the bond, with the instalments to become due thereon, became absolutely owing at the time of the execution of the instrument, and the language of the act, "whether then payable or not," clearly covers the future instalments to become due thereunder.

In Riggin v. Magwire, 15 Wall. 549, 552, 21 L. ed. 232, Mr. Justice Bradley, in passing upon the question of a contingent liability under the bankruptcy act of 1841, said: "But the better opinion is that, as long as it remained wholly uncertain whether a contract or engagement would ever give rise to an actual duty or liability, and there was no means of removing the uncertainty by calculation, such contract or engagement was not provable under the act of 1841. . . .

claims for rent it seemed to be the settled rule that rent which had accrued at the date of filing the petition might be proved as a debt against the estate, and held that only those instalments which had become due and payable before the bankruptcy were provable, no matter how large a portion of the instalment period had passed at that time.

And in Re Shilladay, 1 N. B. N. 475, 80 Pittab. L. J. N. S. 54, the referee allowed claims for rent due and owing at the time of filing the petition and adjudication in bankruptcy giving a priority to such claims, but disallowed a claim for instalments falling due after the adjudication, on the ground that it was not a provable claim against the estate.

And Bray v. Cobb, 100 Fed. 270, holds that a landlord is not entitled to prove a claim for rent against a bankrupt after such bankrupt ceases to use the building, as the contractual relations are terminated by the bankruptcy, and the court says that if the trustee elects to reject the lease, and surrenders the premises, neither the trustee nor the bankrupt's estate is liable for rent after the election of the trustee and the property ceases to be used for the administration of the estate. This decision was reversed by the circuit court of appeals in COBB V. OVERMAN (supra, II. b), on the ground that the claim for rent was absolutely owing under an agreement therefor contained in a penal bond, nothing being said therein as to liability on the lease itself.

In Re Arnstein, 101 Fed. 706, the referee, whose decision was affirmed by the district judge, holds that under a lease having several years to run at the time of the filing of the petition only the rent which had accrued before such filing constitutes a fixed liability then absolutely owing, as future rent, as such, is an incident to, and grows out of the use and occupancy of, the premises, and is the consideration therefor, and cannot therefore be a fixed liability then absolutely owing, or a "debt" of any kind, as the word is used in the bankruptcy statute, but is only an unmatured obligation to pay in the future a consideration for future enjoyment and occupancy, and therefore cannot be a present debt, demand, or claim at all within such provision.

And Re Mahler, 105 Fed. 428, Affirming 2 N. B. N. Rep. 70, holds that rent to accrue monthly under a lease after the adjudication in bankruptcy of the tenant on his own petition is not provable against his estate as a fixed liability absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition as before the day on which rent is covenanted to be paid it is in no sense a debt, being neither debitum nor solvendum, as it never be-

In 1843 Martin Thomas was still living, and there was no certainty that his wife would ever survive him. It was uncertain whether there would ever be any claim or demand. On what principle, then, could the covenant have been liquidated or reduced to present or probable value? If an action at law had been brought on the covenant at that time, nominal damages at most, if any damages at all, could have been recovered. It did not come within the category of annuities and debts payable in the future, which are absolute, existing claims. If it had come within that category, the value of the wife's probability of survivorship after the death of her husband might have been calculated on the principles of life annuities."

comes payable if the tenant is evicted before that day, or if he quits or assigns his term with the landlord's consent. The court also holds that it is not an unliquidated claim capable of liquidation and valuation which may be proved and allowed after its amount has been ascertained, as the present bankruptcy act does not expressly authorize the proof of contingent claims as the preceding bankruptcy acts did, and such a claim would not be provable even under those acts, as its very existence depends upon a contingency. The court expressly states in this case that he does not decide whether the bankrupt will remain liable under his covenants notwithstanding the discharge, but the referee stated that his liability under such covenants was not released.

And Re Jefferson, 93 Fed. 948, holds that a claim for rent under a written lease providing for payment in monthly instalments accruing after adjudication in bankruptcy of the tenant is not a provable debt so as to entitle the landlord to a priority of payment out of the estate under a state statute giving the landlord a lien on the tenant's property on the premises to secure the payment of one year's rent due or to become due, as the lease and the relation of landlord and tenant were absolutely terminated by the adjudication, as well as all other contracts of the bankrupt and his right to occupy the premises as well; and that, in consequence, the future rent is not a fixed liability, and that no rent accrued after such adjudication. The district judge states that in reaching his conclusion he has paid little attention to a forfeiture clause in the lease, as he should have reached the same conclusion if there had been no such clause, and if the Kentucky statute had not also contained a similar provision. In Re Ellis, 98 Fed. 967, infra, Lowell, J., criticizes the holding, in this case, that the lease is absolutely terminated by the adjudication, and says that, notwithstanding the refusal of the trustee in bankruptcy to take the lease, the bankrupt would remain tenant as before, citing as illustration a lease for several hundred years on which the rent had all been paid in advance except one dollar a year, and which it would accordingly be to the trustee's interest to retain. In Atkins v. Wilcox, 53 L. R. A. 118, 44 C. C. A. 626, 105 Fed. 595, infra, the circuit court of appeals stated that while Justice Lowell's example was in form a leasehold it was in fact the purchase of a freehold for a present consideration paid at the beginning of the term, the subsequent burden being so inconsiderable that it might well be disregarded.

And in Re Frankel, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 840, the referee, whose opinion is affirmed by the district ther holds that the value of that class of debts can be calculated upon the principle of life annuities.

In Wolf v. Stie, 99 U. S. 1, 25 L. ed. 309, Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in discussing the question of the liability arising under a replevin bond in an attachment proceeding to answer the judgment of the court for the value of the goods replevied, and whether such liability constituted a contingent debt provable in bankruptcy, under the act of 1867, said, at pages 7 and 8, 99 U. S., and page 113, 25 L. ed.: "The debt thus created was provable under the bankrupt act. It was payable upon the happening of an event which might never occur, and was, therefore, contingent. The bond was in full force when the petition in bankruptcy was filed. The sum to be paid was certain in amount. Whether the event would ever occur which would require the payment is uncertain; but, if it did occur, the amount to be paid was fixed."

We have not been referred to any authority bearing directly on this subject under the present bankruptcy act, and have found none ourselves, though the case of Re Lipke, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 569, 98 Fed. 970, incidentally touches thereon, but the conclusions we have reached herein are amply supported by reason and authority. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 156, 26 L. ed. 968, 974; Glenn v. Abell, 39 Fed. 10; Re Alexander, 1 Low, Dec. 470, Fed. Cas. No. 161; Re King, 1 N. Y. Legal Obs. 276, Fed. Cas. No. 7,785; Re Mcad, 19 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 81, Fed. Cas. No. 9,365; Sigsby v. Willis, 3 Ben. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 12,849; Hare & W. notes to Aurioi v. Mills, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. pt. 2, pp. 1245-1251. The case of Glenn v. Abell, 39 Fed. 10, is a decision by Judge Simonton, of this circuit, involving the liability of a subscriber to corporate stock for his unpaid subscription, and in which such debt was held to be provable under the bankruptcy act of 1867. The learned judge said: "The liability to pay was fixed; the time—the precise moment when to pay—may have been judge, holds that rent to accrue in the future under a lease for a term of years having more than two years to run at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy does not constitute a fixed liability absolutely owing, as, although the contractual obligations under the lease are not absolved by the adjudication as held in Re Jefferson, 93 Fed. 948, supra, but only the payment released by the discharge, the claim, in order to be provable, must have accrued at the time of filing the petition, and rent to accrue in the future, if a debt, is one depending on contingencies which cannot be valued; and that there is no provision under the present bankruptcy act for contingent claims of any kind.

And Atkins v. Wilcox, 53 L. R. A. 118, 44 C. C. A. 626, 105 Fed. 595, holds that notes for unaccrued rent are not provable as a fixed liability absolutely owing at the filing of the petition, where the lease provides that if the premises shall be destroyed by fire, or if the lessee shall be deprived of their use by some unforeseen event not due to his fault or negligence, he shall be entitled to credit for the unexpired portion of the term, and that a corresponding portion of the rent notes shall be canceled, and that the lessor may cancel the lease on violation of any of its terms by the lessee without putting the latter in default, and that the lessee shall not sublet the premises without the lessor's consent.

And in Re Collignon, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 250, the referee holds that where the lease authorizes the landlord to relet the premises as the tenant's agent on their becoming vacant for any cause, and hold the tenant for any balance remaining after applying the avails of the new lease, and the tenant becomes bankrupt before the end of the term, and the landlord subsequently relets the premises for a less amount, she cannot prove against the estate for the deficiency, under § 63 of the bankruptcy act, on the ground that her debt has thereby become liquidated, as the line of cleavage is established at the time of the filing of the petition, or at the slightly later time of the adjudication, at which time the rights of creditors become fixed. He also states that the deficiency is a new debt for which the landlord can doubtless hold the lessee, but which should not be recognized to the detriment of other creditors.

And where a lease for a term of years at a specified yearly rental provides for payment in "equal monthly instalments," and receivers for 54 L. R. A.

the lessee are appointed by the state court who take possession of the premises on December 19, none of the December rent having been paid, and retain such possession paying the rent in full for the time they are in such possession until January 21, when receivers in bankruptcy take possession and hold until February 21, paying the rent in full for such time, the landlord is only entitled to prove for the rent from December 1 to December 19, and not for the rent from February 21 to the end of the month. Re Frankel, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 840.

And where the bankrupt is the lessee of premises under a lease authorizing the lessors to re-enter on the lessee being declared bankrupt, and by which the lessee covenants in case of the termination of the lease in that manner to "Indemnify the lessors . . . against all loss of rent . . . which they may incur by reason of such termination during the residue of" the term, and the lessors re-enter on the occurring of the bankruptcy, they cannot prove a claim against the estate for the difference between the present letting value for the remainder of the term and the rent fixed by the lease, as the covenant of indemnity would only be broken after the actual loss of rent, and then only to the extent that the rent had actually been lost. Re Ellis, 98 Fed. 967. The district judge also stated that at the time of the adjudication the claim was contingent upon the termination of the lease by the lessor for breach of the covenant and a subsequent loss of rent by the lessor, and that such claim was not provable as a fixed debt under § 63a, subd. 1, of any other provision of the present bankruptcy act.

And in Re Cronson, 1 N. B. N. 474, the lease, which was for five years, provided for a specified yearly rental payable monthly on the first day of each month, and provided that on failure to make any payments when due the rent for the entire term should become due. The May rent was not paid, and on May 19th a petition in voluntary bankruptcy was filed and the petitioner adjudicated a bankrupt. On June 6th a receiver was appointed, who retained the premises till July 3d. The claim was made that the rent for the entire future term was provable, and was also a preferred claim under the Pennsylvania statute. The referee, however, only allowed the rent from May 1st to June 6th to be proved, which was allowed as a preferred claim, and also allowed the regular rental for the month the receiver had possession, stating uncertain. The subscription was an absolute promise, debitum in presenti; a part, possibly, solvendum in futuro."

We are confirmed in the conclusions reached by reference to other sections of the present bankruptcy act. Section 16 provides that, "the liability of a person who is a codebtor with, or guarantor or in any manner a surety for, a bankrupt shall not be altered by the discharge of such bankrupt."

Paragraph i of § 57 provides that, "whenever a creditor, whose claim against a bankrupt estate is secured by the individual undertaking of any person fails to prove such claim, such person may do so in the creditor's name, and if he discharge such undertaking in whole or in part, he shall be subrogated to that extent to the rights of the creditor."

It would thus appear that to sustain appellee's contention in this cause would bring about this condition: that the appellant would be denied the right to assert a claim due herself, though the insolvent surety would be expressly authorized by law to make proof of a claim for the amount due her in her name for his own benefit. Such an interpretation would not be in consonance with the reason and spirit of the law, and bring about a result that could never have been contemplated by its authors. The bond in this case is a fixed obligation, its amount definite and certain, and the same was in full force and effect at the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, though the liability thereunder is payable in the future, and in stated sums. The demand is clearly one the value of which can be ascertained, and hence provable under the bankruptcy act; and, the value thereof, as thus fixed, being in excess of the penalty thereof, the debt for penalty only is provable, and should have been allowed by the referee, instead of the sum reported by him.

The decision of the lower court will be reversed, and the cause remanded thereto to be proceeded with in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

that the rent so fixed by the lease was reasonable.

Where the lease contains a covenant by the lessee not to assign the same voluntarily or involuntarily, by judicial proceedings or otherwise, without the lessor's consent under "penalty" of instant forfeiture of the lease and of a specified sum as "additional rent," and the lessee becomes bankrupt, the amount so specified is not provable, as it is for a penalty, and not for liquidated damages, and was not due or owing at the time of the filing of the petition. Re Rhoads, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 179. The referee also states that the remedies of the landlord on such covenant are not affected by the bankruptcy proceedings.

But in Re Gerson, 2 Am. Bankr. Rep. 170, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 277, the bankrupt held under lessees who were to pay $4,200 per annum, payable $350 monthly in advance. At the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy on November 25th the November rent was not paid. The trustee occupied the premises during December, allowing the full rent fixed by the lease therefor, and the adjudication was made on January 8d, following. Distress for the November rent was made November 28th, and for the December rent on December 2d, and it was ordered that the sale of the property distrained should be made by the receiver in bankruptcy subject to the landlord's lien whose claim was to be proved as a preferred one. The Pennsylvania statute gives a lien on the property on the premises for one year's rent, and provides that rent for not more than one year shall be first paid out of the proceeds of an execution sale. The referee stated that there was no dispute as to the amount of the claim for rent, and allowed to the landlord out of the proceeds of the sale $1,315.68 in addition to the $350 allowed for the receiver's use and occupation of the premises for the month of December. It is difficult to say just what the referee intended to hold, but it would seem from some of the cases cited that if the rent for an entire year had been claimed, whether accruing before or after the bankruptcy, such claim would have been allowed as a preferred claim.

And in Re Goldstein, 2 Am. Bankr. Rep. 603, the lease, which had several years to run, contained an agreement by the lessee that if he should become bankrupt during the term the whole rent for the unexpired term should at once become due and collectible. The referee held that such provision was not illegal or against public policy, and that, as under the law of Pennsylvania where the bankruptcy occurred the landlord had a lien for a year's rent, he was entitled to priority for a full year's rent, although only a small amount had accrued before the bankruptcy, and said that the whole amount for the unexpired term became due on the date of the adjudication although the priority was limited to one year. In allowing the claim the referee fixed it at one year's rent, saying nothing as to the landlord's rights to the rent for subsequent years.

According to all the cases discussing the question the landlord is entitled to be paid as part of the expenses the rent for the time the receiver or trustee in bankruptcy remains in possession of the premises, and so far as appears the rent has been allowed at the rate fixed by the lease. This, of course, is not proved as a fixed liability within § 63a, subd. 1.

Agreements as to condition of premises at the end of the term.

Where a lease contains a covenant by the lessee to keep the improvements on the premises in good repair and "at the end of the term" surrender the premises in the same condition as when received, and the lessee becomes bankrupt before the end of the term, leaving the premises in bad condition, a claim for the amount necessary to put them in repair is not provable, as it is not absolutely due and owing at the time of the filing of the petition, within § 63a, subd. 1, and therefore cannot be liquidated under § 63b, which refers only to claims coming within § 63a. Re Frankel, 2 N. B. N. Rep. 840.

And where by a lease of realty the tenant is permitted to make certain alterations, he agreeing to restore the premises to their former condition at the expiration of the lease, and he becomes bankrupt before such expiration, and the landlord enters and leases the premises to the trustee, in bankruptcy, receiving compensation from the estate for the time they are occupied by the trustee, the claim for failure to restore the premises to their former condition is not provable, as there was no obligation to restore until the expiration of the term fixed by the lease, and there was therefore no breach of the agreement. Re Arnstein, 101 Fed. 706. Nothing is said directly in this case as to the question whether such liability is fixed and absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition, within § 68a, subd. 1.

III. Conclusion.

If the liability is contingent on the happening of some event which has not yet occurred at the time of the bankruptcy, or if the amount for which the bankrupt is liable is subject to change in any manner, it is not a fixed liability absolutely owing within the provision of the bankruptcy law in question. Thus, a liability of an indorser on a note which is not due at the time of the bankruptcy, or on a decree for alimony which is subject to modification at any time, is not provable, nor is the liability, if there is any, as to which the decisions are in conflict, for rent to accrue after the bankruptcy, although the liability for rent already accrued seems to be unquestioned. IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

Frank M. POWELL, Appt.,

v.

Hester M. SPACKMAN, Respt.

(.....Idaho.....)

- *1. A constitutional provision which provides that, "for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence . . . while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense," preserves the voting status of the inmates of a soldiers' home at the time of their entry thereto, and such inmates cannot acquire, by reason of their presence in such soldiers' home, and while kept at public expense, the right to vote in the county and precinct in which such institution is located.
2. Where the language of a constitutional provision is plain and free from ambiguity, the ordinary signification of the words employed, as used in common parlance, must be considered, and the intent of the provision gathered from the words themselves, giving to them their usual meaning and signification.

One does not lose his residence by reason of his absence while in the service of the state, and it is competent for the party to prove his intention in respect to it.

State ex rel. Hannon v. Griezard, 89 N. C. 116.

So no prohibition is necessary, or was intended, by § 5 of our Constitution. It is a question of fact, and the intention is evidence of the fact. Mere actual residence, however prolonged, will not constitute legal residence unless accompanied with the intention of making the place a home.

Section 5 of the Constitution, therefore, merely furnishes a rule of evidence by which the prima facie right of inmates of the home to vote in and claim as their legal residence the precinct where the home is situated, "by reason of their presence" there, is taken away, but they must prove their right by other evidence.

This question was again determined in our favor by the supreme court of California in the case of Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 39 Pac. 19.

Quarles, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced by the appellant, who is an elector of Ada county, to contest the election of the respondent, Hester M. Spackman, to the office of county superintendent of public instruction of said county, and who received a certificate of election to said office; whereas it is claimed by appellant that Miss Helen Coston was elected to said office, and should have received certificate of election thereto. A stipulation of facts was filed, and the case decided upon the same by the lower court. It is agreed in the stipulation that 40 inmates of the soldiers' home, situated in Soldiers' Home precinct, in said county, voted for Miss Spackman, including which 40 votes the vote of Miss Spackman was 2,299, and that of Miss Coston 2,290. It is also stipulated that these 40 inmates never resided in said county except in said soldiers' home; the eighth paragraph of the stipulation being in words and figures as follows: "That at least 40 of the said persons above referred to, and whose names are set forth in plaintiff's complaint, will testify that they abandoned their former residences and places of abode with no intention of returning thereto, and took up their residence in said soldiers' home in said Soldiers' Home precinct, Ada county, Idaho, and thereafter resided and continued to reside therein with the intention of permanently remaining and residing there; and that each of said persons were, at the time of said election, and for six months prior thereto had been, residing at and as inmates of the soldiers' home in said Ada county, state of Idaho; and that at all times during their residence there the said soldiers' home was established under the laws of the state of Idaho, and maintained at the public expense. That all of said persons above referred to were duly and regularly admitted to said soldiers' home under the terms and provisions of the act entitled 'An Act to Establish a Soldiers' Home,' passed at the second and fifth sessions of the legislature of the state of Idaho, and approved March 2, 1893 [Sess. Laws 1893, p. 91], and February 9, 1899 [Sess. Laws 1899, p. 190], respectively, and hereinbefore referred to; and during all the time of their residence in said Ada county they were maintained in the said soldiers' home at the public expense."

Judgment was given in favor of Miss Spackman, the respondent, from which judgment this appeal was taken.

This cause is to be determined upon a construction of article 6 of our Constitution, especially § 5 of said article, which is as follows: "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the service of this state, or of the United States, nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this state or of the United States, nor while a student of any institution of learning, nor while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense." Section 2 of said article of the Constitution, as amended, provides that, "except as in this article otherwise provided every male [and female citizen of the United States], twenty-one years old, who has actually resided in this state or territory for six months, and in the county where he offers to vote thirty days next preceding the day of election, if registered as provided by law, is a qualified voter." Section 3 of said article provides that parties who are insane, under guardianship, idiotic, convicted of any of certain crimes, and not restored to citizenship, or who, at the time of the election, are confined in any public prison, etc., shall not vote. Section 4 of said article is as follows: "The legislature may prescribe qualifications, limitations, and conditions for the right of suffrage additional to those prescribed in this article, but shall never annul any of the provisions in this article contained." The election statutes of this state cannot affect the question presented here, as none of the constitutional provisions can be repealed by legislative enactment. It will thus be seen that the qualifications of an elector are prescribed by the Constitution; that the legislature is restricted from annulling any of the qualifications prescribed, but expressly authorized to prescribe additional "qualifications, limitations, and conditions for the right of suffrage." One of the indispensable elements of the right to vote in this state is residence,—“six months in the state, and thirty days in the county, next preceding the election,”—and so says the Constitution. Can this residence be acquired by a person who is an inmate of an almshouse or of an asylum kept at public expense, while residing in such almshouse or asylum? The answer to this must be found in a construction of the language used in § 5, art. 6, of the Constitution, quoted above. This section must be considered in connection with the other provisions of the Constitution, and the whole must be construed so as to give force and effect to all of the provisions of that instrument, without destroying or nullifying any of them. The meaning and intent of the provision in question, taking the instrument as a whole, must be determined. In doing this we must give to the language used that effect which was most probably intended. We must consider the words used in their ordinary and usual signification.

It will be seen that the specific inquiry here is whether a resident of some county other than Ada county can take up his abode in the soldiers' home, in Soldiers' Home precinct, in Ada county, intending to make that his home permanently, and with the intention of abandoning his former residence, and by continuous presence in said soldiers' home for thirty days (he having been in the state six months prior thereto), acquire the right to vote in said precinct. The stipulation of facts in this case shows that the votes in question were cast by inmates of the soldiers' home, who, "during all the time of their residence in Ada county, . . . were maintained in the said soldiers' home at the public expense." With all due deference to the inmates of said soldiers' home, there can be no question but what it is an "asylum," maintained "at the public expense." Now, in the purview of the constitutional provision under consideration, what does the language used mean: "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence . . . while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at the public expense?" In interpreting this language we should have no serious trouble, as all the words used are simple, and have a well-defined signification as used in common parlance. If any one word in this section is liable to raise any doubt whatever of the meaning of the provision, or the effect that it was intended that the provision should have, it is the word "deemed," in the phrase "no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence." etc. The word "deemed" is the past participle of the transitive verb "deem," which is defined by Webster as follows: "To account; to esteem; to think; to judge; to hold in opinion; to regard." And it is defined by the same lexicographer, when used as an in-transitive verb, as follows: "To be of opinion; to think; to estimate." Giving this word its ordinary signification as generally used, it would read in the provision in question thus: "No person shall be accounted, or no person shall be esteemed, or no person shall be thought to be, or no person shall be judged to be, or no person shall be held in opinion to be, or no person shall be regarded to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence at an asylum kept at the public expense, for the purpose of voting. The right of the 40 inmates of the soldiers' home mentioned in the pleadings and stipulation of facts depends, so far as the qualification of residence is concerned, to vote in said Ada county, upon their presence in said soldiers' home. They did reside in other counties. All of their residence in Ada county has consisted of the time spent by them in the soldiers' home; and, if they have resided in Ada county the requisite thirty days required by the Constitution in order to entitle them to vote in the latter county, it must be "by reason of their presence" in the soldiers' home. Now, if the court is prohibited from "accounting" them residents of the county of Ada, for voting purposes, "by reason of their presence" at said home, how can we account them residents of said county? How can we "esteem" them residents of said county? How can we "think" them residents of said county? How can we "judge" them to be residents of said county? How can we "hold in opinion" that they are residents of said county? How can we "regard" them as residents of said county? To do so it must be "by reason of their presence" at the soldiers' home, and while kept at public expense, in plain violation of the Constitution. This cannot be done without violating the Constitution itself. The language used cannot be regarded in any other light than that the framers of the Constitution intended that the inmates of such an institution, whose residence in a county depended upon their "presence" in or at such institution, should not vote in such county; and, further, that by reason of their absence from the county of their residence they should not lose their right to vote in the latter county.

In the case of Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, the court of appeals of New York construed a similar provision. The plaintiff in that case had been an inmate of the soldiers' home at Bath six years, and made oath as follows: "I reside in the town of Bath for the reason that I was admitted an inmate of the New York Soldiers' and Sailors' Home, in this town, by the authorities thereof, in the year 1880, and have remained such inmate from that time to the present, with the intention at all times of making my residence in said institution, so long as I shall be permitted to remain such inmate. . . . In becoming an inmate of said institution, I intended to change my residence from the city of New York to the fifth election district of said town of Bath." The plaintiff there, so far as intent is concerned, abandoned his residence in the city of New York, and changed it to the town of Bath. Yet the New York court held that his narrative of his intention was only a conclusion from the facts stated. The court said, inter alia: "His relations were not with the village, but with the institution, which was situated within its borders. . . . It follows that he has not lost the right to vote in the place of his legal residence, New York, for the provision of the Constitution in question also declares that he shall not lose his residence by reason of such 'presence' in the 'institution.' As to that city, he is to be regarded as temporarily absent, and his residence as a citizen still therein. We have no doubt that the institution in question is within the purview of the constitutional provision (art. 2, § 3) above referred to. It is an asylum supported at the public expense, and its members are within the mischief against which that provision is aimed,—the participation of an unconcerned body of men in the control, through the ballot box, of municipal affairs in whose further conduct they have no interest, and from the mismanagement of which by the officers their ballots might elect they sustain no injury. But the question in each case is still, as it was before the adoption of the Constitution, one of domicile or residence, to be decided upon all the circumstances of the case. The provision (art. 2, § 3) disqualifies no one; confers no right upon anyone. It simply [note the language] eliminates from those circumstances the fact of the presence in the institution named or included within its terms. It settles the law as to the effect of such presence, and as to which there had before been a difference of opinion, and declares that it does not constitute a test of a right to vote, and is not to be so regarded. The person offering to vote must find the requisite qualifications elsewhere." The able and ingenious counsel for respondent argues that the decision in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, does not support the contention of appellant; that the facts are different; that in that case the plaintiff's abode in the soldiers' and sailors' home was only temporary, transient, and not intended to be permanent; hence the decision there is not applicable here. However strenuous the effort to distinguish between that case and the case at bar may be, it must fail, as there is no distinction, except in theory, between that case and the one at bar. It is true that Silvey said that he entered the home at Bath "with the intention" of making it his "residence" so long as he should "be permitted to remain such inmate," while the stipulation here says that the 40 inmates whose votes are questioned entered the home "with the intention of permanently remaining there," and that they had "abandoned their former residences and places of abode with no intention of returning thereto, and took up their residence in said soldiers' home." Yet it is apparent that the plaintiff in the Silvey Case and the 40 inmates here each entered the home with the same intent, to wit, with the intent to reside in said home, and make it their permanent abode, so long as they could do so, or were permitted to do so. As a matter of course, all such institutions have their rules and regulations, and inmates may be discharged for violations of same; and then the continuance of the institution itself is somewhat problematical, depending, as it does, upon popular sentiment,—an element that is always charged with more or less uncertainty. But the New York court expressly says in the Silvey Case that the presence of the inmate in the home does not constitute a test of a right to vote, and is not to be so regarded, and that "the person offering to vote must find the requisite qualifications elsewhere." Now, suppose we do, as the New York court in Silvey v. Lindsay said must be done, eliminate the presence of these inmates from the soldiers' home, and upon what possible hypothesis can it be held that they are entitled to vote in the precinct in which the home is situated? They came from their former homes, in other counties, to the soldiers' home, and remained in the home until the election at which it is claimed that they voted wrongfully. If they have resided in Ada county the requisite time (thirty days) to entitle them to vote at said election, it is solely by reason of their presence in the home. This presence, as was said in Silvey v. Lindsay, and as the constitutional provision under consideration clearly intends, is to be eliminated,—not regarded,—and their qualifications must be sought elsewhere. Now, the constitutional provision under consideration does not prohibit inmates of the home, or other asylums kept at public expense, from changing their places of residence. They may do so. But, for the purpose of voting, they shall not be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of their presence in the institution, while kept at public expense. Now, having lived in other counties of the state, and having come into Ada county to reside at the home, to be there kept at public expense, and residing nowhere else in the county, how can we, for the purpose of voting, regard them as "having gained a residence" in the county by reason of their presence at the home? The Constitution does not disfranchise anyone. It simply declares what persons, by reason of age, citizenship, and residence, may vote. In the provision under consideration no one is disqualified from voting. It is declared, however, in that provision, where the parties therein named shall vote. When it declares that no one, by reason of presence or absence in certain service, or at certain institutions, shall be regarded or deemed to have gained or lost a residence for the "purpose of voting," it is only meant that whoever enters such service or such institution, if he votes while in such service or institution, must do so at the place where he was entitled to vote at the time he entered such service or institution. Any other interpretation of the language of the Constitution would do violence to the words used, and would palpably defeat the meaning and intent of the provision under consideration. The rule of liberal construction—such as will give effect to the object of a statute or constitutional provision—applies in this state. This rule has been properly adopted. Yet, claiming to apply this rule, an interpretation or construction is asked in this case which does not effect the object sought to be accomplished, but defeats the same. That object, as was said in the Silvey Case, was to prevent the mischief resulting from "the participation of an unconcerned body of men in the control, through the ballot box, of municipal affairs in whose further conduct they have no interest, and from the mismanagement of which by the officers their ballots might elect they sustain no injury." The construction that we are asked to give this constitutional provision is not a construction, but destruction. It does not carry out the object of the constitutional provision; it does not give force and effect to it; it destroys the provision by defeating and thwarting its object and intent.

The respondent interprets the decision in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, cited supra, as holding that one can, if he so intends, by mere residence in an institution like the soldiers' home, and while kept at public expense, gain a residence for the purpose of voting, notwithstanding the constitutional provision under consideration; and cites the decision in the following cases as sustaining this interpretation, to wit: People v. Cady, 143 N. Y. 100, 25 L. R. A. 399, 37 N. E. 673; Re Goodman, 146 N. Y. 284, 40 N. E. 769; Re Garvey, 147 N. Y. 117, 41 N. E. 439; Re Batterman, 14 Misc. 213, 35 N. Y. Supp. 593; Re Griffiths, 16 Misc. 128, 38 N. Y. Supp. 953; People ex rel. McShane v. Hagen, 48 App. Div. 203, 62 N. Y. Supp. 816. A study of these decisions is instructive, as well as interesting. In People v. Cady the defendant was convicted of illegal registration. The facts were that he had been an inmate of the Tombs prison for about seven years, serving under commitments for sixty days each, for vagrancy, and which he himself procured. He testified that he had made his home at said prison, and intended it as his permanent home. The court held that, for voting purposes, the prison could not be the home of anyone confined there; that it is not a place of residence, and not maintained for that purpose. The court affirmed the judgment of conviction. In the Goodman Case one Henry W. Bainton, who was a student at the Union Theological Seminary, in the twenty-fifth election district of the twenty-first assembly district of the city of New York, registered in said district. Goodman moved to strike Bainton's name from the registry list on the ground that he was not a resident of said district. In opposition to the motion, Bainton deposed that he went to the seminary for the purpose of obtaining a residence and domicile, that he had no intention of changing his residence, and that he claimed no residence elsewhere. Under the constitutional provision of New York, from which the one here under consideration seems to have been copied, the court held that, for voting purposes, Bainton could not lose his residence by removing to the seminary, "nor gain a new residence in the seminary district by his presence in it as a student." The court said in that case, inter alia, that "usually—perhaps always—the voting residence remains unchanged until a new residence is actually acquired; but there can be no such acquisition merely by an abode as a student in an institution of learning. Something else beyond that fact, and wholly independent of it, must occur to effect the change. The intention to change is not alone sufficient. It must exist, but must concur with, and be manifested by, resultant acts, which are independent of the presence as a student in the new locality." In the Garvey Case the court, in concluding, said: "We have to say in conclusion that, unless the rule laid down in the Goodman Case and followed in the case at bar, is rigidly enforced, the constitutional provision now construed will be nullified. It may be urged that the enforcement of this rule will render it well-nigh impossible for a student to establish a residence in a seminary of learning, but the very obvious answer is that the letter and spirit of the Constitution contemplate such a result. The sojourn of the student is assumed to be temporary, and the law preserves to him his former residence, notwithstanding his absence therefrom." So said the court of appeals of New York. The Cases of Batterman, 14 Misc. 213, 35 N. Y. Supp. 593, and of Griffiths, 16 Misc. 128, 38 N. Y. Supp. 953, are not analogous to the case at bar. The question in those cases was whether a similar provision was retrospective, or prospective only, and the court held that it was prospective only. Those decisions, if rendered by a court of last resort, could have no application to the case at bar. In People ex rel. McShane v. Hagen the question arose whether an inmate of a hospital, who performed certain labor there, was "kept at the public expense." The court, inter alia, said: "The question then, is, Was the relator 'kept' (that is, 'supported,' Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 60, 13 N. E. 446) in the hospital? If so, he neither gained nor lost a residence by reason of his presence there while being so kept or supported. . . . But, if he was simply an inmate of the hospital under a bare license,—that is, with mere permission to use it as an asylum,—then, clearly, he could not gain a residence there while enjoying the maintenance which it afforded him. . . . It was, in part, at least, to prevent such institutions from being utilized for political purposes, that this provision of the Constitution was adopted. That provision would be practically nullified were the courts to favor mere devices like the present, whereby it is sought to turn these penniless and homeless inmates into contract employees and genuine residents. Efforts of a similar character in other directions have been numerous, but they have uniformly failed.

Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 60, 13 N. E. 446; People v. Cady, 143 N. Y. 100, 25 L. R. A. 399, 37 N. E. 673; Re Goodman, 146 N. Y. 284, 40 N. E. 769; Re Garvey, 147 N. Y. 117, 41 N. E. 439." The New York cases lay down with certainty the rule that under this constitutional provision the presence of the inmate of the soldiers' home therein must be eliminated—disregarded—in determining whether he is entitled to vote in the election district or precinct where the home is situated. Eliminating the presence of the 40 inmates of the soldiers' home whose votes are here in question, it is palpable that they were not entitled to vote in the Soldiers' Home precinct in Ada county at the election in November, 1900, for the reason that they had not resided in Ada county the thirty days preceding the election, as is required by § 2, art. 6, of the Constitution.

Michigan has, and had prior to the adoption of our Constitution, the same provision under consideration here, which the supreme court of that state said was copied from the Constitution of New York. See Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837. In that case the Michigan court followed and approved the decision in Silvey v. Lindsay. After quoting from Webster to show the meaning of the term "asylum,"—"an institution for the protection or relief of the unfortunate,"—and demonstrating that a soldiers' home, like the one in question here, is an asylum, the Michigan court says: "It follows that one's entry and residence in such an institution partake of the same character as the institution itself, and are likewise eleemosynary in character. One entering them cannot, under the Constitution, gain or lose his residence. Inmates of the home enter it for one purpose only, and the Constitution solemnly and clearly declares that their status as to residence when they enter must control, while they remain there. When Mr. Carpenter entered the home, he was a legal resident of the township of Woodstock. He entered the home upon his own application, solely as a beneficiary, and a resident of that township, to accept a well-bestowed and deserving charity. He did not, by this act, lose his residence there, and his intent is wholly immaterial. To permit his intent to control would result in the practical annulment of this provision of the Constitution. The mischief intended to be avoided is as apparent in this case as in any. The inmates of the home own no property, pay no local taxes, do not work in or for the benefit of the municipality, and have no pecuniary interest in its local affairs. In fact, they have no connection with, and stand in no relation to, the local municipal government. They occupy state property, and are exclusively under the control and management of the state." The court, in Wolcott v. Holcomb, clearly suggests the reasons for incorporating this provision in the Constitution, and points out some of the evils that would result from adopting the construction which respondent insists should be adopted. The court in that case also shows conclusively that the interpretation of the decision in Silvey v. Lindsay asked by respondent here is not the correct one, and should not be adopted.

Kansas has the same constitutional provision that is being considered here, and its supreme court has given to it the same construction that the New York court of appeals and the Michigan supreme court gave to the same provision in the cases above cited and quoted from. The Kansas supreme court in Lawrence v. Leidigh, 58 Kan. 594, 50 Pac. 600, has construed this identical constitutional provision, and held that under it an inmate of a soldiers' home cannot, by presence in such home, acquire the right to vote in the voting district where the home is situated. The opinion in this case is very instructive, and clearly shows that such a home is an asylum (in the language of the court, "place of retreat or shelter"); that the thirty days' residence next preceding the election in the county where the person offers to vote is not acquired by presence in such an institution; and that the inmates of such institutions are entitled to vote at the place of their residence at the time they leave the same to enter the institution, which residence, for voting purposes, cannot be gained or lost by presence in such institution, whatever the intent of the inmate as to future residence or abandonment of the old residence may be. This case is on all fours with the case at bar. In the stipulation of facts—like the one at bar—it was agreed that "these inmates abandoned their former places of abode with no intention of returning thereto, and took up their residence at the soldiers' home with the intention of permanently remaining there; such of them as had families removing them and their household goods and other personal belongings." We quote from the opinion in the Kansas case, which, so far as the stipulation of facts is concerned, goes to the full extent of the stipulation of facts in this case, and further, too, making even a stronger case for the inmates than the case at bar. The court then discusses and considers the different decisions showing that the New York and Michigan courts took the same view of the proper construction of the provision under consideration as did the Kansas court, saying: "The decisions upon the precise question are few in number. But three have been called to our attention. Those of Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837, and Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, are to the same effect as the one we make. That of Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 450, 39 Pac. 19, is in opposition. It also appears, by records of the United States district court for this district, which have been called to our attention, that in an unreported case, entitled United States v. Rowdebush, being an indictment for illegally voting at an election for representative in Congress, a decision similar to that of the supreme court of California was made upon an agreed statement of facts; but we are constrained by what we regard as the true interpretation of the Constitution, derived out of the settled and authoritative meaning of the words used, to follow the New York and Michigan decisions, and to hold that, notwithstanding the abandonment by the veterans in question of their former places of abode and their settlement at the soldiers' home with the fixed intention of remaining there, they cannot acquire a residence at such home for voting purposes."

In Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 39 Pac. 19, the supreme court of California has given this constitutional provision a different construction, without giving any good reason for so doing. Counsel for respondent argues that we copied or borrowed this provision from California, and are therefore bound by the construction placed upon the same by the supreme court of California, and quotes authority to the effect that when we adopt a statute or constitutional provision from a sister state that we adopt the construction of the same placed thereon by such state. This rule is correct so far as constructions placed upon the statute or constitutional provision before its adoption are concerned, but not as to those subsequently made. The California case cited supra was decided some five years after we adopted our Constitution. More than that, it is apparent to one who will give the necessary study and investigation to the subject, that this state, California, Michigan, and Kansas all adopted the constitutional provision under consideration from the state of New York, and for that reason should follow the construction placed upon the same in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, and other cases decided later by the court of appeals of that state. The decision in Silvey v. Lindsay was made in 1887, three years before we adopted the provision under consideration.—an additional reason why we should follow the construction given in the decision in that case. But the rule of construction invoked by counsel for respondent was not obeyed, but violated, by the supreme court of California, in Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 39 Pac. 19. Yet we are asked to follow the decision in the latter case. We should not do so, especially as it would, as held by the New York, Michigan, and Kansas cases cited, "nullify" the constitutional provision under consideration.

A labored effort has been made on behalf of the respondent to distinguish the case at bar from the cases of Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444; Laurence v. Leidigh, 58 Kan. 594, 50 Pac. 600, and Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837, by showing that inmates in the New York, Michigan, and Kansas soldiers' homes must, under the provisions of the laws creating them, be indigent, while the inmates of the soldiers' home here need not be, and are not indigents. But this makes no difference whatever, as the framers of the Constitution did not limit the provisions of the section to indigents, but intended it to apply to all inmates of every asylum—place of shelter, refuge, or retreat—kept at public expense, whether such inmates be indigent or not. The language used must be taken in its natural import, given its usual signification as used in common parlance, and the intent gathered from the language used, it being plain and free from ambiguity, and, thus considered, it is susceptible of no other construction or interpretation, otherwise the framers of the Constitution would not have said "while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense." In some of the decisions reviewed here, courts have spoken of various reasons for adopting the constitutional provision which we are considering; but it is not necessary so to do. The language of the provision being plain, and free from ambiguity, courts, in applying it, have no need to look beyond the provision itself to ascertain the reason for its adoption. It is not the province of the court to set at naught the provisions of a constitution made and adopted by the people,—the source of all power in a republic,—forsooth in the opinion of the court no good reason existed for adopting the provisions. Courts do not make constitutions. They have no right to unmake them, either in whole or in part. It is the duty of the court to apply and give force to all provisions in the Constitution, whether they are, in the opinion of the court, wise or otherwise. See Cohn v. Kingsley (Idaho) 38 L. R. A. 74, 49 Pac. 985. The construction asked in this case would largely nullify the provisions of § 5, art. 6. of our Constitution, if it did not unmake that section. This the court has no power to do; and should not, by palpable usurpation of power, overthrow the will of the people as expressed in the Constitution.

We are cited to a number of authorities showing the rule as to residence and qualifications of voters at common law, but they have no application here. Those authorities are somewhat conflicting, and under them the right of the inmates of the soldiers' home, whose votes are here questioned, might be doubted. But, as was said by the court in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, the constitutional provision which we are considering was adopted to settle the law as to the effect of the presence of the inmates at the home upon their right to vote, "and as to which there had before been a difference of opinion, and declares that it does not constitute a test of a right to vote, and is not to be so regarded." The object of citing these common-law authorities is to induce this court to hold that the provision in question has no force or effect, and that the right to vote of the inmates is to be determined without reference to this provision; its words, meaning, and intent to the contrary, notwithstanding. A careful reading of the decisions in Darragh v. Bird, 3 Or. 229, and Wood v. Fitzgerald, 3 Or. 568, shows that these cases are not identical with the case at bar. The provisions there construed are somewhat analogous to the one under consideration here, and the Oregon court followed the decision in People ex rel. Budd v. Holden, 28 Cal. 123. In the latter case the supreme court of California held that a soldier serving in the United States army could, notwithstanding a similar constitutional provision, obtain, for voting purposes, a residence in California while serving in said army, notwithstanding that the court there said "that, in determining the fact of residence, presence or absence in the service of the United States shall not be taken into account; or, in other words, neither presence nor absence in the service of the United States is a condition upon which the fact of residence can be affirmed or denied." Is this not saying, in effect, what the New York court of appeals said in Silvey v. Lindsay, that "the presence" of the inmate in the home must be "eliminated" in determining the residence of the inmate for voting purposes? Under the language above quoted from People v. Holden, to the effect that presence in the service of the United States cannot be taken into "account" in determining the residence of the one offering to vote, and that the right can neither be "affirmed or denied" upon presence in such service, the right is solely dependent upon the intention of the voter. This conclusion is absurd, and not sustained by authority. It is difficult to see how the California and Oregon courts reached the conclusion announced in these cases. We are told that residence in the county is an essential requisite to vote; that presence in the soldiers' home is not to be considered in determining this residence. This creates a residence without presence in the county,—by mere intention,—a thing which the constitutional provision under consideration was intended to prevent.

Respondent cites Paine, Elections, §§ 47, 69-71, but these sections have no bearing upon the question under consideration. This treatise was written in 1887, and, of course, does not and could not, consider the decisions in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837, or Lawrence v. Leidigh, 58 Kan. 594, 50 Pac. 600; and nothing in this treatise has any special bearing upon the question as to what is the proper construction to give § 5, art. 6, of our Constitution. And what we have said as to Paine, Elections, is also true of McCrary, Elections, 3d ed., published in 1887, and written before the decision was handed down in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444.

There can be no doubt that the constitutional provision under consideration was borrowed by the framers of our Constitution from New York, and the framers of our Constitution are presumed to have known of the construction placed upon that provision by the New York court of last resort when they adopted it. That construction gives force and effect to the language of the provision, and has due regard for the common meaning of the words employed, while the construction demanded by respondent, and which California has given to it, 54 L. R. A. emasculates the provision, and leaves it impotent, without life or vitality.

Under the construction here given to § 5, art. 6, of our state Constitution, the conclusion is unavoidable that the 40 inmates of the soldiers' home mentioned in the aforesaid stipulation of facts were not voters in the Soldiers' Home precinct, were not entitled to vote for the respondent for the office of county superintendent of public instruction for Ada county, and that said 40 votes were wrongfully credited to and counted for the respondent. Deducting these 40 votes from the 2,299 votes credited to respondent, leaves her with 2,259,—less than a majority as between her and her competitor, Miss Helen Coston. Miss Coston received 31 legal votes more than the respondent received, and was entitled to a certificate of election, and the judgment demanded in the prayer of plaintiff's complaint should have been made and duly entered in behalf of the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court, with instructions to render and enter judgment in favor of appellant in conformity to the prayer of his complaint. Cost of appeal awarded to the appellant.

Stockalager, J., concurring:

My associates in this case have each prepared lengthy opinions; the Chief Justice agreeing with the contention of appellant, Justice Sullivan with the contention of respondent. They have discussed the authorities cited at length, and from them drawn their conclusions. I have carefully examined all the authorities cited by counsel for the respective parties to this action. It is admitted that the only question before the court is whether the occupants of the soldiers' home in Soldiers' Home precinct are entitled to vote, and were so entitled to vote at the last general election in said precinct in this, Ada county. Many authorities have been cited by both appellant and respondent, but, after investigating all of them, I only find four bearing directly on the case at bar. Those are the New York, Michigan, and Kansas cases, cited by appellant, and the California case cited by respondent. The three former cases deal with Constitutions almost identical with ours, and all construe them in harmony with appellant's contention; while the California case construes a Constitution using almost, if not exactly, the same language of the three former Constitutions referred to, and construes theirs in harmony with the contention of respondent. It will be observed that the California court cites no authority, and bases its conclusion on its own construction of its Constitution. Two Oregon cases are cited by respondent, but I cannot construe them as contended for by respondent. The New York, Michigan, and Kansas cases are discussed at length by the writers; the New York case being the first, which is cited and approved by the Michigan court. Then follows the Kansas case, decided in 1896, which quotes largely and approvingly the New York and Michigan cases. It is earnestly and ably urged by counsel for respondent that the New York case does not conflict with the contention of respondent in this case, but he admits the Michigan and Kansas cases do. A careful review of the facts in all three cases, coupled with the construction of their Constitutions, will disclose that the decisions are directly in conflict with the contention of respondent. As I view it, to hold with the contention of respondent would be directly in opposition to these three courts, and holding with California, that practically stands alone in its construction of a Constitution similar to all of them. I concur with the conclusions reached by Chief Justice Quarles.

Sullivan, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court. Counsel for appellant contend that under the provisions of § 5 of article 6 of the Constitution of this state the inmates of said soldiers' home are prohibited from gaining a residence therein for voting purposes, which section is set forth at length in the opinion of my associates. For an intelligent understanding of this case, reference must be had to the law establishing said soldiers' home (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 190). The 1st section of said act is as follows: "That there shall be established in this state an institution under the name of the Soldiers' Home, which institution shall be a home for honorably discharged Union soldiers, sailors, and marines, who served in the Union armies during the war of the Rebellion, and also for the members of the State National Guard disabled while in the line of duty, and veterans of the Mexican war: provided that before any person is admitted to said home, he shall have been a bona fide resident of this state not less than four months prior to making application for admission thereto." The 2d section makes an appropriation of $25,000 to carry out the provisions of said act. Section 3 sets apart 25,000 acres of state land for the maintenance of said home. Said act provides for the admission to said home of all honorably discharged Union soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Union armies during the war of the Rebellion, and also for the members of the State National Guard disabled while in the line of duty, and veterans of the Mexican war, provided they have been bona fide residents of this state not less than four months prior to making application for admission thereto. Thus each and every of the persons therein named must be admitted to said home on application, whether he be indigent and unable to support himself or not. The 25,000 acres of land set apart by the 3d section of said act for the maintenance of said home and the repayment to the state of the $25,000 appropriated by the 2d section, if sold at the minimum price authorized by law for its sale, would produce $250,000. It no doubt will bring sufficient to repay the $25,000 and interest to the state, and leave a permanent fund for the support of said home of $225,000 L. R. A.

000, which, if put at 6 per cent interest, will bring $13,500 per annum for the support of said home, which is much more than is required at the present time, as shown by the last report of the superintendent thereof. The general government also appropriates $100 per annum for the support of each inmate of said home. It is also shown by the report above mentioned that the total expense or cost for the support of each inmate for the year 1900 was about $135. I make this statement to show that the continuance of said home is not problematical or uncertain, but to show that said home is as permanent as are the homes of most of the voters in this state; and also to show that said home was not intended as a temporary home or residence for its inmates, but as a permanent one. All who come within the provisions of said act must be admitted to said home on proper application, whether they be indigent or not, and may remain there as long as they live. It is optional with them, and is not left with the board of trustees to turn them out at its will, as it is under the laws of other states governing homes established in those states for "indigent and pauper" soldiers and sailors. For a right decision of this case the character of this home must be kept in mind. The inmates are not there for temporary purposes, subject to the will of others, but may remain there permanently, if they desire to do so, and conduct themselves as gentlemen. It is conceded that the sole question presented for decision in this case involves the right of the inmates of the soldiers' home to gain a residence therein for voting purposes. It is contended by counsel for appellant that such inmates are absolutely prohibited from gaining such residence by the provisions of said § 5, art. 6, Idaho Const. In support of that contention they cite Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444; Lawrence v. Leidigh, 58 Kan. 594, 50 Pac. 600; Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837; Registration in Erie, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 14. The first three cases cited arose under provisions of the Constitutions of three respective states similar to the provisions of said § 5 of our Constitution, except, however, that the section in those state Constitutions contained the clause, to wit, "nor while confined in any public prison." Section 3 of said article 6 of our Constitution prohibits certain persons from voting, and includes those "confined in prison on conviction of a criminal offense." The laws establishing the soldiers' homes in New York, Michigan, and Kansas are quite different from that establishing the soldiers' home in Idaho. They provide only for the admission of disabled indigent and pauper soldiers and sailors,—those who are dependent upon charity for their support; and they must be discharged or turned out as soon as they become self-supporting. Inmates of those homes were admitted for temporary purposes only, and could not acquire a permanent domicile or residence therein. In Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, the court said: "The intending voter was in

Bath [the town where said home was situated] as a mere inmate of the institution, and for a temporary purpose;" and held that he was not a legal voter, and says: "But the question in each case is still, as it was before the adoption of the Constitution, one of domicile or residence, to be decided upon all the circumstances of the case." Why did that court there say that each case must be decided upon all of the circumstances of the case, if it intended to hold that the one fact that being an inmate of such institution prohibited such inmate from gaining a voting residence? The case of Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837, quotes largely from the opinion in Silvey v. Lindsay. The law that established the soldiers' home of Michigan and the rules and regulations adopted for its government show that it was a poor house for pauper soldiers and sailors, and the decision in that case clearly indicates that the court so held. It is stated on page 367, 97 Mich., page 218, 23 L. R. A. and page 839, 56 N. W., as follows: "If the construction [of the provision of the Constitution under consideration] contended for by the relator be correct, it follows that all of the inmates of county almshouses and of prisons and jails are electors, at their option, in the townships and cities where those institutions are located." The matter stated in that quotation from the Michigan case no doubt had a controlling influence in the decision of it. And it is stated at page 364, 97 Mich., page 217, 23 L. R. A., and page 838, 56 N. W., as follows: "The mischief intended to be avoided is as apparent in this case as in any. The inmates of the home own no property, pay no local taxes, do not work in or for the benefit of the municipality, and have no pecuniary interest in its local affairs. In fact, they have no connection with it, and stand in no relation to the local municipal government." Thus it is shown that that case is very different from the one at bar. The inmates of the Idaho Soldiers' Home may, and, so far as the record shows, do, own property, pay local taxes, do work in and for the benefit of the municipality, and have pecuniary interests in its local affairs. The Constitution of Michigan has no prohibited classes as we have in said § 3, art. 6, of our Constitution. That fact, no doubt, had its influence on the mind of the supreme court in the rendition of said opinion, or at least on the minds of the majority of the court, as that opinion was by a divided court (three to two), as Chief Justice Hooker wrote a dissenting opinion, in which Mr. Justice Long concurred. In reply to that statement in the opinion of the majority of said court wherein it is suggested that the inmates of said home own no property, pay no taxes, and do no work for the benefit of the municipality, the chief justice, in his dissenting opinion, very cogently remarks that "it never has been a requisite to electoral rights that the citizen should pay taxes, do work for the benefit of the municipality, or evince interest in municipal affairs; nor does the right depend upon a wise or even honest exercise of the privilege of the ballot;" that "this proposition is so important a part of the foundation of our institutions that it should not be eliminated or weakened by any unnecessary construction of a Constitution based upon civil liberty and political equality;" and that "the true construction of this section should be just what its language imports,—i. e., that being kept in an almshouse, or attendance at college, or employment in the service of the United States, or the navigation of the lakes or high seas, does not work a change of residence against the intention or desire of the individual." If it be a necessary qualification to vote that one owns property, pays taxes, and does work for the benefit of the municipality, no doubt thousands in this state would be disqualified from voting. If that was a reason for adopting said constitutional provision, it ought to apply to all alike, and not alone to the student, soldier, and old veteran.

What we have said in regard to the case of Wolcott v. Holcomb substantially applies to the case of Lawrence v. Leidigh, 58 Kan. 594, 50 Pac. 600, and the court apparently rests its opinion upon the New York and Michigan cases, supra, and the further fact that the law establishing the soldiers' home in Kansas provided in direct terms that inmates of said homes could not acquire a legal residence while inmates of said home. In Warren v. Board of Registration, 72 Mich. 398, 2 L. R. A. 203, 40 N. W. 553, Justice Campbell, after quoting § 5 of article 7 of the Constitution of that state, which is the same, so far as the question under consideration is concerned, as said § 5, art. 6, of the Idaho Constitution, says, "These provisions do not prevent such persons from becoming residents if such is their purpose, and if they are able to choose." One class of persons named in said section of the Michigan Constitution was those confined in public prisons. They were not "able to choose." That court held that all of the classes named in said section that were able to choose were not prohibited by the provisions of said section from becoming residents for voting purposes.

The case of Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 30 Pac. 19, is a soldiers' home case, is directly in point, and sustains the contention of respondent. In that case a number of the inmates of the veterans' home, and inmates of the county infirmary, and certain students of Napa College voted at an election held in the precincts of the county in which those institutions are situated. The appellant contended that such inmates and students had not been residents of the county and precincts in which they respectively voted during the period of thirty days immediately prior to said election, and for that reason were not qualified electors. The testimony of one of the inmates of the veterans' home is quoted in said opinion, and it is stated in the opinion that the evidence of said witness upon the issue as to the qualifications of said witness is substantially a fair sample of that applicable to each of the other inmates of the veterans' home, the infirmary, and the college, whose votes were adjudged to have been legal. Said evidence is as follows: Killalee came to the county and to the precinct and entered the home as an inmate on November 14, 1891. For some time prior to this date he was living on the charity of relatives and friends in the city and county of San Francisco, where he was an elector. He made and subscribed the usual application, and obtained a permit to enter the home. He says that: "The reason I went there was because I was in indigent circumstances. Circumstances compelled me to go, and I would not have gone there had it not been for those circumstances. I had no desire to become a resident of the veterans' home or the precinct other than as induced by my indigent circumstances. Since I have been there, I have been maintained and supported by the home. At the time I went there I did not have any fixed intention with respect to the length of time I should stay there. It was my intention to stop there as long as I lived. I have no other interests in the precinct except my relations with the home. I went there with the expectation of living and dying there,—making it my permanent home the balance of my life. I have no relatives or property interest in the veterans' home precinct. I have no other home. At the time I went there, it was my intention to make the home my permanent home. I make it as a home to live and die—as a refuge." The question presented in that case was whether or not said witness "Killalee was a legal resident of the veterans' home precinct, and entitled to vote at the last general election." It was conceded in that case, as in the case at bar, that said witness had all of the requisite qualifications of an elector, except that of residence; and it was contended there, as here, that said witness could not gain a residence for the purpose of voting at the soldiers' home while there as a beneficiary at public expense, for the reason that the gaining of such is prohibited by the 4th section of the 2d article of the Constitution of that state, which is as follows: "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the service of the United States nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this state, or of the United States, or of the high seas; nor while a student at any seminary of learning; nor while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense; nor while confined in any public prison." In reference to that section of the California Constitution that court said: "As construed by our supreme court in the case of People ex rel. Budd v. Holden, 28 Cal. 137, this section does not have the effect claimed for it by counsel for appellant. In that case the qualification of soldiers to vote while employed in the service of the United States was questioned, and it was decided that their presence in Mendocino county while thus employed in the service of the United States did not 'preclude them from acquiring a residence in Mendocino, if disposed to do so.' The court further said: 'That it was their intention to acquire a domicile in Mendocino county sufficiently appears from the evidence. Such being the case, there is nothing in the constitutional provision in question (which is merely declaratory of the common law) which stands in the way of their doing so.' After quoting the above from the decision of People ex rel. Budd v. Holden, the court says: "Thus their residence for the purpose of voting in Mendocino county was made to depend upon the proof of their intention to make that county their place of residence while there present in the service of the United States, there being no question that they had all other requisite qualifications of electors;" and holds that said decision is clearly in point for respondents. The provisions of the California Constitution under which said case arose are identical with our own upon the point under consideration, and the court in that opinion construed said provisions, and gave them the effect intended, to wit, they were adopted for the benefit of, and to enlarge and protect the rights of, those classes, and were not intended to deprive them of a privilege so common in this country. To the same effect is Pedigo v. Grimes, 113 Ind. 148, 13 N. E. 700. That case involved the right of a student attending college to vote. The court said: "Taking the view of the testimony most favorable to the appellant, the utmost that can be said of it is that the voters entered the state university at Bloomington without, at the time of entering, having formed a definite intention of making that place their residence, but that they did subsequently determine that it should be their residence. This gave them the right to vote, because there is no evidence that this was not their intention, formed and acted upon in good faith. We think it clear that, if they had gone to Bloomington with the intention of remaining simply as students, and there was no change of intention, they would not have acquired a residence." Several authorities are then cited, and the opinion proceeds: "Where, however, the intention is formed to make the college town the place of residence, and that place is selected as the domicile, then the person who does this in good faith becomes a qualified voter." Apply the correct and reasonable rule there laid down to the case at bar, and the plain intention of the provisions of said § 5 of our Constitution is effected and accomplished, and no one disfranchised by a court-made constitutional provision. In the case at bar it is agreed that each of the persons whose vote is questioned would testify "that they abandoned their former residences and places of abode with no intention of returning thereto, and took up their residence in said Soldiers' Home precinct, Ada county, Idaho, and thereafter resided and continued to reside therein with the intention of permanently remaining and residing there." Thus it is shown that said persons abandoned their former residence and place of abode without any "intention of returning there, and took up their residence in said Soldiers' Home precinct with the intention of permanently remaining and residing in said precinct;" not to be turned out as soon as their physical or financial condition permitted, as the laws of the states of Michigan and Kansas required to be done in those states. The good faith and intention of said persons is not questioned, but it is contended that they cannot gain a residence in said precinct while an inmate of said home. Apply to the above facts—which clearly show intention—the reasonable rule laid down in the Indiana case above cited, and the brave old veterans, whose heroism and self-sacrifice assisted in preserving the unity of the nation, will not be disfranchised by court-made constitutional provisions.

In Shaeffer v. Gilbert, 73 Md. 66, 20 Atl. 434, which is a college student case, the court, in passing upon the meaning of the word "residence," as used in the Constitution of Maryland, says: "It does not mean, as we have said, one's permanent place of abode, where he intends to live all his days, or for an indefinite or unlimited time; nor does it mean one's residence for a temporary purpose; . . . but means, as we understand it, one's actual home in the sense of having no other home, whether he intends to reside there permanently or for a definite or indefinite length of time;" and holds under the facts of that case, the defendant had a right to vote. In Vanderpool v. O'Hanlon, 53 Iowa, 246, 36 Am. Rep. 216, 5 N. W. 119,—a college student case,—it is held that, to constitute a residence within the meaning of the article of the Constitution prescribing qualifications of voters, the fact of residence and the intent to remain must concur. Both of which concur in the case at bar. In § 69, Paine, Elections, referring to college students, the author says: "The question of residence is to be determined by all the circumstances of each case. Among such circumstances, the intent of the party, the existence or absence of other ties or interests elsewhere, the dwelling place of the parents, or, in the case of an orphan, just of age, of near friends, with whom he had been accustomed to make his home in his minority, would, of course, be of the highest importance." And in § 70 it is said: "Under a Constitution declaring that 'the residence of a student at any seminary of learning shall not entitle him to the right of suffrage in the town in which such seminary is situated,' while such residence will not entitle him to the right, it will not prevent its acquisition." So in the case at bar, under the provisions of said § 5 of our Constitution, which is that, for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while residing at the soldiers' home, the mere fact of such residence will not, of itself, entitle him to the right to vote. Such residence, however, will not prevent the acquisition of such right. In McCrary, Elections, 3d ed. 54 L. R. A.

§ 66, it is stated as follows: "It will be found, from an examination of the authorities, and from a full consideration of the subject, that the question whether or not a student at college is a bona fide resident of the place where the college is located must in each case depend upon the facts. . . . In a word, it is necessary, from a survey of all the facts, to determine whether while at college he is at home, his residence, or temporarily absent from it." It was laid down in Putnam v. Johnson, 10 Mass. 488, in 1813, that the question of residence was one of act and intention as applied to college students, and is still so held by the decided weight of authority; and college students, under § 5 of our Constitution, are placed in the same category with inmates of our soldiers' home. And said section leaves it with that class of persons to retain the former home as a voting place, or permits them to adopt their present home for that purpose. To the same effect is the Opinion of the Justices, 5 Met. 587. In Re Green, 5 Fed. 145, it is held under the provisions in the Constitution of the state of New York, in order to prove a residence in an election district something more must be shown than the fact of having lived in marine barracks located within the limits of such district in the capacity of a marine. Many of the cases hold that something more must be shown than mere residence at such home; but none of the cases cited, as I read them, hold that residence at such a home is a prohibition against the inmate gaining a voting residence while residing there, except Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837, and Lawrence v. Leidigh, 58 Kan. 594, 50 Pac. 600.

It is said in Silvey v. Lindsay: "But the question in each case is still, as it was before the adoption of the Constitution, one of domicile or residence, to be decided upon all the circumstances of the case." The common-law rule disqualified those who were indigent or under the dominion of others, which rule embraces many of those disqualified under § 3, art. 6, of our state Constitution. 1 Bl. Com. Cooley's ed. *171. Under the common-law rule no one became an elector merely by reason of his presence or absence at a certain place. It required something besides mere presence. It required other circumstances; it required intent; it required good faith. The residence must not be for temporary purposes. It must be one's actual home in the sense that he has no other home; no place to return to when away, but that one; abandonment of former home. Those are some of the facts to be shown to prove intent and good faith in establishing a residence, all of which are shown by the record in this case. The question of residence, as applied to electors, is one of act and intent, as laid down by a long line of decisions of courts and law writers; and that rule has not been changed by the provisions of said § 5 of our Constitution. In the case of People v. Cady, 143 N. Y. 100, 25 L. R. A. 399, 37 N. E. 673, the question was presented whether a prisoner imprisoned in the Tombs city prison could gain a residence therein for voting purposes. The court held that he could not; that the Tombs was not a place of residence; it was not constructed or maintained for that purpose. The court says: "The domicile or home requisite as a qualification for voting purposes means a residence which the voter voluntarily chooses and has a right to take as such, and which he is at liberty to leave, as interest or caprice may dictate, but without any present intention to change it."

It has been suggested that the 5th section of article 6 of the Constitution of Idaho was adopted from the Constitution of New York, and that in adopting that provision we adopted the construction placed upon it in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, 13 N. E. 444, by the court of last resort of that state. I have followed that rule as I read that decision, but, if I have not construed it according to its true intent and meaning, I would say, as this court has heretofore said, that the rule referred to is a general rule, but, where such decision places a construction thereon that is clearly erroneous, iniquitous, and unjust, this court is not bound by said rule, and ought not to be bound by such construction. Had the framers of our Constitution intended, by the provisions of said § 5, to prohibit inmates admitted from other counties from voting in the county where the home is located, why did not they use plain and simple language to that effect? I have no doubt that they would have done so had they intended to prohibit such persons from voting. The language used in said § 5 is too plain to be misunderstood, and, to construe it to prohibit such inmates as the 40 referred to in this case from voting, the prohibition must be read into it, for it is not there as the section now stands. It was said by the supreme court of Oregon, in the case of Darragh v. Bird, 3 Or. 239, after quoting § 4, art. 2, of the Constitution of Oregon, which is as follows: "For the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the service of the United States or of this state," and § 5 of the same article: "The question of residence being one of act and intention, the framers of the Constitution left the matter entirely to the discretion of the parties themselves." If the contention of appellants is right, the 5th section of the Constitution of Oregon was a work of supererogation, as it positively prohibits soldiers quartered in that state from voting there; and § 4 of said article, so far as the pretended prohibition is concerned, contains the exact words of § 5 of the Idaho Constitution. The people, by adopting that provision of the Constitution, left the question of residence, where it was before, entirely to the discretion of the parties themselves,—that question being one of act and intention; and said, "We will neither enlarge nor restrict the right of persons in this respect, but leave it with them to elect as to where they will claim their residence." The words, "for the purpose of voting," etc., clearly indicate that the matter was left with the elector himself to select the place of his residence. The section of our Constitution under consideration prohibits anyone from questioning the right of the persons therein named from voting at the place from whence they were admitted to such home, but it does not prohibit them from changing their residence therefrom for voting purposes. The Constitution of Idaho prescribes the qualifications of an elector, and authorizes the legislature to prescribe other qualifications if it desires to do so. And the language of Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 23 L. R. A. 215, 56 N. W. 837, is quoted with approval as a reason for the adoption of said § 5 of article 6 of our Constitution, to wit, that the inmates do not own property, do not pay taxes, and do not work for the benefit of the municipality. We would suggest that, had the framers of the Constitution desired to prohibit the classes of persons named in said section from acquiring a residence, why was not plain and simple language to that effect used? It is not the province of this court to make any additional qualifications to those provided by the Constitution and legislative enactment. The right of suffrage is considered a sacred privilege, and it was plainly the intention of the framers of our Constitution to extend that right to all persons except those excluded therefrom by its strict terms. And, if this court has due regard for the rights of the citizen, it will not disfranchise him, or so construe the Constitution as to effect his disfranchisement, unless by its strict terms it is clearly required.

Where a constitutional provision is susceptible of two constructions, that construction should be adopted which will protect and save the right of suffrage to the citizen; and the decided weight of authority sustains the construction herein placed upon said constitutional provision. As our government is based upon civil liberty and political equality, and the right of suffrage being one of its foundation stones, no person should be disfranchised by construction of the provisions of our Constitution, which provisions may reasonably be construed in favor of suffrage. Are those old veterans an undesirable and ignorant class in whose hand the ballot ought not to be placed? We think not. But my brothers say their construction of said section of our Constitution does not disfranchise them. I admit that it does not in terms, but in effect it does; for, by reason of wounds received in battle, disease, and old age, many of them are unable to return to the counties from whence they entered said home to vote, and they are as effectually disfranchised as though it were held that they could not vote at all. It was held in the California, Oregon, Iowa, and other cases above cited, under constitutional provisions the same as our own, that, the question of residence being one of act and intention, the framers of our Constitution left the matter entirely to the discretion of the parties themselves.

That provision of our Constitution is merely declaratory of the common law, and does not stand in the way of an inmate of said home acquiring therein a residence for voting purposes. It was made to protect his right to vote, and not to disfranchise him, and it ought to be so construed. While residing at the soldiers' home, those old veterans are not temporarily absent from home. They are at home. They are there to remain, with the right to remain permanently. They have abandoned the place from whence they came without any intention of returning, and have established their permanent residence at said home in good faith. They had a right to do those things. They had a right to choose, and did those acts voluntarily. They may remain there till death, or leave that home whenever they choose to do so. They are not under the dominion of others, as persons who are in prison or in almshouses subject to the absolute will of others, as was the condition of those persons referred to in the New York, Michigan, and Kansas cases above cited. The residence of the old veterans at said home is their permanent place of abode, as permanent as the residence of thousands of the voters in this state, and is a sufficient residence on which to base the qualifications to vote. The judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

John BOOHER, Appt.,
v.

STATE of Indiana.

(156 Ind. 435.)

Upon trial of an indictment for conspiring to commit murder, the fact of defendant's intoxication at the alleged time of the commission of the offense may be considered by the jury as bearing upon the existence of the felonious intent necessary to render him guilty.

(April 16, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kosciusko County convicting him of conspiracy to murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Arthur F. Biggs and Levi R. Stoekey, for appellant:

The jury had no right to wholly disregard and cast aside all evidence of the defendant's condition as to being intoxicated on the evening that the alleged offense was committed, but they might consider his voluntary intoxication in determining the grade of the crime of which he was guilty, if they should find him guilty.

Messrs. Cassius C. Hadley and Merrill Moores, with Mr. William L. Taylor, Attorney General, for appellee:

Voluntary intoxication was no excuse for crime; voluntary intoxication was of itself a crime, and a man could not plead in excuse of one crime the fact that he had committed another.

Mr. H. W. Graham also for appellee.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The information upon which appellant was tried and convicted contained three counts. By the first and second appellant is charged, together with two other parties (Stanton Galbreath and Emory Bennett) with having committed an assault and battery upon William Rafter, with the felonious intent to commit murder in the first degree. The third count charges him and four other persons, namely, Galbreath, Bennett, Waggoner, and Dudley, with unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously conspiring, uniting, and confederating together and agreeing with each other for the object and purpose and with the unlawful and felonious intent to unlawfully, feloniously, wilfully, purposely, and with premeditated malice, kill and murder said Rafter, etc. The first and second counts of the information are based on Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2260 (Horner's Rev. Stat. § 1909), which reads as follows: "Whoever perpetrates an assault or an assault and battery upon any human being, with intent to commit a felony, shall, upon conviction thereof, be imprisoned in the state prison not more than fourteen years nor less than two years, and be fined not exceeding $2,000." The third count is based on Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2260 (Horner's Rev. Stat. § 2139), which provides as follows: "Any person or persons who shall unite or combine with any other person or persons for the purpose of committing a felony, or any person or persons who shall knowingly unite with any other person or persons, or body or association or combination of persons, whose object is the commission of a felony or felonies, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $5,000 nor less than $25, and imprisoned in the state prison not more than fourteen years nor less than two years." Upon appellant's motion he was tried separately and the case against him was submitted to a jury for trial upon the several counts contained in the information, and a verdict was returned finding appellant guilty of the conspiracy as charged in the third count of the information; and over his motion for a new trial, he was sentenced by the court, upon the verdict of the jury, to be imprisoned in the state's prison for an indeterminate period of not less than two years nor more than fourteen years. From this judgment he appeals, and under his assignment of errors his counsel contend that the trial court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury, and that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence.

The following may be said to be an epitome of the evidence: On the night of March 10, 1900, appellant, John Booher, Stanton Galbreath, Emory Bennett, Ray Wagoner, Lorenzo Dudley, and William Rafter, the prosecuting witness, together with others, were in Hammer's saloon, in the town of Pierceton, Kosciusko county, Indiana. There is no evidence to show that the meeting of these parties was agreed to by any of them, but it appears that they came together casually at the saloon in question. Rafter, it seems, had been at Warsaw during the day, and had been drinking prior to his coming to Hammer's saloon. A short time after he came into the saloon a controversy seems to have arisen between him and Ray Wagoner in regard to a former difficulty or fight which occurred between Rafter and another party. Rafter claimed that he was drunk at the time that he had the fight with the party mentioned, and that for that reason his adversary had succeeded in getting the best of him. Wagoner offered to bet him money that what he asserted was not true. The controversy between these parties became so heated that the bartender directed Rafter to leave the saloon. He seems to have complied with this direction, and went out of the saloon by the front door, but went around and stood at a side door which led into the saloon. Wagoner, upon learning that Rafter was standing at the side door, went to this door and accused the latter of eavedropping, and some further controversy was indulged in between the two parties in respect to the matter which previously had occasioned the quarrel between them in the saloon. After this last controversy, Rafter left, and went to where his horse was tied, a block or more distant from the saloon. He mounted his horse, and apparently started in the direction of his home; but after riding around town for a short time he went to a livery stable, where he procured a piece of cloth and wrapped or tied it around a stone, and then went to a pool room adjoining Hammer's saloon. Appellant, Galbreath, and Wagoner, and other persons, as it appears, were in the pool room when Rafter entered, and they all remained there while Rafter played two games of pool. No words appear to have passed between Rafter and the other parties, and no demonstration of any kind took place. Rafter and the keeper of the pool room, during the time the former was playing, had some words in regard to the payment for the use of the pool table. It being then time for the pool room to close, all of the parties went out on to the street, Rafter and Wagoner going down the middle of the street; and the other parties, who composed the crowd in the pool room, seem to have followed along the sidewalk after Rafter and Wagoner. In regard to the question as to whether Wagoner followed after Rafter down the street, or walked by his side, the evidence is conflicting. Rafter, after arriving at the place where his horse was hitched to a rack, jumped down from the sidewalk into a gutter. Wagoner then said to Rafter, "You get on your horse quick, and get out of town." Upon the trial Rafter testified that after Wagoner had directed him to get on his horse and leave town, as above stated, Wagoner struck at him, and that he in return knocked Wagoner down with the stone which he had tied in the rag as heretofore mentioned. Wagoner testified, upon the other hand, that Rafter struck the first blow and knocked him down, and that he struck or stabbed Rafter in self-defense. After Wagoner had been knocked down by Rafter, the latter states that he heard him say to the persons who were following him: "Come on. We'll catch him and kill him." Thereupon Rafter started and ran, followed by Wagoner and several other persons; and while he was running Wagoner stabbed him several times in the back with a knife, and while running he was knocked down by someone, whose name the evidence does not disclose. After Rafter was knocked down, the evidence shows that appellant got on top of him, and that Rafter threw him off and got up. When Rafter rose up, he states that he saw Galbreath standing over him, or near him, with a club drawn. The wounds which Rafter received at the hands of Wagoner were severe, but not dangerous. There is also evidence to show that after the first quarrel in the saloon between Rafter and Wagoner, appellant said to the latter: "Why didn't you hit him? I would have stood by you if you had." There is evidence which apparently shows that Wagoner and Rafter were both willing to have trouble with each other, and that neither was trying to avoid it. There is no evidence showing any enmity or ill feeling between Rafter and any of the parties prior to the meeting at Hammer's saloon. Evidence was introduced in behalf of appellant which discloses that he had been freely drinking intoxicating liquors prior to and after the time that Rafter came into the saloon on the night in question. Some witnesses testified that he was very drunk on the occasion, and that they saw him previous to the time that Rafter came into the saloon, and that he was so drunk that he was leaning over, with his head resting upon, a table in Hammer's saloon. Other witnesses testified that appellant previous to this assault upon Rafter was so drunk that he staggered. Another testified that immediately after the assault upon Rafter he assisted appellant to get home, and that he was so drunk that he fell down on the way home.

The court, on its own motion, gave to the jury, upon the question of appellant's intoxication, the following instruction, which was the only one given upon that feature of the case: "Voluntary intoxication will not excuse crime. If the defendant, Booher, was drunk, it was his own fault, and he cannot claim any immunity by reason of his intoxication. It was his duty to keep sober, and if he voluntarily permitted himself to become intoxicated, and while so intoxicated he committed the crime charged, in any form, he is guilty, and should be punished precisely the same as though he had been sober. It is not the law that a man may voluntarily become intoxicated and commit crime, and escape punishment by reason of such intoxication; but, upon the other hand, it is the law that he cannot use his own voluntary intoxication to escape the consequences of his acts while so intoxicated." Counsel for appellant contend that the court in giving this charge clearly erred to the prejudice of the accused. They concede that voluntary intoxication is no excuse for the commission of a crime, but nevertheless they insist that it may be considered where the essence of the crime depends upon the intent with which the act is done, or where an essential element of the crime consists in doing an unlawful act with deliberation and premeditated purpose. Under such circumstances, it is insisted that the mental condition of the accused, whether occasioned by voluntary intoxication or otherwise, is an important factor to be considered by the court or jury trying the case. The contention of appellant's counsel upon the question involved is supported by the decision of this court in Assman v. State, 123 Ind. 347, 8 L. R. A. 33, 24 N. E. 123. The defendant in that case was charged with murder in the first degree. The lower court refused to charge the jury that voluntary intoxication upon the part of the defendant might be considered to reduce the offense from the highest to the lower grade of murder. In that appeal this court, by Mitchell, Ch. J., after reviewing many authorities in respect to the effect of voluntary intoxication on the part of a person accused of a criminal offense, said: "As a matter of course, the rule is universal that voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime, nor does it in any degree mitigate or palliate an offense actually committed. To hold otherwise would unbridle crime and subvert public order. On the contrary, where there is reason to believe that one has conceived the design to commit a crime, and, while harboring the unlawful purpose, voluntarily become intoxicated, in order to blunt his moral sensibilities and nerve himself up to the execution of his preconceived design, the offense is thereby greatly aggravated. State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799. Where, however, the essence of a crime depends upon the intent with which an act was done, or where an essential ingredient of the crime consists in the doing of an unlawful act with a deliberate and premeditated purpose, the mental condition of the accused, whether that condition be occasioned by voluntary intoxication or otherwise, is an important factor to be considered. [Citing authorities.] Thus, in Oline v. State, 43 Ohio St. 332, 1 N. E. 22, the learned judge delivering the judgment of the court said: 'Where a person, having a desire to do another an unlawful injury, drinks intoxicating liquors to nerve himself to the commission of the crime, intoxication is held, and properly, to aggravate the offense; but at present the rule that intoxication aggravates crime is confined to cases of that class. . . . But in many cases evidence of intoxication is admissible with a view to the question whether a crime has been committed, or, where a crime consisting of degrees has been committed, such evidence may be important in determining the degree.' In Smurr v. State, 88 Ind. 504, the offense charged was murder in the first degree. An instruction which advised the jury that "voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime, as long as the offender is capable of conceiving an intelligent design," was approved as a correct expression of the law. In the case of Crosby v. People, 137 Ill. 325, 27 N. E. 49, the defendant was indicted for an assault with intent to murder. The question arose in regard to his intoxication at the time of the alleged assault. The trial court, in its charge to the jurors, instructed them, in effect, that voluntary drunkenness was no excuse for the commission of any crime or misdemeanor, and that this ruling applied although the intoxication was so extreme as to make the accused unconscious of what he was doing. On appeal the supreme court held that the instruction, as applied to that case, was erroneous. After citing authorities to show that, under the rule asserted at common law, voluntary drunkenness was no excuse or extenuation for crime committed under its influence, and that the same rule prevailed under the statutes of Illinois, it said: "It will be observed that all the cases hold, as our statute provides, that drunkenness is not an excuse for crime; and yet the uniform holding is that where a particular intent is charged, and such intent forms the gist of the offense, as contradistinguished from the intent necessarily entering into every crime,—as where one crime is thereby aggravated into a higher crime, or a misdemeanor enlarged into a felony,—any cause which deprives the defendant of the mental capacity to form such an intent will be a defense to the graver crime. . . . Drunkenness was, therefore, at common law, as under our own statute, no excuse for crime, but, where the nature and essence of the offense is by law made to depend upon the state and condition of the mind of the accused at the time and with reference to the acts done and committed, drunkenness, as a fact affecting the control of the mind, is proper for the consideration of the jury; for if the act must be committed with a specific intent, to constitute the crime charged, and the defendant is incapable of forming any intent whatever, the offense has not been committed. The drunkenness is no excuse for any act done or committed. The defendant may be punished for the consummated offense, whatever it may be; and the want of mind operates, not by way of excuse for crime committed, but renders the accused incapable of committing the graver offense." In State v. Garvey, 11 Minn. 154, Gil. 95, the defendant was indicted for an assault with an intent to do great bodily harm, under a statute which provided that "if any person being armed with a dangerous weapon shall assault another with intent to do great bodily harm, he shall be punished," etc. The intoxication of the accused was involved, and the supreme court, in reviewing the ruling of the lower court upon that feature of the case, said: "It does not appear that Garvey became intoxicated with a view to the commission of the crime, or that before his intoxication he had any intention of committing such crime. The existence or nonexistence of the malicious and felonious intent charged was the principal question to be passed upon by the jury. If Garvey was so drunk as 'not to know what he was doing,' then he had no intention; he was incapable of forming any intention; and any evidence showing this fact should have been admitted by the court." In Mooney v. State, 33 Ala. 419, the charge was assault with intent to commit murder. The court, in that appeal, after holding that the specific intent to commit murder as charged was an essential ingredient of the crime, and that such intent must be proved as charged, said: "Drunkenness certainly does not excuse or palliate any offense. But it may produce a state of mind in which the accused would be totally incapable of entertaining or forming the positive and particular intent requisite to make out the offense. In such a case the accused is entitled to an acquittal of the felony, not because of his drunkenness, but because he was in a state of mind, resulting from drunkenness, which affords a negation of one of the facts necessary to his conviction,"—citing the following authorities: Am. Crim. Law, § 41; Wharton, Homicide, 368; Pigman v. State, 14 Ohio. 555, 45 Am. Dec. 558; Swan v. State, 4 Humph. 136; Pirtle v. State, 9 Humph. 663; Pennsylvania v. McFall, Addison (Pa.) 255; United States v. Roudenbush, Baldw. 514, Fed. Cas. No. 16,198; Haile v. State, 11 Humph. 154. In Whitten v. State, 115 Ala. 72, 22 So. 483, the defendant was indicted and convicted for an assault with intent to forcibly ravish. The trial court refused to charge that if the jury had a reasonable doubt, arising out of the evidence, as to whether the accused was sufficiently sober to form the specific intent to ravish, then the jury could not find him guilty of an assault with such an intent. The court in that appeal, upon the question, said: "We are of opinion the charge should have been given. In order to convict under the statute for an assault with intent to ravish, it is necessary to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant entertained the specific intent charged, and made the assault to accomplish the specific purpose. Mere drunkenness does not excuse or palliate an offense, but it may produce a state of mind which incapacitates the party from forming or entertaining a specific intent. If the mental condition is such that a specific intent cannot be formed, whether this condition is caused by drunkenness or otherwise, a party cannot be said to have committed an offense, a necessary element of which is that it be done with a specific intent. . . . The condition of the defendant's mind, arising from his voluntary drunkenness, was no excuse for the assault,—an offense included in that charged. It can only be considered upon the question of his guilt of the statutory offense for which he was indicted, to wit, an assault with intent to forcibly ravish, which involves the condition of the defendant's mind." In Chrisman v. State, 54 Ark. 288, 15 S. W. 891, the defendant was also convicted of an assault with intent to murder. The court in that appeal, upon the question of the intoxication, said: "But, as the cause must be remanded, we think it proper to say that although voluntary drunkenness cannot, as the jury were told by the court, excuse the commission of a criminal act, yet, where a person is accused of a crime such as can be committed only by doing a particular thing with a specific intent, it may be shown that at the time of doing the thing charged the accused was so drunk that he could not have entertained the intent necessary to constitute the offense." In Reagan v. State, 28 Tex. App. 227, 12 S. W. 601, the accused was charged with having perpetrated an assault with intent to commit rape. It was held in that appeal that evidence which tended to show that when the accused made the attempt he was excessively drunk fairly raised the question of his mental capacity to conceive the criminal intent, and demanded of the trial court a charge to the effect that, in determining whether he had the specific intent to rape at the time he made the attempt, the jury should take into consideration the evidence of his drunkenness, and his consequent mental capacity to form such intent. The court, in conclusion, said: "Appellant is not to be held responsible for the intent if he was too drunk for a conscious exercise of the will to the particular end, or, in other words, too drunk to entertain the intent, and did not entertain it in fact. If he did in fact entertain it, though but for the intoxication he would not have done so, he is responsible for the intent as well as for the acts." In Roberts v. People,

19 Mich. 401, the defendant was charged with an assault with intent to commit murder. The trial court instructed the jury to the effect that his voluntary intoxication at the time of the assault would not excuse him. The supreme court, in that appeal, in reviewing the rulings of the lower court, said: "In determining the question whether the assault was committed with the intent charged, it was therefore material to inquire whether the defendant's mental faculties were so far overcome by the effect of intoxication as to render him incapable of entertaining the intent. . . . But he is not to be held responsible for the intent if he was too drunk for a conscious exercise of the will to the particular end, or, in other words, too drunk to entertain the intent, and did not entertain it in fact. If he did entertain it in fact, though but for the intoxication he would not have done so, he is responsible for the intent as well as the acts." In Warner v. State, 56 N. J. L. 686, 29 Atl. 505, the defendant was convicted in the lower court of murder in the first degree. Upon appeal, in considering the question of intent or design to kill involved under the evidence in that case, the court said: "Design to kill was a fact. A reasonable doubt of the existence of that fact might spring out of the drunkenness of defendant, or out of any other circumstance or combination of drunkenness with other circumstances. . . . The general proposition is that drunkenness is no excuse for crime. The reasoning upon which, in those states in which murder is distinguished by degrees, drunkenness is permitted to modify the degree of the crime, rests upon one requirement essential to constitute murder in the first degree. This requirement is the existence of actual, specific malice,—of an actual intent to take life. Without this there is no crime in that degree. Any condition of fact, whether drunkenness or other circumstance, which shows the nonexistence of this kind of actual malice, is relevant, not as an excuse for crime, but as showing that no statutory crime at all of the degree named was committed. . . . The exceptional immunity extended to the drunkard is limited to those instances where the crime involves a specific, actual intent. When the degree of intoxication is such as to render the person incapable of entertaining such intent, it is an effective defense. If it falls short of this, it is worthless." In § 413, 1 Bishop. New Crim. Law, the author says: "An indictable attempt is committed only when the intent is specific, namely, to do the particular thing which constitutes the substantive crime. If, therefore, one is too drunk to entertain such specific intent, he cannot become guilty of the offense of attempt, however culpable, in a general way, he may be for his drunkenness."

Other authorities of like import might be cited in support of the doctrine for which appellant contends. Those mentioned will suffice to disclose for what purpose the intoxication of the defendant on trial upon the criminal charge which involves a specific, actual intent may be admitted in evidence and considered in his behalf. The intoxication of an accused person, under such cases, is not admissible upon the ground that it of itself excuses or palliates the crime, but is admitted and considered only for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of the mind of the accused in order to determine whether he was incapable of entertaining the specific intent charged, where such intent, under the law, is an essential ingredient of the particular crime alleged to have been committed; hence, where a homicide has been charged to have been committed with premeditated or deliberate intent, the drunkenness of the defendant may be considered as tending to show, under all the circumstances in the case, that the less, and not the greater, homicide was committed. In all criminal cases where the intent of the accused is an essential element, such intent becomes a question of fact to be determined by the jury or court trying the case upon a consideration of all the evidence. In fact, the rule seems to be universally asserted by the authorities that in all prosecutions for an assault with intent to kill the intoxication of the defendant is admissible in evidence, and should be considered by the jury or court trying the case in determining whether he actually entertained the specific intent essential to the crime charged. In addition to the authorities heretofore cited, see 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 411. It does not follow, by any means, in any criminal case in which the intoxication of the accused person may be considered in evidence, from the fact that at the time he committed the alleged crime he was intoxicated that he was thereby rendered incapable of entertaining the specific felonious or criminal intent with which he is charged. He may have been grossly intoxicated, and yet capable of forming the intent to kill and murder, or to commit any other offense in which an intent is an essential element. The correct rule or test in such cases, and the one generally asserted by the authorities, is that the drunkenness of the defendant, in order to rebut such criminal intent, must be of such a degree as to deprive him of the power to deliberate or form the necessary design or guilty intent; otherwise, it is not available. Or, in other words, as affirmed in Aszman v. State, 123 Ind. 357, 8 L. R. A. 33, 24 N. E. 123, mere intoxication of the accused, in the absence of such mental incapacity resulting therefrom as will render a person incapable of thinking deliberately and meditating rationally in forming the guilty design or intent, cannot be regarded as sufficient. There must be, as a result of such intoxication, the absence of that self-determining power which in a sane mind makes it conscious of the real nature of its own purpose, and capable of resisting wrong impulses. Of course, all reasonable doubts arising upon such question or issue must be solved in favor of the accused party. Neither is the drunkenness of the defendant available if the criminal design or intent with which he is charged was formed or entertained before he became intoxicated, during the state of which he carried the intent so formed into effect. It may be further said, in reference to the question of the intoxication of persons accused of the commission of crime, that the law has due regard for the safety of society; and, as such safety to a great extent depends upon the due administration of our criminal laws, hence voluntary intoxication of one at the time he is charged to have violated such laws ought to be most cautiously considered by the jury before arriving at a conclusion that his intoxication rendered him mentally incapable of committing the alleged crime. The specific intent of the appellant in the case at bar to commit the murder as charged under either count of the information was, under the statutes upon which these counts were respectively based, an essential element or ingredient of the offense, and the existence or nonexistence of such felonious intent was one of the principal questions to be decided by the jury. In fact, in entering into or forming a conspiracy, under the statute, there must be a concert of will between and among the conspirators, as well as the intention or purpose to commit the particular felony. Under either the first or second count of the information, in the event the evidence justified, appellant might have been convicted of the assault and battery with intent to commit murder in either the first or second degree, or voluntary manslaughter. State v. Throckmorton, 53 Ind. 354; Jarrell v. State, 58 Ind. 293; Behymer v. State, 95 Ind. 140. It was also within the province of the jury, upon either the first or second count, if warranted by the evidence, to have acquitted appellant of the felonious intent, and convicted him of assault and battery only. Gillespie v. State, 9 Ind. 380; Behymer v. State, 95 Ind. 140; State v. Hattabough, 66 Ind. 223; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 1904.

Applying the principle so fully and generally supported by the authorities to which we have referred, it becomes manifest that the intoxication of appellant, which was admitted in evidence, ought to have been considered by the jury for the purpose of rebutting the felonious intent to kill and murder the prosecuting witness, with which, as charged under the first and second counts, he committed the assault and battery, and with which, under the third count, he entered into the conspiracy in question. By the instruction in dispute the trial court, in effect, at least, virtually withdrew or excluded from the jury the consideration of the intoxication of appellant for any purpose. We must assume that the evidence in respect to his intoxication was admitted for the only purpose for which it was legitimately admissible. It could neither be received nor considered for the purpose of excusing or palliating the crime alleged to have been committed, and, under the circumstances, the charge which the court gave upon that question may be said to have been wholly inapplicable to the evidence, and must at least have tended to mislead the 54 L. R. A.

jury. It was, of course, proper for the court to have advised the jury in respect to the abstract proposition that appellant's drunkenness was no excuse or palliation for the crime charged; but the instruction went beyond this, and advised them that if appellant was intoxicated when he committed the crime charged, "in any form," he was guilty, and should be punished, etc. The guilt of appellant in respect to the particular crime imputed to him was the essential question propounded to the jury, to be decided upon the consideration of all the evidence in the case; and his intoxication was a matter for the jury to consider in determining the question of the existence of the felonious intent,—an essential element of the crime of which he was accused. As to whether his intoxication was in such a degree as to render him mentally incapable of forming or entertaining the design or intent to commit the felony charged was, as previously stated, solely a question of fact to be determined from all the evidence in the case.

It follows that the court erred in giving the instruction in controversy, for which error the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the lower court, with instructions to grant appellant a new trial. The clerk will issue the proper warrant to the warden of the state prison for the return of the prisoner to the custody of the sheriff of Kosciusko county.

City of SOUTH BEND et al., Appts.,
v.

Bennie TURNER, by Next Friend.

1. One of two defendants cannot assign errors upon a general exception by both to the overruling by the court of demurrers to the complaint, filed, one by both defendants demurring generally to each paragraph of the complaint, and others by the complaining defendant attacking specified paragraphs of it.
2. Although the statute allows complaint for the first time in the appellate court, in case of absence from the complaint of averments essential to the cause of action, or the presence of some averment which absolutely destroys the right to recover, yet mere uncertainty or inadequacy of averment, which might have been amended or cured, will be deemed to have been waived by a defendant who proceeds with the trial to final judgment without objection.

As to liability of city for negligent construction of sewer generally, see Uppington v. New York (N. Y.) 53 L. R. A. 550, and footnote thereto.

sewer in a public street is not relieved from liability for injuries to persons using the street by the fact that it was in the exclusive possession of the contractor, if it had notice, or might have had notice by the exercise of proper oversight, that its licensee had acted in a negligent manner and left the street in an unsafe and dangerous condition.

4. A municipal corporation which, in constructing a sewer in a public street, leaves a manhole uncovered for several weeks, and near it a pile of sand, with knowledge that children are accustomed to play in the sand, will be liable for injuries to a child of tender years who, while at play in the sand, falls into the manhole and is injured.
5. To overthrow a general verdict by answers to special interrogatories they must be of such a nature as to exclude the possible existence of other controlling facts provable under the issue relating to the same subject.
6. For the purpose of overthrowing a general verdict in favor of a child who, while playing on a sand pile in a public street, fell into an open manhole and was injured, the court will not assume, from the fact that he was six and a half years old, that he was so advanced in knowledge as to be able to know when he was in a place where he ought not to be, and to appreciate the evidences and presence of danger.
7. It is reversible error to refuse defendant in an action by a child for personal injuries an order for a physical examination of plaintiff by physicians to be appointed by the court, where defendant has no other method of determining the extent of the injury, and the examination may be made without pain or danger to the plaintiff.

APPEAL by defendant City from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marshall County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. E. Howard and Joseph G. Orr, with Mr. O. M. Cunningham, for appellants:

The city of South Bend was not itself engaged in building this sewer, and cannot, therefore, be primarily chargeable with negligence, should any be shown, in its construction.

Warsaw v. Dunlap, 112 Ind. 576, 11 N. E. 623, 14 N. E. 568.

The amended complaint, by its particular allegations, shows that there was no negligence on the part of the contractors; and, in the next place, even if this complaint should be held sufficient to show negligence on the part of the contractors, and, at the same time, freedom from contributory negligence on the part of appellee, still it must be very plain that it shows no negligence on the part of the city of South Bend.

The construction company, prior to the accident, repeatedly warned and turned boys and others away from the place in question. This was all that the company or its agents could do, and all that they were required by law to do. They were not called upon to keep such visitors away by main force.

Appellee was quite as capable of taking care of himself in the dangerous places where he persisted in going as were any of the other visitors to the sewer.

Pennsylvania Co. v. Meyers, 136 Ind. 258, 36 N. E. 32.

Appellee is chargeable with negligence which brought about his own injury. The court not only had the right to order a physical examination, but, under the circumstances as they appeared to the court at the time of the submission of this motion, the court's refusal to grant it in the furtherance of justice was error.

Messrs. F. J. L. Meyer and Charles P. Drummond for appellee.

Hadley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit by appellee to recover damages for personal injuries. The facts set forth in the complaint are substantially as follows: On the 8th day of April, 1894, the defendants, being, respectively, a municipal and a private corporation, were engaged in the construction of a trunk sewer for the defendant city through one of its public streets, declining northward, and terminating in St. Joseph river. That at a point near its terminus the defendants constructed a manhole, circular in form, and 2½ feet in diameter, near the center of a public street crossing, thus constituting a means of communication with said sewer from the surface of the street to the bottom of said sewer, a distance of 29 feet. That said manhole was carelessly and negligently permitted by the defendants to be open and uncovered on said day, and was and had been carelessly and negligently permitted by the defendants to be and remain open and uncovered continuously prior thereto for many days and weeks, without any signal or warning of any kind, and without any protection to persons lawfully upon the street. That said sewer, from its mouth or terminus to the manhole, and for some distance beyond, had been in part completed, and large piles of sand had been piled upon the street where the sewer was completed, near the manhole, by the defendants, and had been by them carelessly and negligently permitted to remain there, and were calculated to, and did, attract children for the purpose of engaging in play in the sand. That the children in the neighborhood were accustomed, with the knowledge of the defendants, to play in the street with said sand piles. That the plaintiff on said day, being six and one-half years of age, was so engaged at play with said sand piles, and at the time did not know of the open condition of the manhole, and while so engaged in play, and while in the exercise of due care and caution, did, by reason of the negligence of the defendants as aforesaid, fall into said open manhole, and was precipitated to the bottom of the sewer, without fault, and without any warning by the defendants of the danger existing by reason of the open manhole, and whereby he was greatly injured.

The complaint is in four paragraphs. The first was withdrawn. The second and third are, in substance, the same. The fourth charges that the manhole at the time of the accident was, and had been for many days and weeks, negligently suffered by the defendants to be and remain insufficiently covered, etc. The joint demurrer of the defendants and the separate demurrer of the defendant city to each paragraph of the complaint were overruled, and a joint exception to both rulings reserved. Upon issues joined, the jury returned a general verdict for appellee, and answers to divers interrogatories. The city alone appeals, and assigns for error (1) the insufficiency of the facts stated to constitute a cause of action against it; (2) the action of the court in overruling its demurrer to each paragraph of the complaint; (3) in overruling its separate motion for judgment in its favor on the answers to interrogatories; and (4) in the overruling of its separate motion for a new trial.

No question upon the complaint is properly presented by the demurrers. The record shows that "the defendants demur to each paragraph of the complaint," etc. Then follow three separate papers, being the separate demurrers of the defendant city to each the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the complaint, and the record then proceeds: "Which demurrers the court overruled, to which ruling of the court defendants except." Exceptions taken thus in gross reserve no question, and the assignment of error predicated thereon by one of the exceptors is futile. Johnson v. McCulloch, 89 Ind. 270, 273; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Trissal, 98 Ind. 566, 570; Walter v. Walter, 117 Ind. 247, 249, 20 N. E. 148; Elliott, App. Proc. § 788.

Appellant, however, makes an independent assignment of error that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against it. The total absence from the complaint of any averment of some fact or facts essential to the existence of the cause of action, or the presence of some averment that absolutely destroys the plaintiff's right of recovery, may be for the first time raised in this court by an independent assignment of errors, under Rev. Stat. 1891, § 346, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 346, Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 543; but mere uncertainty or inadequacy of averment, such as might have been amended and cured upon motion seasonably made, will be deemed to have been waived by a defendant who proceeds with the trial to final judgment without objection, and who brings his complaint for the first time after the cause of action has been strengthened by the verdict of a jury and the presumptions indulged in favor of the decisions of the trial court upon the motions for judgment and for a new trial. Shoemaker v. Williamson, 156 Ind. 384, 59 N. E. 1051, and authorities cited; Kinney v. Dodge, 101 Ind. 573; Smith v. Smith, 106 Ind. 43, 45, 5 N. E. 411. This assignment of error challenges the complaint as an entirety, and if any paragraph thereof is sufficient the assignment must fail. Buchanan v. Lee, 69 Ind. 117; Carese

v. Foster, 62 Ind. 145; Miller v. Billingsly, 41 Ind. 489, 492. The complaint avers that the defendants were constructing the sewer; that they had constructed the manhole; that the defendants negligently permitted the manhole to be and remain open and uncovered on the day of the plaintiff's injury, and to so be and remain open and uncovered continuously for several weeks prior thereto, and negligently permitted a large sand pile, which defendants had produced, to be and remain on said day, and for several weeks prior thereto, near the manhole, and at a point on said sewer where the same was completed, with the knowledge that the children in the neighborhood, including the plaintiff, were accustomed to play in said sand pile. There is no suggestion in the complaint that the defendant construction company was an independent contractor, nor that it had the exclusive possession of the street; nor does it appear, from anything averred, except for the presence of the sand pile, that the public was prevented or in any way denied the usual right of play or travel in the street. Even assuming, as appellee argues, that the facts pleaded show that the street was so obstructed by the construction of the sewer as to be inconsistent with public use, and that the construction company was necessarily in the exclusive possession of the street, the city would not thereby be relieved of liability, when it is shown that it had notice, or might have had notice by the exercise of proper oversight, that its licensee had acted in a negligent manner, and left its streets in an unsafe and dangerous condition. Stalder v. Huntington, 153 Ind. 354, 362, 55 N. E. 88; Senhenn v. Evansville, 140 Ind. 675, 40 N. E. 69; Indianapolis v. Doherty, 71 Ind. 5; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 634. We are unable to see why the complaint is not sufficient against the city if tested by demurrer, and it is clearly so when questioned for the first time in this court.

With respect to the motion for judgment on the answers to interrogatories notwithstanding the general verdict, the rule is that all reasonable presumptions must be indulged against the special answers and in support of the general verdict, and if the general verdict, thus aided, is not in irreconcilable conflict with the answers, it must stand. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Creek, 130 Ind. 139, 142, 14 L. R. A. 733, 29 N. E. 481; British American Assur. Co. v. Wilson, 132 Ind. 278, 283, 31 N. E. 938; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 134 Ind. 16, 33 N. E. 774; Consolidated Stone Co. v. Summit, 152 Ind. 297, 53 N. E. 235. The reason of the rule is that the jury is required to pronounce upon all the issuable facts proved in the case, while the court, in testing the force of isolated facts disclosed by answers to interrogatories, does not know and cannot know what other facts touching the same matters were rightfully before the jury to justify their verdict. Therefore, in conceding to the jury the presumption of right judgment, to overthrow its general verdict the special facts returned must be of such a nature as to exclude the possible existence of other controlling facts, provable under the issues, relating to the same subject. The answers show that the construction company had exclusive possession of the street at the manhole for the purpose of building the sewer, that said company frequently warned boys away from playing in the sand pile near the open manhole, that the plaintiff knew that the manhole was uncovered, and that he was six and one-half years of age; and from the answers it is contended that it affirmatively appears that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and the city free from liability. If there were no other answers supportive of the general verdict, we could not approve the contention. We could not assume that a boy six and one-half years of age was so advanced in knowledge as to be able to know when he was in a place where he ought not to be, and to appreciate the evidences and presence of danger (Cleveland, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Klee, 154 Ind. 430, 56 N. E. 234); nor would the isolated fact that the construction company had the exclusive possession of the street for the purpose of building the sewer prevail, as a defense for the city, against the presumptions that would arise under the averments of the complaint that both the construction company and city carelessly permitted the manhole to remain open and uncovered near a sand pile that they knew was attractive to children, and to which they knew children were attracted for play, continuously for many weeks. But by other answers it was found that the plaintiff at the time of the accident did not have intelligence enough to know the danger of the open manhole, nor was it shown that he was ever warned of the danger by anyone. It is further shown that the manhole had been completed for four weeks; that it was within 4 feet of a sand pile 7 feet high, and had been left continuously for two weeks uncovered, with the knowledge of both the city and the construction company, and with their further knowledge that the sand was attractive to the children of the neighborhood, and that they were attracted to it for the purpose of play; that there were no guards or barricades about the manhole, nor on the street or sidewalks, and the street from the manhole to the mouth of the sewer was for two weeks prior to the accident traveled by hundreds of people; that the sewer was completed from its mouth to the manhole and for 300 feet beyond at the time of the accident, except the leveling of the street grade. The motion for judgment upon the answers to interrogatories was properly overruled.

The first ground urged for a new trial is the refusal of the court, upon appellant's motion, to order a physical examination of the plaintiff. Before the commencement of the trial, appellant filed and presented its verified motion that the court select some competent, responsible, and unbiased physician and surgeon of the county to examine the head, leg, and eye of the plaintiff before the beginning of the trial, for the purpose of discovering and giving testimony as to the true character and extent of his injuries, and their probable effect, as to permanency, upon his mind and person; that the plaintiff is a child nine years of age, and was but seven years of age when he received the alleged injuries, and the defendant has had no opportunity and has been wholly unable to inform itself upon the subject of said injuries; that the plaintiff asserts in his complaint that his skull was cracked, his eyes injured, his leg broken, his nervous system impaired, and that his said injuries are great and permanent; that the plaintiff will produce as a witness in his own behalf the physician who attended him in his illness, and the defendant is totally unable to produce any witness who has examined the plaintiff, and who can state from medical knowledge the nature and extent of his injuries, and the probability or improbability of their permanency; that the plaintiff's father be permitted to be present at such examination; that such examination will be able to determine the true nature and extent and probable effect of such injuries, and may be made without pain, humiliation, or danger to the plaintiff. The overruling of this motion presents a question of some difficulty, and upon which the courts of the country are not entirely agreed. It is one, too, that has but recently engaged the attention of the courts of last resort. The fundamental principle, however, is an ancient doctrine of the common law, limited, it is true, to a few classes of cases (among them, mayhem and divorce cases, wherein impotency was charged); but as the sources of evidence have been extended, to parties and in many other ways, its application has been expanded to meet new conditions. The doctrine rests upon the principle that justice is the object of judicial investigation, and that courts charged with its administration, as a necessary means of attaining that end, have inherent power to require the production of the most infallible evidence. That its application to personal injury cases is a modern practice does not disprove its common-law origin. As was well said by Justice Brewer in his dissenting opinion in Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 258, 35 L. ed. 740, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1003: "The silence of common-law authorities upon the question in cases of this kind proves little or nothing. The number of actions to recover damages in early days was, compared with later times, limited; and very few of those difficult questions as to the nature and extent of the injuries, which now form an important part of such litigations, were then presented to the courts. If an examination was asked, doubtless it was conceded without objection, as one of those matters the right to which was beyond dispute. Certainly the power of the courts and the common-law courts to compel a personal examination was in many cases often exercised and unchallenged. Indeed, wherever the interests of justice seem to require such an examination, it was ordered." Beginning with the case of Lloyd v. Hannibal & St. J. E. Co. (decided in 1873) 53 Mo. 509, there 54 L. R. A.

have followed many adjudications upon the power of the trial court to order a physical examination of the plaintiff in suits for personal injuries upon the request of the defendant. In this first case the power, upon slight consideration, was denied. In 1877, in the well-considered case of Schroeder v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 47 Iowa, 375, the power was affirmed. Following this lead, the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Texas, and Wisconsin have reasserted the rule as announced in the Iowa case. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hill (1890) 90 Ala. 71, 9 L. R. A. 442, 8 So. 90; King v. State (1893) 100 Ala. 85, 14 So. 878; Sibley v. Smith (1885) 46 Ark. 275, 55 Am. Rep. 584; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. B. R. Co. (1888) 95 Mo. 169, 8 S. W. 350; Hatfield v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (1885) 33 Minn. 130, 53 Am. Rep. 14, 22 N. W. 176; Stuart v. Havens (1885) 17 Neb. 211, 22 N. W. 419; Hess v. Lake Shore & M. S. K. Co. (1890) 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 565; Miami & M. Turnp. Co. v. Baily (1881) 37 Ohio St. 104; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Langston (1898) 19 Tex. Civ. App. 568, 47 S. W. 1027, 48 S. W. 610; White v. Milwaukee City R. Co. (1884) 61 Wis. 536, 50 Am. Rep. 154, 21 N. W. 524; O'Brien v. La Crosse (1898) 99 Wis. 421, 40 L. R. A. 831, 75 N. W. 81. These cases assert the doctrine that courts are instituted by the state to administer impartial justice to contending parties. In such contests, it is the duty of the court to bestow upon the litigants equal and exact justice. This cannot be done without the court first obtaining the exact and full truth concerning the matters in controversy. Hence from this duty of the court to dispense exact justice is essentially implied all power necessary to its performance, which includes the power to make subservient to its orders all persons and things that will afford the most reliable evidence. In quasi recognition of this power it is the law of this state, and other states, so far as we have observed, that the court may permit the plaintiff, in both civil and criminal cases, to exhibit to the jury such weapons, implements, clothing, and wounds upon his person, or upon the person of the prosecuting witness, as are asserted to be the means or effects of the violence complained of. Indiana Car Co. v. Parker, 100 Ind. 181, 199; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 Ind. 544, 14 N. E. 572, 16 N. E. 197; Hess v. Lourey, 122 Ind. 232, 7 L. R. A. 90, 23 N. E. 166; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Wil-

Loeb, 134 Ind. 563, 33 N. E. 627; Thrawley v. State, 153 Ind. 375, 55 N. E. 95. Such things, when a part of the res gestæ, serve a most useful purpose in assisting the jury to a proper application of the testimony. They are unerring exponents of the truth of the particular fact, and it may not be controverted that when the nature, extent, and effect of a palpable injury is in dispute, not involving scientific questions, the jury may arrive at a more accurate knowledge of the truth by the aid of their own senses than by a verbal description of the observations of others. This being well known to the plaintiff, he is certain to avail himself of this advantage in the trial when the truth will be beneficial to him; and, if impartial justice is to be administered, we see no way of its attainment in all cases if an important source of evidence is open to one and closed to the other. That the question embraces the exercise of scientific knowledge makes no difference. Physicians and surgeons, however honest and learned, are fallible, and, equally with other honest and honorable persons, subject to the unconscious influence of friendships and personal interest; the latter, in surgery cases, involving not only professional reputation, but pecuniary liability. Besides, surgeons of equal learning and honesty may not diagnose an injury in the same way. They may not be equally strong in perception, or equally accurate in observation or in measurements, and thus form different judgments of the existing conditions, which of necessity must constitute the basis of their scientific opinions; and it may be readily seen that if a defendant must make his defense against the expert opinions of the plaintiff's chosen surgeons, without an opportunity of testing the verity of the basis for such opinions, he may be placed at a disastrous disadvantage, such as the law cannot and does not sanction.

The cases above cited as affirming the existence of the power establish the following propositions: (1) That trial courts have the power to order the medical examination by experts of the injured parts of a plaintiff who is seeking to recover damages therefor; (2) that a defendant has no absolute right to demand the enforcement of such an order, but the motion therefor is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court; (3) that the exercise of such discretion is reviewable on appeal, and correctible in cases of abuse; (4) that the examination should be applied for and made before entering upon the trial, and should be ordered and conducted under the direction of the court, whenever it fairly appears that the ends of justice require a more certain ascertainment of important facts which can only be disclosed or fully elucidated by such an examination, and such an examination may be made without danger to the plaintiff's life or health or the infliction of serious pain; (5) that the refusal of the motion when the circumstances appearing in the record present a reasonably clear case for the examination, under the rules stated, is such an abuse of discretion in the trial court as will operate to reverse a judgment for the plaintiff; (6) that such order may be enforced, not by punishment as for a contempt, but by delaying or dismissing the proceeding. The discretion lodged in the trial court, as fairly deducible from the decisions, is a sound discretion, based solely upon legal considerations. When serious and permanent injuries are claimed by the plaintiff, and he or she has submitted to examination by a chosen physician or surgeon, who appears as a witness in plaintiff's behalf, and the nature, extent, and effect of the injury are to be deduced from objective conditions, and so fully from no other source, no degree of sentiment will justify a denial of the motion. When it becomes a question of probable violence to the refined and delicate feelings of the plaintiff, on the one hand, and probable injustice to the defendant, on the other, the law will not hesitate; the court, in making such orders, with respect to time, place, and persons, in every case, having such due regard for the feelings of the plaintiff and proprieties of the case as the ends of justice will permit.

So far as our researches have revealed, the Federal Supreme Court, Justices Brewer and Brown dissenting, now stand alone in denial of the power. Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 15 L. ed. 734, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000. The decisions of New York were confused, and the rule both affirmed and denied in inferior courts, until established by legislative enactment in 1893. Laws 1893, chap. 721; Code Civ. Proc. § 873. The power was first denied in the state of Missouri in Loyd's Case, 53 Mo. 509, in 1873, but affirmed in the same court in Shepard's Case, 85 Mo. 629, 55 Am. Rep. 390, in 1885, and affirmance has been adhered to in many subsequent cases. In Illinois the supreme court, in 1882, in Parker v. Enslow, 102 Ill. 272, 40 Am. Rep. 588, disposed of the question in a single line, as follows, "The court had no power to make or enforce such an order," and in subsequent decisions, while not expressly overruling the Parker Case, recognized the existence of the power when properly and timely invoked. See Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Holland (1887) 122 Ill. 461, 13 N. E. 145; St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Miller (1891) 136 Ill. 465, 28 N. E. 1091. The decisions in Indiana, in the words of the majority opinion of the Federal Supreme Court in the Botsford Case, 141 U. S. 250, 15 L. ed. 734, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000, "are conflicting and indecisive." In the first appearance of the question before this court in any form, in 1885, in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 Ind. 409, 416, 417, 3 N. E. 389, 4 N. E. 908, in ruling upon the competency of evidence touching the details of a physical examination of the plaintiff under an order of court, made upon the defendant's motion, the right of the trial court to make the order is not questioned. Kern v. Bridwell, 119 Ind. 226, 21 N. E. 664, was an action for slander for charging the plaintiff with lewdness. The court refused to order the plaintiff to submit her person to examination by medical experts. The question related to a collateral matter, and not to the subject-matter of the suit,—to a source of evidence not shown to be reliable or useful to the defendant in his answer of justification,—and should not be accepted as an authority in a suit by a plaintiff to recover damages for a particular injury to his person. The question came before the court in Hess v. Lowrey, 122 Ind. 225, 7 L. R. A. 90, 23 N. E. 156, and the request for an examination denied because untimely made. The court, by Mitchell, J., said: "It is undoubtedly true that the court may, in its discretion, in a proper case, if application is seasonably made, require the plaintiff to submit his person to a reasonable examination by competent physicians and surgeons, when necessary to ascertain the nature, extent, and permanency of injuries." The case of Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Bruner, 128 Ind. 542, 26 N. E. 178, presenting a like question, was ruled by Hess v. Lowrey, 122 Ind. 225, 7 L. R. A. 90, 23 N. E. 156. In Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer, 129 Ind. 409, 28 N. E. 860, the question we have here came before the court for decision, and it was there held that the power of the court to order an examination did not exist; the court regarding what was said in Hess v. Lowrey as obiter. Upon further, and perhaps fuller, consideration of the question, we are satisfied that the decision in the Newmeyer Case upon this point is refuted by the great weight of authority, and it is therefore disapproved. It is insisted that the question should be ruled by the decision of the Federal Supreme Court, but adopted as our own language, used by Montgomery, J., in Graves

v. Battle Creek, 95 Mich. 266, 19 L. R. A. 641, 54 N. W. 757, with respect to the Botsford decision: "This decision is entitled to very great weight, but, in view of the manifest justice of a requirement that the plaintiff in case of personal injury shall produce the best evidence attainable, we think this case should not be permitted to stem the otherwise almost unbroken current of authority upon the subject." In the case at bar the motion of the defendant was timely. The injuries were alleged to be serious and permanent, as affecting both the body and mind of the plaintiff. The plaintiff would produce in his own behalf his attending physician. The defendant had no opportunity to inspect the injuries, or in any way inform itself as to their nature, extent, and effect, and was wholly unable to contest, if it should be contested, the testimony of the plaintiff's expert witness. An examination by skilled and unbiased physicians would enable them to determine the nature and extent of the injuries, and, at least in a degree, to determine their effect and permanency, and could be made without danger or pain to the plaintiff. The application was made before the trial began, more than two years after the infliction of the injuries, and clearly presents a case where the trial court should have exercised its discretion in favor of the motion. For error of the court in overruling the motion, the appeal must be sustained.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to grant appellant's motion for a new trial.

(.....Kan.....)

- *1. Negligence, to be actionable, must result in damage to someone, which result, in the absence of wantonness or malice animi, might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence, and be the probable result of the initial act.
2. The allegation of negligence is not sustained by evidence of acts resulting in damage to another, which result is not the reasonable and ordinary outcome of such acts, and which would not have been foreseen or anticipated by the exercise of ordinary prudence and foresight under all the circumstances of the case.

ERROR to the District Court for Rice County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiffs' intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frigg & Williams for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. T. F. Foley and Samuel Jones for defendants in error.

Cunningham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A firm composed of M. E. Richardson and Samuel Haston was engaged in the butcher business in the city of Sterling, and in connection therewith had a slaughterhouse and stock yards on a tract of land a short distance from that town. They had in their employ one D. Cleghorn, who was in charge of the slaughterhouse and stock yards. Dogs had upon various occasions been about the slaughterhouse and yards, causing annoyance and trouble; and Cleghorn had been instructed that, if the dogs returned, to kill them. A Colts rifle, carrying a No. 32 cartridge, was in use at the slaughterhouse. On the east of the tract of land on which the slaughterhouse was located, and about 70 to 80 rods therefrom, was a public highway, running north and south, which was traveled generally by people going to and coming from Sterling. To the east and northeast of the slaughterhouse and pens the land rose gradually to the road spoken of. From the slaughterhouse and pens a portion of this north and south road was visible, and a portion was not. On the morning of the 31st of January, 1898, about 9 o'clock, Cleghorn noticed the dogs about the yards. He procured the rifle and discharged it at the dogs, which were then about 75 yards to the northeast of where he was standing. The distance to the highway from the same point, and in the direction in which he shot, was between 70 and 80 rods. The land between where the dogs then were and the highway was higher than it was where they were, and so much so that it is spoken of as an "embankment." It was of a sandy character. At this time one Joseph Thompson, who was the husband of one of the defendants in error, and the father of the others, was passing along the north and south road, and was then at a point east, or possibly to the southeast, of where Cleghorn stood. Whether he was in a position that he might have been seen by Cleghorn does not appear. The ball which was discharged by Cleghorn at the dogs was deflected at quite an angle, and, passing through the intervening space, struck Mr. Thompson and killed him. This action was brought by these defendants in error against Cleghorn, Richardson, and Haston to recover damages occasioned by the death of Thompson. The first trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs. A new trial was awarded, and in the second and third trials the jury failed to agree. The fourth trial resulted in a judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court.

For a case in which a person, while on a highway, was killed by a missile thrown by the explosion of a blast, and in which the person firing the blast was held liable as a trespasser without regard to the question of negligence, see Sullivan v. Dunham (N. Y.) 47 L. R. A. 715.

Various errors are alleged, but there confronts us at the very outset the question as to whether, under the circumstances of this case, plaintiffs are entitled to recover at all. They are not unless it can be stated that Cleghorn was negligent in shooting as he did. No wantonness or malice animus is charged. Seeing the dogs running up the slope, Cleghorn procured the gun and discharged it at them, against the elevation or embankment of land. To be sure, the bullet was in some manner deflected, and in taking another course did the damage. One of the witnesses speaks of the ground as being frozen. To what extent, is not shown, but it is hardly credible that the frozen condition of the ground was responsible for the deflection of the bullet, as it appears that the bullet was marked with a small groove which ran lengthwise. This marking would probably not have so appeared had the deflection been occasioned by contact with frozen earth. 54 L. R. A.

From that cause it would have presented more of a bruised appearance. It is probable that the bullet struck some small or sharp stone, and was thus turned out of its course. Now, what constitutes actionable negligence? "Now, a reasonable man can be guided only by a reasonable estimate of probabilities. If men went about to guard themselves against every risk to themselves or others which might by ingenious conjecture be conceived as possible, human affairs could not be carried on at all. The reasonable man, then, to whose ideal behavior we are to look as the standard of duty, will neither neglect what he can forecast as probable, nor waste his anxiety on events that are barely possible. He will order his precaution by the measure of what appears likely in the known course of things." Pollock, Torts, 36. "Where a man, proceeding in a lawful business, exercises reasonable care, the law does not make him an insurer of others against those consequences of his actions which reasonable care and foresight could not have prevented. The law justly ascribes such consequences to inevitable misfortune or to the act of God, and leaves the harm resulting from them to be borne by him upon whom it falls. The contrary rule would obviously be against public policy, because it would impose so great a restraint upon freedom of action as materially to check human enterprise." Thomp. Neg. 1234, 1235. "Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do." Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, p. 361. "It is conceded by all the authorities that the standard by which to determine whether the person has been guilty of negligence is the conduct of the prudent, careful, diligent, or skillful man in the particular situation." Bigelow, Torts, 289. So, in the case of Allegheny v. Zimmerman, 95 Pa. 287, 40 Am. Rep. 649, which was a suit to recover for injuries caused by the falling of a liberty pole which had been erected in the street, it was held, following the general rule, that "one is answerable in damages for the consequences of his faults only so far as they are natural and proximate, and may therefore have been foreseen by ordinary forecast, and not for those arising from a conjunction of his own faults with circumstances of an extraordinary nature." "Negligence is the want of proper care, caution, and diligence,—such care, caution, and diligence as, under the circumstances, a man of ordinary and reasonable prudence would exercise." McCully v. Clarke, 40 Pa. 402, 80 Am. Dec. 584. "Negligence is the failure to exercise that degree of caution which a man of ordinary intelligence would exercise under the circumstances of a particular case." Gravette v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 3 McCrary, 352, 10 Fed. 711. See also Lewis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 54 Mich. 55, 52 Am. Rep. 790, 19 N. W. 744; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Stumps, 55 Ill. 387; Sjogren v. Hall, 53

Mich. 274, 18 N. W. 812; Mitchell v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 51 Mich. 236, 47 Am. Rep. 566, 16 N. W. 388; Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653; *Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Rawle's Revision; Pollock, Torts, 37. We might extend quotations and multiply authorities to an almost unlimited extent, but we deem the above sufficient. We may say, then, that negligence, to be actionable, must result in damage to someone, which result under all the circumstances, might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence, and be the probable result of the initial act. There are very few, if any, of the injurious things that occur in human life but what may be traced back along the line of causation, and located in an act of omission or commission of someone else. We cannot be freed from the results of living in communities. There are some of those injurious results which may be directly traced, and for which the law and common consent make the author responsible. There are others which come out of the complex relationships of life, and which the law and common consent denominate "accidents," and relieve the author, near or remote, from liability. We deem the injury of which the defendants in error in this case complain to be one of these. It is suggested, however, that the fact that Cleghorn discharged the gun in the general direction of the highway, along which people might be passing at any time, was in itself negligence. To be sure, if the gun had been held at sufficient elevation, and the bullet, which was of comparatively small size, had gone far enough in the direction in which it was shot, it would finally have come to or crossed the highway, in which case, however, no harm would have come to Mr. Thompson. But the possibility of the bullet ever reaching the highway at all depended upon the almost inconceivable—at least, very highly improbable—combination of circumstances which caused its deflection; for otherwise it would have buried itself safely in the sandy elevation of the field towards which it was discharged. What reasoning would have lead to the conclusion that the bullet discharged by Cleghorn against this elevated field of sand would probably have struck a hard substance at exactly the angle it did, and be deflected at an angle so exact that, traversing a distance of 55 or 60 rods, would find in its exact course the body of a man, and enter it in such a place and follow such a course as to be fatal? What foresight would have guessed at such a result? What prudence would have avoided it? Certainly none, except such as would have restrained entirely from discharging the gun. We may not say, however, that this extreme of caution is required by the law. Such a rule would paralyze human effort and action on all lines.

The defendants in error, however, claim that it is the peculiar province of the jury to determine whether Cleghorn was guilty of negligence, and that, it having found a verdict in their favor, the finding is conclusive on this court, and that we are not at liberty to weigh the evidence. It is well-settled law that it is the province of the jury, under proper instructions, to determine whether or not, upon any given state of facts, negligence ought to be inferred. It is equally well settled that it is the duty of the court, first, to say whether, upon the undisputed facts, or facts taken most favorable to the plaintiff, negligence can be inferred. The jury cannot arbitrarily and without evidence infer negligence. When the evidence fails to establish the defendant's duty and its nonperformance, there is no evidence which justifies the jury in finding negligence. See Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brannagan, 75 Ind. 490; Searles v. Manhattan R. Co. 101 N. Y. 661, 5 N. E. 66; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, § 373, and note 5. Before the court can submit the question to the jury, the evidence must affirmatively establish circumstances from which the inference fairly arises that the accident resulted from the want of some precaution which the defendant ought to have taken. See Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228 28 L. ed. 410, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369. "The judge has a certain duty to discharge, and the jurors have another and different duty. The judge has to say whether any facts have been established by evidence from which negligence may be reasonably inferred; the jurors have to say whether, from those facts, when submitted to them, negligence ought to be inferred. It is, in my opinion, of the greatest importance in the administration of justice that these separate functions should be maintained, and should be maintained distinct. It would be a serious inroad on the province of the jury if, in a case where there are facts from which negligence may reasonably be inferred, the judge were to withdraw the case from the jury upon the ground that, in his opinion, negligence ought not to be inferred; and it would, on the other hand, place in the hands of the jurors a power which might be exercised in the most arbitrary manner, if they were at liberty to hold that negligence might be inferred from any state of facts whatever." Metropolitan R. Co. v. Jackson, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 197. See also Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478, 27 L. ed. 1003, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 322; Gregory v. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. 112 Ind. 385, 14 N. E. 228; Conner v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 105 Ind. 62, 55 Am. Rep. 177, 4 N. E. 441; Woolery v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 107 Ind. 381, 5 Am. Rep. 115, 8 N. E. 226; Pollock, Torts, 365.

We are not called upon to weigh evidence. Neither are we proposing to disturb the rule that the finding of a jury upon a disputed question of fact must be held conclusive on this court, when the same has been fairly determined under proper instructions. This is not a question as to the weight or quantity of evidence, but, rather, as to the nature or quality of the evidence. It is not, Was there enough evidence? but, Was the evidence of the right kind? We are forced to the conclusion that all the evidence taken together does not make out a case of actionable negligence in favor of the defendants in error against Cleghorn, and, of course, if not against him, not against anyone. The elements of such negligence are not found in the case, and therefore the demurrer of the defendants below to the evidence of plaintiff below should have been sustained, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendants below.

The case will be reversed, with the order to the court below to render such judgment.

All the Justices concur.

ERROR to the District Court for Shawnee County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action to reach assets of the Topeka Capital Company for the settlement of a claim which plaintiff held against it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. W. Harrison and D. R. Hite, for plaintiff in error:

If trustees are holders of shares of stock in a company, their liabilities are the same as if they were the beneficial owners, though the fact of the trusteeship is noticed in the company's books.

Re Barker, 6 Wend. 50.

As trustee John R. Mulvane owes the duty of active management for the preservation and protection of the trust estate. And where that consists of stocks in a corporation there is the duty of voting at elections therein.

Re North Shore Staten Island Ferry Co. 63 Barb. 556.

Hence he was charged with a much higher duty than that of a mere passive trustee.

While holding and exercising the powers of that trustee relationship he could not lawfully speculate in any manner out of the property which belonged to the Topeka Capital Company.

It is the duty of the trustee not to accept any position, or enter into any relation, or do any act, inconsistent with the interests of his beneficiary.

Messrs. Overmyer, Mulvane, & Gault and Holmes & Perry for defendants in error.

DOSTER, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action in the nature of a creditors' bill brought under § 481 of the Civil Code by the plaintiff in error, T. W. Harrison, as a judgment creditor of the Topeka Capital Company, against the defendants in error, J. R. Mulvane and others. The court below made a general finding on the evidence in favor of the defendants, and error has been prosecuted to this court. The question for consideration is, Did a trust exist, on the facts disclosed on the trial, in J. R. Mulvane, in favor of the creditors of the Topeka Capital Company? As stated, the finding was general, and in favor of the defendants; hence we are bound to view the facts as claimed by them. If, therefore, there was evidence to support all of the material claims of the defendants, the judgment of this court must also be in their favor. Summarized, the facts were that J. K. Hudson was indebted to one C. C. Baker in the sum of $15,000, secured by first mortgage upon a newspaper property, and also indebted to the late Senator P. B. Plumb in the sum of $10,000, secured by a second mortgage, and to J. R. Mulvane in the sum of $5,000, secured by a third mortgage upon the same property. All this indebtedness was incurred prior to 1890. In that year the newspaper property was sold to the Topeka Capital Company, a corporation, in consideration of 500 shares of stock in the company issued to Hudson. Contemporaneously with this sale a written agreement was made between Hudson and the company by the terms of which 495 of the shares of stock were deposited with the Bank of Topeka in trust and as security for the payment of all indebtedness constituting liens upon the property; such stock to be sold by the trustee, upon the written request of the board of directors of the Capital Company, for the purpose of raising funds with which to discharge the liens for indebtedness. The writing provided that the sale should be made by the president of the trustee bank, or, in case of his absence or inability to act, then by the vice president. At this and all subsequent times hereafter mentioned J. R. Mulvane was the president of the Bank of Topeka. Soon after the transaction last mentioned, Mulvane sold the debt and chattel mortgage owned by him to the Bank of Topeka, but bought it back in 1895. The amount paid for it was not shown. Its face value, including overdue interest, was nearly $7,500. The precise date of the repurchase was not shown. It would appear to have been as early as July, 1895, because in that month Mulvane made an affidavit of renewal of the mortgage as a subsisting lien owned by him. However, there is some uncertainty in his testimony as to whether the transaction did not occur at a later time. October 23, 1895, the board of directors of the Topeka Capital Company, in pursuance of the aforementioned agreement with J. K. Hudson, requested Mulvane, the president of the Bank of Topeka, to sell the stock held by the bank as trustee, in order to raise a fund to discharge the indebtedness against the company's property; and at the same time they authorized the execution of a mortgage upon the property to the Bank of Topeka to secure $3,900 previously borrowed from it, and an additional sum of $1,100 for present purposes, making $5,000 in all. This mortgage was executed, and constituted the fourth lien upon the newspaper property. In pursuance of the request of the board of directors of the Capital Company, Mulvane endeavored to sell the stock. It quite satisfactorily appeared from the evidence that he made a diligent effort to dispose of it, but was unable to find a purchaser. At or about the time of the direction of the company to Mulvane to sell the stock, the latter, being the owner of the third lien upon the mortgaged property, bought the two prior liens. He bought the one owned by Baker for $15,000, paying the principal sum, without an accumulation of several thousand dollars of interest which then existed. He bought the one owned by the heirs of the Plumb estate for $8,000 which was $2,000 less than the principal sum, without counting a like accumulation of several thousand dollars interest. His own lien at this time amounted to about $7,500. He also bought the mortgage last mentioned,—the one given by the Topeka Capital Company to the Bank of Topeka,—for which he paid $5,000. This made $35,000 of actual investment in the various securities mentioned. In 1895, and previous to the matters heretofore stated, a suit in equity had been instituted in the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas by one J. E. Baker, to which all of the persons owning liens upon the newspaper property were made parties defendant, and required to disclose their interest in said property. August 5th of that year J. R. Mulvane filed a cross bill in said suit, claiming a chattel mortgage lien to secure the aforementioned indebtedness of about $7,500 from the aforesaid J. K. Hudson. This would seem to be additional and confirmatory evidence of the claim made by him in this suit that the particular indebtedness mentioned was owned by him previous to the time of his purchase of the prior liens of C. C. Baker and the Plumb heirs. In the equity suit in the United States circuit court a decree was rendered in March, 1897, adjudging J. R. Mulvane to have liens upon the property in his own original interest, and as the successor by assignment of the indebtedness and liens of C. C. Baker and the Plumb heirs and the Bank of Topeka, to the amount of $52,274, and also decreeing a sale of such property to satisfy the indebtedness. This sale was made and confirmed in April, 1897. The sale was made to one D. W. Mulvane, and, as reported by the master, was for the sum of $52,000. As a matter of fact it was only for the sum of $38,500. As before stated, the actual investment of J. R. Mulvane in the mortgages covering the property at the time of and including his purchase of the prior liens of Baker and Plumb and the subsequent lien of the Bank of Topeka, and inclusive of his own lien was $35,500. The Baker mortgage of $15,000 bore interest at 8 per cent, the Plumb mortgage of $10,000, purchased for $8,000, bore interest at 7 per cent; the Mulvane mortgage of $5,000 bore interest at 12 per cent; and the Bank of Topeka mortgage of $5,000 bore interest at 8 per cent. There had been, therefore, fully $3,000 of interest accumulated upon J. R. Mulvane's investment of $35,500 in October, 1895, when the most of it was made, and the date of the sale made by the master to D. W. Mulvane in April, 1897.

Upon the above state of facts, the plaintiff in error contends that J. R. Mulvane was a trustee for the Topeka Capital Company and its creditors, and is accountable to them for the difference between the amount actually invested by him in the various liens upon the company's property, and the amount reported by the master to have been realized at the foreclosure sale of such property. The reason for this claim is the familiar rule that a trustee is prohibited from purchasing the property which is the subject of his trust, and which rule, at the election of the cestui que trust, avoids the sale, or gives a right of action for resulting profits against the unfaithful trustee. It is said by the plaintiff in error that inasmuch as the Bank of Topeka was the trustee for the sale of the Topeka Capital Company's stock, and inasmuch as a corporation can only act by its officers, and inasmuch, also, as the president of the bank was specially designated in the trust agreement as the one to make the sale, Mulvane, as such president, was in reality the trustee. If this were a determining question in the case, we might agree with the plaintiff in error; but the question does not involve the relation between the bank and its officers, nor the duties devolving upon them to discharge trusts resting upon the bank, but the question is, Did the trust assumed by the bank, to sell the shares of stock to raise funds to pay the newspaper company's indebtedness, preclude Mulvane, or even the bank, as the trustee, from buying prior liens upon the company's property to protect a subsequent lien held by him or it? It must be observed that the trust was not in relation to the newspaper company's mortgaged property, but it was in relation to Hudson's shares of stock in the company, which had been pledged for the payment of the company's indebtedness. The trust was not in relation to the company's property, but it was in relation to Hudson's stock. It is true that the trust was to sell stock to pay indebtedness upon property, but that does not make the property or the indebtedness upon it the subject of the trust. The subject of the trust was not corporation property, but was shares of corporation stock. Had the trustee charged with the sale of the stock bought it for himself, the doctrine invoked by the plaintiff in error might have application; but the trustee did not buy the stock, the subject of the trust. He only bought liens upon the property to discharge which the proceeds of the sale of the stock were to have been applied if such sale could have been made. We do not believe that equity, rigid as it is in its scrutiny of the conduct of trustees, condemns such a transaction, in view of the fact that the trustee was himself the owner in good faith of a subsequent lien, to protect which it became advisable to make the purchase of prior liens. The Mulvane lien of $5,000, the third in order of priority, antedated the making of the trust agreement. The debt, to secure which that lien was given, was contracted before Mulvane or the Bank of Topeka became a trustee, and it was in existence during all the time the trust agreement existed. A question has been raised by the plaintiff in error as to whether that indebtedness was in reality owned by Mulvane, or the bank of which he was president. It was contracted to Mulvane, but, as before stated, was afterwards sold to the bank, and by the bank sold back to Mulvane, as he claimed. Now, for the purposes of the case, it is immaterial whether Mulvane or the bank owned it. One or the other of them did. If in reality the bank owned it, no right has been lost to the plaintiff in error through an assertion of ownership by Mulvane, its president. The ownership of the mortgage by the bank, with the consequent right to protect it by the purchase of outstanding liens, would have been as potent against the plaintiff in error as the same ownership with the same right in Mulvane. It might have been different if the Mulvane mortgage had been acquired by assignment from some person other than the Topeka Capital Company subsequent to the making of the trust agreement, and with knowledge of the existence of that agreement. It might then have been claimed that the trustee was scheming to speculate in the trust property, assuming that such property was a newspaper property, and not shares of stock; but the trustee, if he were to be called such, purchased no interest in the trust property if it were to be called such, with a view to speculation in that property. What the trustee, if he were such, bought, was an outstanding prior lien upon the trust property, if it were such, to protect a subsequent lien acquired by him before he became trustee, and continuously held by him since that time. This, we feel sure, he was lawfully authorized to do. We might agree with the plaintiff in error that Mulvane, if a trustee as to the newspaper property or the liens upon it, was accountable for the difference made by him between his actual investment in the trust property and what he realized out of it at the master's sale. It is this difference which the plaintiff in error asks. He must therefore be held to have ratified Mulvane's acquisition of the legal title to the so-called trust property. He does not ask that the transaction be set aside as void, but he permits it to stand, and asks that Mulvane be compelled to pay him such portion of the profits realized out of the transaction as will discharge his judgment. If, therefore, Mulvane made no profits, the plaintiff in error cannot lawfully have the relief asked. As before shown, Mulvane made no profits, except the contract rate of interest on his actual investment. If we could concur with the view of the plaintiff in error as to Mulvane's liability, we could not hold him to the payment of a sum of money as profits upon an unlawful transaction merely because the master reported a sale for a larger sum than was actually realized. It would only be for actual profits that Mulvane could be held, if for anything. That, as before shown, was nothing but simple interest. The difference between his actual investment of $35,500 and $38,500, the sum actually realized by him at the sale, did nothing more than cover the interest which accrued between the two periods mentioned on the actual investment made. This, of course, is a form of profit, but it is not of that exaggerated amount or fraudulent character as to be taken seriously into account even in a transaction which the law otherwise condemns.

Other claims of error have been made, but they are either subsidiary to the principal one above discussed, and therefore need not be mentioned, or they are not well taken. In the presentation of the case many authorities were cited on both sides, none of which, however, has a direct bearing upon the precise question. All of them were simply declarative of abstract and fundamental rules, the soundness of which cannot be disputed. Their applicability to the case in hand is not, however, perceived. The controversy is a peculiar one. That controversy relates to the right of a person charged with the duty of selling corporation stock, in order to raise a fund to pay liens belonging to himself and others, to protect his own lien by buying those prior to it, when his own lien had been acquired previous to the time he took upon himself the obligation to sell the stock. Upon this precise question counsel have not furnished us with any direct authorities, and the multiplicity of our labors has prevented research for ourselves.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Doster, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the Kansas National Bank against C. M. Bay upon a promissory note. Judgment went for the defendant. The plaintiff has prosecuted error to this court. The note sued upon read as follows:

$5,577.50. Wichita, Kansas, Oct. 8, '98.

One hundred and twenty days after date I promise to pay to the order of W. W. Graves and Company five thousand five hundred and seventy-seven and $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars, for value received, negotiable and payable, without defalcation or discount, at the Kansas National Bank of Wichita, Kansas, with interest at the rate of 10% per annum from Nov. 8, 1898. Interest payable annually. No. ——. Due Feb. 8, 1898.

H. R. Sloan,
by C. M. Bay, Atty. in Fact.

The petition averred that the defendant, Bay, under the name and style of H. R. Sloan, executed and delivered the note, and that the amount of it was due from the defendant, Bay, doing business as H. R. Sloan; wherefore judgment was demanded against said Bay. The facts were that Bay was doing his own business under the name of Sloan, and that as a cover for his transactions he had procured a power of attorney from Sloan. However, that instrument did not confer upon him the power to execute promissory notes. He bought cattle from W. W. Graves & Co., and to evidence the purchase price executed to them two promissory notes in form similar to the one in suit. To secure these notes he executed in Sloan's name a first and a second chattel mortgage on the cattle. These notes and mortgages were negotiated to the Kansas National Bank. At the time they were taken by the bank, Bay explained to its president that he was doing business in the name of Sloan under a power of attorney.

The bank accepted the notes and mortgages, but required Bay to furnish it with a copy of the power of attorney. The cattle seemingly were taken under the first mortgage to pay one of the notes. This left the other one in the hands of the bank. It was held there as collateral security to an indebtedness due the bank from Graves & Co. The bank desired its renewal, and sent Graves, as its agent, to procure the renewal. As a renewal, Graves secured the note in suit, and indorsed it to the bank. He tried to induce Bay to assume personal responsibility upon the note by signing his own name to it. Bay refused to do this. There is no question but that the transaction for which the notes were given was Bay's individual business; but he fully explained to the bank president and to Graves & Co. that he was not doing business in his own name; that he could not do so because of indebtedness held against him. There is no claim of deception or fraud practised by Bay. His admission that he was conducting his own business in the name of another, and his reasons for so doing, were frank and open. While he seemed to be of the opinion that Sloan's power of attorney to him authorized the execution of promissory notes, yet it was not claimed that he fraudulently misstated his authority under that instrument, and, even if he had done so, the bank came into the possession of a copy of the power of attorney before the note in suit was executed, and therefore knew what it contained or did not contain. The question, therefore, is whether Bay is liable upon the note executed by him in the name of Sloan. The plaintiff in error contends that he is, because, as it says, the name of Sloan was a tradename adopted by Bay for the transaction of his own business, and, inasmuch as the giving of the note was his own business, he is liable on it as though executed in his own name. There are authorities to the effect that one who, for his own purposes, adopts the name of another, will be held liable in a transaction of his own conducted thereunder. We have no occasion to question the soundness of these authorities. We think, however, they are limited to cases where it appeared that, under the name of another as a tradename, the party contracted to bind himself and not the other; and in some of them the party using the name of another was held liable, not on the contract, but upon the transaction out of which the contract grew. It may be that Bay is liable in an action charging him upon the original transaction, but he is not liable upon the promissory note. He is not liable because he never made that note his contract. He never agreed to be bound upon it, but, on the contrary, refused to sign it as his contract or bind himself by it as an instrument of writing. No cases precisely in point have been cited to us, nor in considerable research ourselves among the authorities have we been able to find one entirely similar in its facts. We think, however, that the case is covered by the general principles of the law, and that these are well stated and elucidated in Bartlett v. Tucker, 104 Mass.

336, 6 Am. Rep. 240, the opening paragraph of the opinion in which case reads: "It is well settled that any person taking a negotiable promissory note contracts with those only whose names are signed to it as parties, and cannot, therefore, maintain an action upon the note against any other person. . . . That rule, of course, does not preclude charging a party who, instead of the name by which he is usually known, signs, with intent to bind himself thereby, his initials, or a mark, or any name under which he is proved to have held himself out to the world and carried on business.

Cunningham, and try to have them sign a petition for said pardon. In witness whereof, the parties have hereunto set their hands this 4th day of June, 1892.

J. C. Cunningham.

E. Sherrill.

Maud L. Sherrill

The note in controversy was delivered to Maud L. Sherrill, who transferred it to William Deering & Co. before maturity; but it is contended that the contract in pursuance of which the note was given contravenes public policy, and that it and the accompanying notes are therefore void; that Deering & Co. had notice of the illegality in the consideration of the note before purchasing the same, and therefore took it subject to that defense. Two principal questions were presented for determination: First, was there illegality in the consideration of the notes? and, second, was Deering & Co., who acquired the note before maturity, an innocent purchaser? and both questions were decided in favor of the defendants in error.

George C. Cunningham, who had been convicted of a crime, and was then in the penitentiary, was a son of J. C. Cunningham; and it appears that the Sherrills—especially Maud L. Sherrill—had been active in the prosecution and in securing the conviction. An effort had been made to obtain a pardon for George Cunningham, and it appears that the Sherrills had remonstrated and protested against the granting of the same. In consideration of the notes given, the Sherrills agreed to withdraw all remonstrance and letters protesting against the pardon. Besides, they were to unite with the Cunninghams in an endeavor to obtain the pardon, and were required to visit the judge and the jurors before whom the conviction was had, and endeavor to get them to sign a petition to the governor for a pardon. The court below correctly advised the jury that the agreement was contrary to public policy, and that, as between the original parties or those who had notice of the illegality, the note was without consideration. There is necessarily nothing immoral or wrong in an application for a pardon. A person may have been wrongfully convicted. Subsequent developments may show that another than he committed the offense, or that there were mitigating circumstances, not known when sentence was pronounced, which require a mitigation of the penalty, or it may be that the conduct of the prisoner or his condition warrants the interposition of the pardoning power and the lightening of the punishment imposed. A person may therefore be legally employed to prepare a petition, collect evidence showing the right to a pardon, and submit the same, together with proper arguments, either oral or in writing, to the governor or other authority granting pardons. So it has been frequently held that contracts for the performance of legitimate professional services, such as have been mentioned, and which are openly presented, and appeal directly to the judgment and reason of the authorities to whom they are presented, are valid. But there is a marked distinction between services like these and those contracted for in the present case. The consideration of the notes in this instance was personal influence and lobby services, not by anyone skilled in such work, but because they had been instrumental in securing the conviction, and of their opposition to the granting of the pardon which had been applied for. The purchase of personal influence to obtain a pardon or to control the operations of any department of the government is immoral and pernicious in tendency, and cannot receive the sanction of courts. Aside from the fact that the Sherrills agreed to use their personal influence, and had hired out their services to influence the action of the governor, there was a purchase of the withdrawal of their opposition, — a sinister act, for which no excuse can be given, and which is clearly inconsistent with public policy and sound morality. Testimony tending to show that most of the considerations named in the agreement were free from taint, or that no bad motives were entertained, is not admissible, and no error was committed by the court in excluding the same. The rule in such cases was stated in McBratney v. Chandler, 22 Kan. 692, 31 Am. Rep. 213, where it was said that "the contract of an attorney for services as such, whether the services are to be rendered before a court, a department of the government, or a legislative body, is valid, and upon performance of the services a recovery can be had. The contract of a lobbyist, in the sense in which that term is now used, for his services as such, is against public policy and void. Where there is a single contract, and the services contracted for and rendered are partially those of an attorney and partially those of a lobbyist, and blended together as part and parcel of a single employment, the entire contract is vitiated. "That which is bad destroys that which is good, and they perish together." The claim that no improper influence or means were contemplated by the parties does not weigh much where, as in this case, the things expressly provided for in the agreement are so clearly under the ban of the law. In Providence Tool Co. v. Norris, 2 Wall. 54, 17 L. ed. 870, it was held that the invalidity of agreements like this one did not depend upon the question whether improper influences were intended or used, but, rather, upon the corrupting tendency of such agreements; and Justice Field remarked: "It is sufficient to observe generally that all agreements for pecuniary considerations to control the business operations of the government, or the regular administration of justice, or the appointments to public offices, or the ordinary course of legislation, are void, as against public policy, without reference to the question whether improper means are contemplated or used in their execution. The law looks to the general tendency of such agreements, and it closes the door to temptation by refusing them recognition in any of the courts of the country." In Wilkey v. Collier, 7 Md. 273, 61 Am. Dec. 346, an agreement to procure favorable action of the governor, for a pecuniary consideration, was held to be void as against public policy, and the court said that "the reasons are obvious. They are designed to protect the exercise of this power from abuse through the intervention of designing persons, and, although in the particular instance no improper influences may have been resorted to, the public interest in such questions requires that the principle should be enforced in all cases." In Chipfinger v. Hepbaugh, 5 Watts & S. 315, 40 Am. Dec. 519, it was ruled that "it matters not that nothing improper was done, or was expected to be done, by the plaintiff. It is enough that such is the tendency of the contract; that it is contrary to sound morality and public policy, leading, necessarily, in the hands of designing and corrupt men, to improper tampering with members, and the use of an extraneous, secret influence over an important branch of the government. It may not corrupt all, but if it corrupts or tends to corrupt some, or if it deceives or tends to deceive or mislead some, that is sufficient to stamp its character with the seal of reprobation before a judicial tribunal." See also Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. ed. 539; Mills v. Mills, 40 N. Y. 543, 100 Am. Dec. 535; Rose v. Truax, 21 Barb. 361; Mil- bank v. Jones, 127 N. Y. 370, 28 N. E. 31; Powers v. Skinner, 34 Vt. 274, 80 Am. Dec. 877; Trist v. Child, 88 U. S. 441, sub nom. Burke v. Child, 22 L. ed. 623; Buck v. First Nat. Bank, 27 Mich. 293, 15 Am. Rep. 189; Thompson v. Wharton, 7 Bush, 563, 3 Am. Rep. 306; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 900. In agreements providing for the use of personal influence to control official action, parties have sometimes stipulated that no improper means were intended, and that only reasonable and legitimate methods were to be used, but even these stipulations were not sufficient to save the agreements from the ban of the law or the condemnation of the courts. Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 16 How. 314, 14 L. ed. 953; Elkhart County Lodge v. Orary, 98 Ind. 238, 49 Am. Rep. 748; Sweeney v. McLeod, 15 Or. 330, 15 Pac. 275; Chippewa Valley & S. R. Co. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co., 75 Wis. 224, 6 L. R. A. 601, 44 N. W. 17. Within the reasoning of the authorities cited, the agreement in question clearly involves the fatal elements, and a judicial interpretation of its terms warranted the court in telling the jury, as a matter of law, that it was illegal and void. The fact that it is void on its face renders unimportant some of the questions raised on the admission of testimony and on the instructions of the court.

The only question remaining is whether the transferee of the note had knowledge of its infirmity, or such notice as to fairly put him upon inquiry. On this question there is considerable contrariety in the evidence, but of the sufficiency of the testimony to put him upon notice there can be no doubt. It tends to show that the agent of the plaintiff in the purchase of the note was expressly warned, several days before the purchase was made, that the note was not good, and that the makers did not intend to pay it. It is contended that error was committed in the admission of testimony with reference to the good faith of the transfer. The agent of the plaintiff who purchased the note was called as a witness by the defendant, and, among other things, testified that he had no notice of the defense of illegality or of the infirmity in the note. By other witnesses was shown the time and manner in which the plaintiff acquired knowledge or notice of the defense, and the testimony was a contradiction of the statement made by the agent of the plaintiff. It is contended that, by producing the agent of the plaintiff as their witness, they vouched for his truthfulness and were bound by his testimony, and that it was error to allow him to be impeached. As a general rule, it is not permitted to produce a witness, and then attack his veracity if he fails to testify as was desired. Where a party has been entrapped or deceived by a hostile witness, he may, in the discretion of the court, be permitted to show that he was surprised or deceived, and counteract the injurious effect of the testimony by showing that the witness had previously made contrary declarations, and what such declarations were. Johnson v. Leggett, 28 Kan. 591; Greenl. Ev. § 442. 54 L. R. A.

There was no attempt, however, in this case to impeach the witness; and the fact that he was called and examined by the defendant did not preclude the defendant from showing the actual facts in the case, although they may have incidentally contradicted the statements of the witness. As was said in Wallach v. Wylie, 28 Kan. 138: "A party never was concluded by the statements of any one of his witnesses. He always had the right to introduce other competent testimony to prove his case, although such testimony might contradict the statements of a previous witness, and might incidentally tend to impeach the testimony of such previous witness." State v. Keefe, 54 Kan. 197, 38 Pac. 302; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 812.

We find no reversible error in the case, and therefore the judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

Doster, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a garnishment proceeding, brought by the National Wall-Paper Company, the creditor, against William Kincaid, the garnishee. C. A. Garrett and H. O. Kincaid, as a partnership, owed the National Wall-Paper Company. Each of them, as individuals, was indebted to William Kincaid. These debts were each for the sum of $420, and to secure them each partner executed a mortgage of his undivided half interest in the partnership property, and each partner indorsed on the other's mortgage his consent thereto. The partnership was insolvent at this time. The mortgages were given in good faith to secure bona fide debts. The question, therefore, is whether members of a partnership may prefer their individual to their partnership creditors by the execution of liens upon their own interests in the partnership property, each party consenting to the act of the other. This question has been several times discussed before the court, and adverted to in some of the opinions. Woodmansie v. Holcomb, 34 Kan. 35, 7 Pac. 603; Berkley v. Tootle, 46 Kan. 335, 26 Pac. 730; Mannen v. Bailey, 51 Kan. 446, 32 Pac. 1085; Tootle v. Rice, 53 Kan. 581, 36 Pac. 990. In the last two cases the question was stated, and attention called to opposing authorities, but no decision was made. In Woodmansie v. Holcomb it was ruled in the syllabus that, "while the partnership remains in existence and in a solvent condition, it may, upon a bona fide consideration, all the partners assenting, transfer and appropriate the firm 54 L. R. A.

property in payment of the individual debt of one of its members." In the opinion it was remarked: "The decisions of the courts have gone further than this, and, although not unanimous, the weight of authority seems to be that mere insolvency, where no actual fraud intervenes, will not deprive the partners of their legal control over the property and of the right to dispose of the same as they may choose; and, where the separate creditor purchases from the firm in good faith, and the individual indebtedness is a fair price for the property purchased, such purchase cannot of itself be held fraudulent as against the general creditors of the firm." In Berkley v. Tootle it does not clearly appear that the partnership was insolvent, but the case seems to have proceeded upon the assumption that it was, and the foregoing extract from the opinion in Woodmansie v. Holcomb was quoted as the law applicable to the facts under consideration. It is questionable, indeed, whether the remarks made in the case of Woodmansie v. Holcomb were necessary to the decision of that case; but subsequent cases, and especially that of Berkley v. Tootle, appear to have regarded the rule announced with favor. We are of the opinion, now that the question is directly presented, that the members of an insolvent partnership, all the partners consenting, may, if in good faith, appropriate their own interest in the partnership property to the payment of their individual debts in preference to those of the partnership. It has been loosely said that partnership creditors have a lien on the partnership property; but this is not true, and we think that no court has so decided in the sense those words imply. The partners themselves have an equity in the partnership property to compel its appropriation to the payment of partnership debts as against the debts of the individual members of the firm, and to this equity the partnership creditors succeed in cases and under circumstances which will enable them to enforce it; and that ordinarily, if not always, is when the partnership is in the control of the court, and its assets in the course of administration by the court, either through the bankruptcy of the firm or the creation of a trust in some mode. Strong and well-considered decisions in which this doctrine is asserted, with citations to numerous authorities, are Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119, 25 L. ed. 370; Purple v. Farrington, 119 Ind. 164, 4 L. R. A. 535, 21 N. E. 543. These cases are entirely in point in the present controversy. The facts in each are almost identical with those in the present case. In the one last cited it was tersely remarked that "members of a partnership largely indebted and insolvent may mortgage the firm property to secure an individual indebtedness if in so doing they act in good faith." This we believe to be the law.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, with directions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

v.

G. N. MURPHY.

(.....Ky.....)

A statute authorizing the state board of health to revoke a physician's license for grossly unprofessional conduct likely to deceive or defraud the public, without fixing any standard by which such fact shall be determined, is void.

(June 22, 1901.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County enjoining them from attempting to revoke plaintiff's license to practise medicine. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William S. Pryor, Clarence U. McElroy, Aaron Kohn, and Edward W. Hines, for appellants:

The state may, in the exercise of the police power, confer on a board of physicians the power to grant and refuse licenses to practise medicine.

The power to revoke certificates to practise medicine is commensurate with the power to refuse, and, like the power to grant and refuse, may be conferred by the legislature on a board of physicians.

Ky. Stat. § 98; Baker v. Com. 10 Bush, 597; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Rich v. Jochim, 99 Mich. 358, 23 L. R. A. 699, 58 N. W. 611; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Even though the right conferred by a certificate to practise medicine is regarded as property, it may be destroyed when the public good requires.

Ky. Stat. § 2615, empowering the state board of health to revoke a certificate to practise medicine "for grossly unprofessional conduct of a character likely to deceive or defraud the public," is not void for uncertainty.

The power of the board to correct a mistake in issuing a certificate, or to determine that the holder no longer possesses the requisite character or capacity, is not the judicial power to which the Constitution refers.

It has never been held that to grant or to refuse to grant, such a license as this is the exercise of judicial power.

Paynter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question involved is the validity of § 2615, Ky. Stat. under which the appellants, the state board of health, undertook, for alleged unprofessional conduct, to revoke the certificate of the appellee, which had been granted him to practise medicine in this state. The section reads as follows: "The state board of health may refuse to issue the certificate provided for in § 2613 of this article to any individual guilty of grossly unprofessional conduct of a character likely to deceive or defraud the public, and it may, after due notice and hearing, revoke such certificates for like cause. In all cases of refusal or revocation the applicant may appeal to the governor, who may affirm or overrule the decision of the board, and this decision shall be final." From the averments of the petition it appears that the appellee received the degree of M. D. from the Kentucky School of Medicine, a reputable medical college chartered under the laws of this state; that he took a post-graduate course in New York City, and also in Chicago; that he had spent a large sum of money in acquiring his medical education; that after his diploma had been registered in the office of the clerk of the Warren county court, as required by law, he was, on October 3, 1893, granted a certificate by the state board of health, which authorized him to practise medicine in this state. While it is not our purpose to discuss the charges upon which the state board of health proposed to try the appellee, it may be well to give an epitome of them. It is charged—First, that he advertised that he could cure cancer, tapeworm, and piles without the use of the knife; second, by advertising he reflected upon the medical profession; third, practising osteopathy; fourth, he guarantees a cure or no pay; fifth, that by reason of the alleged acts he has been guilty of unprofessional conduct of a character likely to deceive or defraud the public. Section 2613, Ky. Stat., authorizes the state board of health, upon application, to issue a certificate to any reputable physician, who is practising or who desires to begin the practice of medicine in this state, who possesses any of the following qualifications: "1. A diploma from a reputable medical college legally chartered under the laws of this state. 2. A diploma from a reputable and legally chartered medical college of some other state or country, indorsed as such by the state board of health. 3. Satisfactory evidence from the person claiming the same that such person was reputationally and honorably engaged in the practice of medicine in this state prior to February 23, 1864. Satisfactory evidence from any person who was reputationally and honorably engaged in the practice of medicine in this state prior to February 23, 1864, who has passed a satisfactory practical examination before said board. Applicants may present their credentials by mail or proxy, and the board shall issue its certificate to such applicants as are entitled thereto as though the applicant was present. All certificates shall be signed by the president and secretary, and attested by seal of the board, and not more than $2 shall be charged for any certificate."

The appellee possessed the requisite qualifications, which entitled him to a license to practise his profession, and the state board of health accordingly gave it to him. It is sought now to deprive him of that license because of the alleged unprofessional conduct. The license which he received is certainly a "right" or "estate." The purpose of our statute, in conferring upon the state board of health the right to grant to persons possessing certain qualifications the right to practise medicine, was with the view of preventing them from entering the profession except they were fitted for it. The legislature recognized that the public was entitled to be protected from persons who desired to engage in the practice of medicine who did not possess the requisite knowledge or qualifications to engage in it. The power to regulate it must be fixed somewhere, and the legislature thought it wise to lodge that power with the state board of health. It was never intended by the legislature that the power should be arbitrarily or capriciously exercised.

The appellee having fitted himself for this learned profession, and having been licensed to practise the same, the question arises, Has the state board of health the right to charge him with "unprofessional conduct likely to deceive or defraud the public," and erect a standard by which that conduct is to be measured, and if in its judgment he does not meet its requirements summarily deprive him of a right or estate or both? The effect of such action of the board would cause the appellee to lose a large sum of money which he has spent for his professional education, and bar him from the acquisition of a livelihood thereby, and at the same time mar his character in such a way that it would take years, if he could do so at all, to remove it.

The statute does not prescribe the manner by which a physician may regulate his conduct. It does not advise him in advance what act or acts may be in violation of its provisions. He is not told what is lawful or unlawful. He might do an act which he regarded as entirely proper, which neither violated moral law nor involved turpitude, still such acts might, in the opinion of the state board of health, amount to unprofessional conduct, and which in its opinion did or was calculated to deceive or defraud the public. The physician who did the act of which complaint was made before the state board of health could not know at the time the act was done what standard would be thereafter erected by the board by which its effect was to be determined. As the statute does not advise him beforehand as to what is unprofessional conduct, he could not knowingly or intentionally be guilty of it. The legislature, in effect, has attempted to commit to the state board of health the right, after the physician has done some act, to determine what its effect is to be, and, if in its judgment he should be deprived of the right to practise his profession, it can inflict the punishment upon him by revoking his license. If the legislature desires to declare for what acts or conduct a physician's license to practise medicine shall be revoked, it is competent to do so, and to vest in some tribunal the authority to investigate and try the charge which may be made under such a statute.

In the state of Arkansas a statute was enacted which declared it to be unlawful for one "to commit any act injurious to the public health, or public morals, or to the perversion or obstruction of public justice, or the due administration of the laws." In passing upon this statute in Ex parte Jackson, 45 Ark. 164, the court said: "The law is simply null. The Constitution, which forbids ex post facto laws, could not tolerate a law which would make an act a crime or not, according to the moral sentiment which might happen to prevail with the judge and jury after the act had been committed." This court, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 132, 33 L. R. A. 209, 35 S. W. 129, referred to the case of Ex parte Jackson with approval. It was held in Ex parte McNulty, 77 Cal. 164, 19 Pac. 237, that no one should be punished "for the violation of any vague, undefined notion of unprofessional conduct, which might, after the fact, be entertained by certain individuals constituting a board of examiners." What the present state board of health might consider unprofessional conduct might be adjudged by another board not to be. An act committed during the administration of the present board might be regarded by it as not being unprofessional conduct, yet the board which succeeds it might adjudge it to be, as the statute prescribes no rule which is to govern the conduct of the medical profession or the state board of health in adjudging its effect. For the reasons given, we do not think the act is valid in so far as it attempts to confer upon the state board of health the right to revoke a license which has been granted by it to a physician to practise his profession. This conclusion, however, applies alone to so much of the statute as authorizes the board to revoke a physician's license to practise medicine for unprofessional conduct. That part of the statute which authorizes the board to pass upon the qualifications of persons to practise medicine and to license them is valid. If the board should exercise that power, either arbitrarily or capriciously, the party injured may obtain relief in the courts.

The judgment is affirmed.

Du Relle, J., does not concur in the reasoning of the court. O'Rear, J., was not a member of the court when this case was decided.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the circuit court for Jefferson County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the explosion of a gas generator sold to plaintiff by defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. J. Beard and Willis & Willis, with Messrs. Simrall & Doolan, for appellant:

Representations made by the appellees to the appellant in this case amount to a warranty.

Messrs. W. S. Fryer and Fryer, O'Neal, & Fryer for appellees Moody & Offutt.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant brought this action to recover for damages for personal injuries caused by an explosion of a gas generator for the manufacture of acetylene gas, sold by appellees Hall & Son, and manufactured by appellees Moody & Offutt. Appellant avers in his petition that appellees "guaranteed and represented to him at the time of said sale, and as a part of said contract, that the said machine, and the use thereof in generating acetylene gas, was and would be entirely safe, and that no danger or injury would or could result therefrom; and that said machine was and would be perfectly automatic in its action, and could only make gas equal to the consumption; and that same was so constructed as to be absolutely safe in its use, and that same could not generate gas beyond the capacity of the machine; and that same could always be depended upon to do the work claimed for it; and that same was so simple in construction that there was absolutely nothing about it to get out of order; and that the same was simple and safe, and that same could not generate gas in sufficient quantity to blow up or explode same; and this plaintiff relied upon said representations and statements as true. . . . But he says that said representations were false and untrue." and it is then set out that each representation was untrue, and that appellant was properly attending to the machine, and without fault on the part of appellant the generator did explode and blow up, by which he was seriously and permanently injured. Appellees answered, denying that representations alleged that they claimed or represented the machine as absolutely perfect, or that no danger or injury could possibly happen in its use; and denied any representation that the machine could not generate gas in sufficient quantity to blow up or explode, though it is true, if kept in good order, and used with care, it cannot generate gas sufficient to cause an explosion. However it was admitted that they represented that the machine was safe, and they aver that with proper and careful use it was safe. Appellees Moody and Offutt also denied that appellees Hall & Son were their agents in making the sale and representations, such as were made, and they pleaded that the injury was caused by the negligence of appellant himself. These answers were filed without a demurrer to the petition. On trial the appellant introduced evidence tending to prove every allegation of his petition. He testified to representations and warranties by Hall & Son to him, before and at the time of the contract of sale, that the machine was perfectly safe, and would not and could not explode except by contract with fire; that appellant had no knowledge or information as to the machine, or the manufacture of acetylene gas, except as given him by Hall & Son, and also from a circular issued by Moody & Offutt, who were the manufacturers of the machine; that appellant relied on these statements and representations as true, and was thereby induced to buy, and he did buy, the machine, which appellees Hall & Son placed in his house, and put in operation; that in the use of the machine as directed, and while exercising due care and caution, and without fault on appellant's part, the machine exploded, causing appellant's injury. The extent of the injury was shown, which was considerable. The circular furnished by the manufacturers, Moody & Offutt, was introduced. At the conclusion of appellant's evidence the court directed a verdict for appellees, and, judgment being accordingly rendered this appeal is prosecuted.

In the judgment rendered the court required appellees to pay the costs from the time of filing their answers, including the trial; the court being of opinion that the petition was insufficient. Counsel for appellees rely on the case of Jones v. Ross, 98 Ala. 448, 13 So. 319, and cases cited, to sustain the judgment of the court below. In that case Ross sued Jones to recover damages for breach of warranty in the sale of a horse. The petition alleged that "defendant sold to plaintiff a horse, which defendant falsely represented to be gentle, and to work kind and gentle anywhere." The horse, being hitched to a buggy, ran away, whereby plaintiff was injured, for which recovery was sought. The petition further avers "that the defendant knew said horse was vicious and unsafe, and intentionally represented him to plaintiff to be safe and gentle." The supreme court of Alabama held the petition to be sufficient to enable Ross to recover for his injuries, but on the proof the court held that the case was not made out, and a peremptory instruction should have been given. The court on that point said: "There is not one particle of evidence in the record tending to show that defendant knew, or had reason to believe, the horse to be vicious and unsafe, or that the affirmation was of that reckless character to be the equivalent of bad faith; and without proof of some fact or circumstance tending to sustain these averments plaintiff was not entitled to recover for personal injuries in this action." In that opinion the court refers to the case of Herring v. Skaggs, 82 Ala. 180, 34 Am. Rep. 4, as decisive of the question as to what averments were necessary to recovery. The averments in the petition of the case at bar are that appellees expressly warranted that the machine would not and could not explode. It is not alleged that appellees knew this to be false, but it is alleged that it was false, for the machine did explode and blow up. Counsel for appellees insist that there is not an averment of scienter in the petition, and it is therefore insufficient. In Chitty, Pl. 137, the author says that case or assumpsit may be supported for a false warranty on the sale of the goods, and that "in an action upon the case in tort for a breach of a warranty of goods the scienter need not be laid in the declaration, nor, if charged, would it be proved." In the case of Shippen v. Bowen, 122 U. S. 576, 30 L. ed. 1172, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1283, the supreme court held that this rule of pleading, as stated by Chitty, applied where the action was for breach of an express warranty, and the scienter need not be alleged; for, if the warranty was expressly made, it made no difference whether the warrantor knew it was false, or did not know whether it was true or false. This case, and the authorities cited, are decisive of the question that it is not necessary to allege a knowledge of the falsity of the representation when made, where there is an express warranty of any particular thing, or of a machine for a particular purpose, or against particular damages.

It is argued that in no state of case can a recovery be had for the injuries to appellant, because they are too remote. A leading case upon the criterion of recovery for breach of warranty is Dushane v. Benedict, 120 U. S. 630, 30 L. ed. 810, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 696. The Supreme Court there said: "The damages recoverable for a breach of warranty or for a false representation include all damages which, in the contemplation of the parties, or according to the natural or usual course of things, may result from the wrongful act." In Sutherland, Damages, 2d ed. p. 1523, § 676, it is said, after a review of many cases: "A buyer may recover damages for personal injuries which result from selling property with a false warranty. . . . A dealer will be liable for like injuries from the explosion of illuminating oils sold with warranty, express or implied, which is untrue. And so will any vendor be held answerable for such injuries from vicious animals sold with warranty of gentle and docile nature. In such cases there is a negligence, which, though free from fraud, involves a serious breach of, social duty as well as contract; and, when the injury comes to the vendee from an exposure induced by the warranty, doubtless the right to damages in an action upon the warranty would be coextensive with that allowed for compensation in actions for negligence. Where an act of negligence is imminently dangerous to the lives of others, the guilty party is liable to one injured thereby, whether a contract between them be violated by that negligence or not. If the law and a contract impose the same duty, the same redress for violation is due by either, and would be accorded, unless there should be practical restriction in the form of action necessarily resorted to to obtain that redress." The doctrine of liability for all damage which, in the contemplation of the parties, or according to the natural or usual course of things, may result from a breach of the warranty, is now well recognized, and is recognized by the Jones v. Ross Case, 98 Ala. 448, 13 So. 319, where the court held the petition sufficient. The exact criterion of recovery in this case, even if appellant should be entitled, on the proof, to recover at all, was not passed on by the court below, unless the court intended by his direction of verdict to hold that damages for personal injury could not be recovered, and that there was no claim of difference in value of the machine, and no recovery sought therefor. If this was the conclusion of the lower court, we are of opinion it was error. The warranty, as alleged and proved by appellant's evidence, was against explosion,—the very thing shown to have happened. Upon this showing by appellant, uncontradicted, we think he would be entitled to recover for his personal injury, as this evidently was in contemplation of the parties, or, according to the natural or usual course of things, might result from a breach of the warranty that the machine would not explode. An explosion of a machine of this sort would usually and ordinarily be attended with damage other than to the machine itself, and might injure persons,—being near a dwelling, would probably do so,—and so it must be held that personal injury was contemplated as a probable result of an explosion, and that was what appellant was assured would not happen. We conclude, therefore, that upon the case as presented by appellant a peremptory instruction should not have been given. Without contradictory evidence, he was entitled to recover.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

Albert DELISLE

v.

Mrs. Henry P. BOURRIAGUE, Plff. in Certiorari.

(105 La. 77.)

- *1. An amendment of pleadings is more readily allowed than refused. There is no substitution of a new plaintiff when the original plaintiff amends his petition in order to make it clearly appear that his children, in whose name he sued, were the parties actually in interest. The supplement and amendment were duly served.
2. Minors have a cause of action for the personal injury which resulted in the death of their mother. The right of action of the mother is made to survive in the name of her children.
3. Weight is given to the findings of facts by the district judge affirmed by the court of appeal. Except in case of manifest error, they will be treated and considered as true.
4. Defendant's dogs were large, and had the appearance of being vicious, and it is inferred that defendant was placed on her guard as to their propensity to do harm.
5. Although an owner is not responsible when the damage is caused by an unforeseen accident, or an accident he could not guard against,—as, when it arises from a vis major,—he is responsible when he is chargeable with the least fault.

6. The defendant requested the deceased to come into her yard, and, after she (deceased) had complied with the request, defendant did not protect her from the attack of her savage dogs. She is therefore responsible for the injury which the dogs inflicted.

Messrs. Dinkelspiel & Hart, Percy S. Benedict, and E. A. O'Sullivan, for defendant in certiorari:

The owner of a dog which does injury is responsible for the same. No scienter of the viciousness of the dog need be brought home to the owner. The act of the dog, being per se vicious, is sufficient to show its propensities.

Civil Code, art. 2321; Mullins v. Blaise, 37 La. Ann. 92; Montgomery v. Koester, 35 La. Ann. 1092, 48 Am. Rep. 253; McGuire v. Ringrose, 41 La. Ann. 1030, 6 So. 895. 54 L. R. A.

Breaux, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant asks for a review of the judgment and for its reversal. The suit was brought by the plaintiff in the district court in his own name and on behalf of his minor children for damages arising from the death of his wife and the mother of his children, who died from the effects of injury inflicted by defendant's dogs. Plaintiff averred in his petition in the district court that his wife was requested by the defendant, who was their next-door neighbor, to come into her back yard, and cut some wood; that the petitioner's wife, being indebted to defendant, and wishing to be obliging, after receiving defendant's assurance that she would be protected against the dogs, entered the yard, and, while chopping defendant's wood, in presence of defendant, she was attacked by her dogs, was maimed and torn almost to pieces, causing wounds of which she died a short time after the attack. Defendant filed an exception setting forth that plaintiff's petition disclosed no right or cause of action, that the children of plaintiff are not named therein, and that it contains no prayer for relief in so far as the minors are concerned. This exception was heard in the district court, and maintained, but the court reserved to plaintiff the right to amend his petition. Some time afterwards plaintiff filed a supplement and amendment in the district court, in accordance with the right reserved to him when defendant's exception was sustained. To the supplement and amendment defendant filed another exception, reiterating that plaintiff had no right or cause of action, and that thereby plaintiff was substituting another plaintiff entirely, and raising issues not raised in the original petition, and which were not consistent with the first demand. This exception was referred to the merits, and just prior to deciding on the merits it was overruled. The defendant filed the plea of general denial in answer to plaintiff's demand. The judge of the district court pronounced judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. On appeal before the court of appeal the judgment of the district court was affirmed. Here the defendant reiterates that the plaintiff has no right or cause of action, and sets up that the original petition filed was the individual petition of Albert Delisle, stating that the death of his wife, the result of the bite of dogs, was caused by the defendant's fault; that he lost the companionship and assistance of his wife; that he has to pay large medical bills and funeral expenses; and that he has lost considerable time in attending to his injured wife's wounds prior to her death. In our view, plaintiff did not, by the amendment, substitute another plaintiff. His children were originally parties to the suit, as their father alleged that it was brought in behalf of his minor children. He was not their tutor at the time; none the less he sought to make them parties by alleging as before stated. After he had qualified as tutor, he not improperly was permitted to avail himself of the right which had been reserved to him as tutor to become the party plaintiff. Whatever rights these minors had, they were entitled to them at the time suit was brought. As they were not properly before the court, allegations setting forth their claim were admissible by way of amendment and supplement. They were not parties strangers to the suit, but parties in whose behalf plaintiff had sought to set up a claim and failed to some extent, because of his omission to set forth the names of these minors. He was also permitted by way of amendment to aver more fully his cause of action, whether individually or for his minor children, and more specifically the items of damages sustained; and, in case of his failure thus to allege, his suit was ordered to be dismissed. These exceptions did not tend to defeat the action. They only retarded its progress. In cases on appeal this court will consider the granting of permission to amend is less likely to do an injustice than its refusal. This court has also held that amendment should be allowed when it prevents a multiplicity of suits. The amendment was granted contradictorily with the defendant. The court ordered the defendant to be cited, and we judge that the suit was placed at issue after legal service had been made. The deficiency in the allegations of the cause of action not sufficiently set forth may be supplied when the amendment and supplement is permitted contradictorily with all parties concerned. As relates to the two—an absolute dismissal or permitting one to amend contradictorily with those he sues—the difference is inconsiderable, and can well be considered on an application to review proceedings as coming within the rule, De minimis non curat lex.

This brings us to defendant's ground of defense that the minors have no cause of action. Originally, the article of the Revised Civil Code relating to damages growing out of offenses or quasi offenses was quite restricted in its scope in so far as related to the heirs of the one injured. Interpreting this article (2313, as originally written), the court held that the right of action was not heritable. In course of time this article was amended in order to prevent the right from perishing in case of the death of the one originally injured. By the first amendment, the right was inherited, in case of death, by the minor children and widow of the deceased, and, if there were no minor children or widow, then by the surviving mother and father. This amendment was interpreted by a decision of this court as not embracing within its terms the husband, but instead the father and mother. Walton v. Booth, 34 La. Ann. 914. This decision had been handed down a comparatively short time when statute No. 71 of 1884 was enacted, by which the right was made to survive by the use of the following language: The survivors above mentioned may also recover the damages "sustained by them by the death of the parent or child, or husband or wife, as the case may be." 54 L. R. A.

In Chivers v. Roger, 50 La. Ann. 57, 23 So. 100, this court decided that the right of action for the recovery of damages to an injured person who dies subsequent to receiving the injuries survives only in favor of the beneficiaries designated in the statute of 1884. Here the minors who sue are expressly designated (they are the children of a mother deceased, who suffered personal injuries), and it is not for us to determine that they shall not recover in the face of the plain provision of the statute designating them.

Defendant's insistence is that, where the injuries are suffered by a married woman, inasmuch as the right of action in her lifetime is the asset of the community, not the personal property of the injured spouse, this community right of action is extinguished by the death of the injured wife. We do not take it that this is the inference to be drawn from the language of the statute, which expressly provides that this right shall pass to the heirs. The language of the statute is imperative. The damage, in case of the death of the parent injured, shall pass to her minor children; and, if she left no minor children, then in favor of her surviving father and mother. We understand that, in order to avoid the extinguishment of the right, a right of action is given to the heir, as just stated. Although without legislation, the wife has no personal claim separate from the community. By legislation the right of action for her personal injury may be made to survive in the name of the forced heirs. But defendant further urges that the personal right of action of the children under the 2d clause of the law of 1884 exists only in case they are entitled to the inheritable right of action provided for by the first clause of the law; that a oneness or solidarity exists between the two rights of action granted by the statute by reason that under the 2d clause the survivors named in the 1st clause may also recover damages sustained by them by the death of the parent; that the copulative conjunction "also" manifestly shows this solidarity,—that is, unless a minor child has a right of action under the 1st clause, he can have none under the 2d clause, and vice versa. The word "also," connecting the 1st with the 2d clause, in our view, does not have the restrictive effect for which defendant contends. On the contrary, it has the effect of extending or broadening the rights, so as by implication, at least, to include the parent, whether it be father or mother.

We pass to a consideration of the defendant's responsibility for the injury inflicted by her dogs. The district judge, in a carefully prepared opinion, describes these hounds as being large, with long bodies and flapping ears, long tails, and of a brownish or reddish tan color. He concluded, from their description, that they were English bloodhounds, in all probability crossed with stag hounds, corresponding in description with the hounds kept in the prisons of this and other states, and trained for the pursuit of escaped convicts. He states further that the dogs were vicious,—maybe inferred by their size, breed, and actual conduct. These are the views of the judge of the first instance, upon whom, in the first instance, devolves the task of sifting and weighing conflicting testimony. This opinion does not come up before us directly for review. Another constitutional authority is intrusted with the duty of giving it consideration, and of appreciating the facts as set forth by the witnesses, and of passing upon the first judgment based upon these facts. The court of appeals, in deciding the case, found that "there is conflict of evidence as to the character of the dogs and defendant's knowledge thereof, but we should accept the conclusion of fact of the judge, who heard and saw the witnesses. But, were this otherwise, we do not think that the doctrine that scienter is a prerequisite to the liability of the owner finds lodgment in our law and jurisprudence. Not only does any act whatever of man that causes damages to another oblige him by whose fault it happened to repair, but he is responsible for damages resulting from his negligence or imprudence, caused by the acts of the thing which he has in his custody. Rev. Civil Code, arts. 2315, 2316, 2318, are positive and equivocal. The owner of the animal is answerable for the damage he has caused. There is no qualification, no restriction, no condition affixed to the legal responsibility," citing Marcade and Demolombe in support of the views before expressed. The court of appeals in its opinion, also says: "In a case in which a father was sued for damages caused by his minor child, it was said 'the law itself imputes the fault to the father.' It presumes that it resulted from lack of sufficient care, watchfulness, and discipline on his part in the exercise of the parental authority. This is the very reason and foundation of the rule. For like reasons, the law imposes responsibility upon the owner for damages occasioned by his animals, who have certainly no greater powers of discernment than the infant of tender years;" citing Mullins v. Blaise, 37 La. Ann. 92. We are not inclined to question the correctness of the conclusion of facts at which the judge of the district court arrived, affirmed as they are by the court of appeal. Taking this conclusion of facts as found for a basis, it irresistibly follows that the defendant was at fault; that these dogs were not the mild and amiable creatures she says they were. But the defendant, in meeting plaintiffs' charges that these dogs were, to their knowledge, savage and fierce, insists that it was then imprudent on the part of the mother to venture to go in defendant's yard to cut wood for her. This insistence presents matter for consideration in fixing the amount of the damages, to which we will return in a moment. This brings us to a consideration of the doctrine of scienter as an element in fixing the owner's liability. We are not inclined to go to the extent that it is of no consequence, in determining the liability of the owner, whether or not he had knowledge of the vicious propensities of his animals. True, the owner of the animal is responsible for the damage it has caused. We do not think, however, that there is no limitation to his liability, and that in all cases of bad conduct of the animal causing the injury he is to be held in damages. The article itself relating to the owner's responsibility contains restrictions and qualifications. The owner is not responsible if the animal had been lost or had strayed more than a day, and he may discharge himself from responsibility by abandoning it, save where the master has turned loose a dangerous animal, for then he must pay for all the harm done. There is no question before us of abandonment. We quote above from the article relating to injury caused by animals to sustain the proposition that there are limitations to the responsibility. Besides that, the damages caused by animals are not viewed, as relates to liability as being similar to the damages caused by a minor for which a tutor is responsible, or the damage for which employers are responsible growing out of the acts of their employees, teachers for their scholars, and artisans for their apprentices. The control and relation between one and other are not the same. The sentiment of consideration and respect and control between man and animals is not the same as that which exists between man and man, and, in consequence, the liability for damages is fixed by different rules. As to the animal, as it is in some cases with a mere thing, it may be abandoned in case it has caused damage. In our view of the authorities upon the subject, we have not found that under the civil law, from which the articles of our Civil Code are derived, it is always held that the character of the animal, and knowledge of its propensities to do harm, is of no consequence in passing upon the responsibility of the owner. We take it that the rule is the other way in so far as the damage is caused by an accident not to be foreseen or guarded against; as when it arises from a vis major. Article 2321 of the Revised Civil Code (Code Napoleon, art. 1385), is founded upon the presumption that the fault is chargeable to the owner of the animal that caused the damage, or to the person in whose use or under whose care it was at the time of the accident; and that presumption can be made to give way only in the presence of proof either of an unforeseen event or by the imprudence of the one injured. 3 Fuzier-Herman, p. 905, No. 37. The French commentators have approvingly referred to this view. From 20 Laurent, p. 675, we quote: "That is to say, that there is no responsibility when there is no fault; the one to whom the damage is imputable should be permitted to prove that he was not at all at fault. But it is only needful to prove the lightest fault (culpa levis) to hold the owner responsible." In all the cases in our jurisprudence to which we have been referred there was some fault for which the owner was responsible; notably the cases of Montgomery v. Koester, 35 La. Ann. 1094, 48 Am. Rep. 253, and Mo-

Guire v. Ringrose, 41 La. Ann. 1029, 6 So. 895.

The amount of the damages is the only question remaining for our determination. A moment ago we referred to the fact that the children of the deceased testified that the dogs in question acted with some degree of fierceness, and sought to annoy them from the neighboring yard. It none the less remains that defendant requested the mother (the deceased) to come into her yard to cut wood for her, and that, after she had complied with the request, the defendant, Mrs. Bourriague, could not (did not even attempt to) protect her from their attack. For reasons assigned, the order nisi is recalled and set aside, and defendant's application is rejected.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

BALTIMORE CONSOLIDATED RAILWAYS COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

James W. ARMSTRONG.

(92 Md. 554.)

The modification of the rule that one guilty of contributory negligence cannot recover for injuries negligently inflicted, which permits a recovery in case defendant might, after discovering plaintiff's peril, have avoided the injury by the exercise of due care, is not applicable where plaintiff, in attempting to put a parcel on the front platform of a street car, negligently stood on the side towards the other track, and, upon perceiving a car approaching on it and receiving and assenting to instructions from its motorman as to reaching a place of safety, became confused and got caught between the cars and injured.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. J. D. Cross, Fielder C. Slingsluff, and George Dobbin Penniman, for appellant:

Judge Thompson (Negligence, vol. 2, p. 1155) sums up the law as follows: 1. If A and B have both been guilty of negligence contributing or tending proximately to produce the injury complained of, A cannot recover damages of B unless, after discovering the negligence of A, B could have avoided the consequences of A's negligence—that is, could have avoided the injury which took place—by the exercise of ordinary care. 2. One person is not bound to anticipate that another person, being sui juris, will negligently expose himself or his property to injury, and is not bound to make provision against the consequences of such negligence. Therefore, if A has negligently placed his person or his property in such a situation that B is liable to injure it in the exercise of his lawful business, and B, without discovering that A has done this, so injures it, B is not bound to pay damages to A, although at the time he committed the injury he was not proceeding with ordinary care.

Beach (Contrib. Neg. chap. 2) says: Whenever the plaintiff's case shows any want of ordinary care under the circumstances, even the slightest, contributing in any degree, even the smallest, as a proximate cause of the injury for which he brings his action, his right to recover is thereby destroyed.

The rule which was introduced into the law of contributory negligence by the case of Davis and Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546, which permits the plaintiff to recover, although guilty of contributory negligence, if the defendant could have avoided the result of that negligence, must not be applied unless the plaintiff was in such a position that he was helpless, and therefore unable to continue to make proper efforts to escape from the approaching danger, and it must appear that the defendant had knowledge of this helplessness, and, after acquiring this knowledge, was able to prevent the accident, but did not try to do so.

The rule has been extended in this state improperly to cover cases where the plaintiff was fully capable, up to the time of the injury, of avoiding the accident.

Northern C. R. Co. v. State use of Price, 49 Md. 436; Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60.

The old limitation, that the rule was not to apply when the plaintiff was as free to avoid the injury as the defendant, and therefore the accident was concurrent, has been overlooked by the courts entirely, and, without meaning it, the decisions have to a great extent destroyed the defense of contributory negligence.

Messrs. Harry W. Henderson, Henry M. Nitzel, and Harold B. Scrimger, for appellees:

The plaintiff's first prayer was approved by this court in Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Cooney, 87 Md. 262, 39 Atl. 859, and Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Stebbing, 62 Md. 515.

The instruction to the jury upon the measure of damages contained in the plaintiff's third prayer was accepted as a proper statement of the law in the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 35 Md. 32.

Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Andrews, 39 Md. 335, 17 Am. Rep. 568; McMahon v. Northern C. R. Co. 39 Md. 441.

There are no circumstances under which the defendant could be relieved of the duty of using ordinary care.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State use of Trainor, 33 Md. 556.

The question of negligence or the want of ordinary care, in cases like the present, is one of fact for the consideration of the jury.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 35 Md. 44.

Schmucker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment obtained in the Baltimore city court by the appellee for damages sustained by him from having been caught and injured between two electric street cars operated by the appellant. There was evidence tending to prove the following facts: The appellee had been riding westward on Pratt street in a car, and alighted therefrom at the intersection of Pratt and Charles streets for the purpose of boarding a south-bound car on the latter street. When he left the Pratt street car, there was a south-bound car standing on Charles street at the north side of Pratt street, and a north-bound car standing on Charles street at the south side of Pratt street. He says that he looked for a car on Charles, and saw the south-bound one, which he wished to take, but saw no north-bound one. He at once took from the front platform of the car on which he had been riding "a cooling board," measuring about 37½ inches long by 20½ inches wide, and started with it in his hands for the south-bound car on Charles street. Instead of going around this car to its west side, which was nearest the sidewalk, and out of the way of other tracks, he went directly across Charles street to the east side of the car next to the north-bound track, and from that position handed his cooling board over the gate at the front platform of the car to its motorman. Just as he finished putting the board over the gate, the north-bound car, which was then in motion, reached him, and he was caught between the two cars and injured. The evidence as to the precise manner in which he got between the two cars is explained by the witnesses as follows: The motormen on both cars, the conductor of the north-bound car, and a witness who was standing at the front of that car all testified that when the north-bound car reached the plaintiff he was standing in a safe place, on the step to the front platform of the south-bound car, handing his cooling board over the gate to the motorman. The witness who was standing at the front of the moving car and the motorman who was receiving the cooling board both say that the plaintiff stepped or jumped down between the cars. Both motormen say that they warned the plaintiff to lookout as the north-bound car was coming up to him, and the motorman on that car testified positively that the plaintiff responded "All right" to his warning, and then stepped up onto the step, where the car of the witness could have safely passed him if he had remained in that position. Both the motorman and conductor of the north-bound car testified that their car was slowly crossing Pratt street, with its gong ringing, when it came up to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, although he testified that he "could hardly tell how it happened" that he got between the cars, said: "I saw that the street [Charles street] was clear, when I started over, as far as the south side of Pratt street. There was no wagon or nothing in sight. I hurried across, and somebody said, 'Look out.' As I looked out, I found that I either had to be picked up by the car or get between the cars." He further testified that while he was putting the cooling board over the gate of the south-bound car to the motorman he looked right at the motorman, and did not keep his eye on the north-bound track, and that he heard no gong ring; that, just as he got rid of the board, the motorman who was taking it from him said "Look out," and he cast his eye down, and the north-bound car was right on him; that there was then no chance but to get between the cars; that he "had not the least idea that he would not have room there between the cars;" and that he got between them and was injured. He was a large, fleshy man. The motorman who took the cooling board from the plaintiff further testified without contradiction that when the latter started to go between the cars he called to him to go around in front of the south-bound car, and that there was plenty of room for him to do so safely, as the fender was narrower than the car; but the plaintiff, instead of taking his advice, got between the two cars. The plaintiff testified in rebuttal that he did not get upon the step of the north-bound car when he handed the cooling board over the gate to the motorman, but he did not refer to or deny the statements made by the witnesses for the defense that he had answered "All right" to the warning of the north-bound motorman, or that, as he was going between the cars, the south-bound motorman told him to go around in front of the fender of his car, which was not in motion.

There is but one exception in the record, and that was taken to the action of the court upon the prayers. The plaintiff offered three prayers, all of which were granted, and the defendant offered seven prayers, of which the second and third were rejected, the fourth, sixth, and seventh were granted, and the first and fifth were granted as modified by the court. The plaintiff's second prayer and the defendant's first prayer as modified by the court substantially directed the jury that, if they found the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence, that would not disentitle him to recover if the defendant's motorman could have avoided the accident by the exercise of due care after he saw or ought to have seen the plaintiff's peril. Neither of these two prayers was objectionable in the form in which it was granted if the facts of the case justified the court in modifying, in the manner just stated, the general doctrine that negligence on the part of a plaintiff contributing directly to the injury complained of will debar his recovery of damages therefor. The appellant earnestly contended in its brief and at the argument that this court in its recent decisions, especially in McKewen's Case, 80 Md. 593, 31 Atl. 797, and Appel's Case, 80 Md. 603, 31 Atl. 964, and Rifcowitz's Case, 80 Md. 338, 43 Atl. 762, had gone much further in the use of this modification of the general doctrine than in its earlier cases, and that it had in fact gone so far in that direction as to practically destroy the defense of contributory negligence. He cited Maryland C. R. Co. v. Neubeur, 62 Md. 391, as containing a statement of the views held by the court on this subject prior to the recent decisions. The fact, however, is that long prior to the decision of that case the use of precisely the same form of modification of the general doctrine as that employed in two prayers now under consideration had been definitely sanctioned by this court in Northern C. R. Co. v. State use of Price, 29 Md. 436, 96 Am. Dec. 545; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State use of Trainor, 33 Md. 554, and Klipper v. Coffey, 44 Md. 128, and it was declared to be "the settled law of this state" in the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Mulligan, 45 Md. 494. The modification may be regarded as having originated in the cases of Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546, and Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. N. S. 573, both of which were cited with approval in Price's Case, 29 Md. 436, 96 Am. Dec. 545, and Mulligan's Case, 45 Md. 494. Neubeur's Case was one of a collision at a crossing on a steam railroad, and there was evidence that the plaintiff failed to exercise ordinary care in looking up and down the track as he approached it. The lower court granted a prayer instructing the jury that, even if they found the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence, he was still entitled to recover "unless they further find that the defendant could not, by the exercise of care and diligence on its part, have avoided such accident." This court held the prayer bad because it failed to define with accuracy the relative duties and obligations of the parties under the facts of that case, and left the jury at liberty to regard as negligence on the part of the defendant the omission by it of any one of a number of precautions mentioned in the evidence some of which it was and others of which it was not legally bound to observe. In defining the doctrine of contributory negligence the court in that case says: "The general principle is that, where both parties by their negligence directly contributed to the production of the accident, neither has a right to recover of the other for injuries sustained thereby. But there are exceptions to this general rule, and in cases like the present the exception is that if the defendant, or those acting for it, had become aware of the perilous situation of the plaintiff, though that peril had been incurred by the negligent or even reckless conduct of the plaintiff, yet the defendant or its agents would be bound to use all reasonable diligence to avoid the accident. But, in order that this qualification or exception to the general rule may be successfully invoked by the plaintiff, he must show knowledge on the part of the defendant or its agents of the peril in which he, the plaintiff, was placed, and that there was time after such knowledge within which to make the effort to save him from the impending danger." The difference between the modification of the general principle recognized as proper in Neubeur's Case and that sanctioned by this court in the recent cases is simply that in the former case the defendant was held liable if he could, by the exercise of reasonable care, after he became aware of the plaintiff's peril, have averted the accident, and in the later cases he was held liable if he could have prevented it after he became, or ought to have become, aware of the peril. There is no difference in principle between these two forms of instruction to the jury, for it cannot be seriously contended that when the defendant is in a position from which he ought to see, or by the exercise of reasonable care could see, the plaintiff's peril, he may avert his face, or close his eyes, and not see it, and then escape liability for an injury resulting from such conduct on his part. As was said by this court in Cooney's Case, 87 Md. 268, 39 Atl. 861: "The law will not permit the loss of life, limb, or even property, to be deliberately and carelessly inflicted, when it could, by reasonable care and caution, be avoided, merely because the injured person was negligent." This modification of the general doctrine of contributory negligence should not be constantly or indiscriminately used in instructing juries in suits for injuries caused by negligence, but its employment should be confined to those cases in which there is testimony placing the defendant or his agent in a situation affording him an opportunity to discover the plaintiff's peril, by the exercise of reasonable care, in time to avert it. The recent Cases of McKewen, Appel, and Rifcowitz, to which we have referred, were all cases of injury by electric street cars to persons crossing their tracks at intersecting streets. In both McKewen's and Risicowitz's Cases the car which inflicted the injury was running at a high rate of speed, and the evidence tended to show that, if the motorman had slackened his speed, and held his car well under control, as he approached the crossing, he could have seen the plaintiff in time to have prevented the accident. In Appel's Case there was evidence that the motorman did not use the ample opportunity which he had after he ought to have seen the plaintiff to protect him from injury. In those three cases the evidence plainly called for the form of instruction given by the court to the jury.

Applying the principles which we have been considering to the case now before us, we do not think it was a proper one in which to modify the general proposition that the plaintiff's contributory negligence barred his right of recovery. He was palpably guilty of negligence which contributed directly to his injury, and without which the injury would not have happened. He had, it is true, an equal right with the car to be upon the track, which was laid in a public street of the city; but he went deliberately, when encumbered with his awkward cooling board, to the dangerous side of the south-bound car, when access to its safe side was unobstructed, and he stood there until he could pass the cooling board over the gate of the front platform to the motorman, and meanwhile kept no lookout for approaching cars on the north-bound track, which was almost under his feet. It is not denied that the motorman of the approaching car saw the plaintiff between the tracks as he came near him. The only question on that branch of the case is whether, after seeing the plaintiff, he used reasonable care to prevent injury to him. If the testimony of the motorman to which we have already adverted, and which is corroborated by three other witnesses, is to be believed, he gave the plaintiff timely warning; and the plaintiff at first heeded the warning, and got into a safe place, which he, in his confusion, afterwards abandoned. This testimony is only contradicted to the extent that the plaintiff in rebuttal said that he had not gotten upon the step of the car; but he himself had already testified that he could hardly tell how it happened that he got between the cars, and he was evidently much confused at the time of the accident. Furthermore, the uncontradicted testimony of the motorman of the south-bound car was that when he saw the plaintiff about to go between the cars he told him to go around the fender of his car, where there was room for him to go in safety. The plaintiff further testified that when he went between the cars he thought there was ample room for him there. The testimony in the case did not, in our opinion, justify the court below in granting the plaintiff's second prayer, or in modifying the defendant's first prayer as it did. We further think that, in view of the undoubted contributory negligence of the plaintiff, without which the accident would not have occurred, and the practical absence of evidence tracing the cause of the injury to negligence of the defendant's agents, the case falls within the principles laid down in State use of Bacon v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 58 Md. 485, and the case there cited of Dublin, W. & W. R. Co. v. Slattery, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1166, and the court below would have been justified in withdrawing it from the jury if an instruction to that effect had been asked for. We think that the judgment should be reversed, without a new trial, and for that reason it will not be necessary for us to review the action of the court below on the other prayers.

Judgment reversed, without new trial.

Rehearing denied.

COMMITTEE OF THE BAPTIST CHURCH

(92 Md. 497.)

An absolute gift, and not a trust, is created by a will bequeathing a fund to a church, and "suggesting" that it be used to complete the spire, or invested and the income used to carry on a church mission or for the benefit of the church poor,—especially in view of the fact that the objects designated are so vague as to render the trust void if established, and permit the property to revert to the next of kin, and the word "trust" is used in other parts of the will, where there is a plain intent to create a trust.

(January '18, 1901.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court, No. 2, of Baltimore City in favor of defendant in a proceeding to recover property bequeathed by the will of John W. M. Williams, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George Whitelock and Edward L. Koontz, for appellants:

The only conclusion inferable from the use of the word "trust" where the testator did not intend to create a separate beneficial interest, and the omission of that word where he did intend to create such an interest, is that he really did not know the technical meaning of the word "trust;" and therefore, in interpreting the controverted clause from which that word is omitted, the will falls directly within the rationale of the rule laid down in Saylor v. Plaine, 31 Md.

NOTE.—As to precatory words in will to create trust, see, in this series, Knox's Appeal (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 353, and note; Slattery v. Watson (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 393, and note; cases in note to Powers v. Jeudevine (Vt.) 7 L. R. A. on page 519; Bryan v. Milby (Del.) 13 L. R. A. 563, and note; Bills v. Bills (Iowa) 8 L. R. A. 696; Orth v. Orth (Ind.) 32 L. R. A. 298; and Jewell v. Louisville Trust Co. (Ky.) 58 L. R. A. 377.

164, 1 Am. Rep. 34, and applied in many cases, e. g.—

Smith v. Church Extension of M. E. Church, 56 Md. 396; Riser v. Perry, 58 Md. 114; Dulany v. Middleton, 72 Md. 70, 19 Atl. 146; Trinity M. E. Church, South v. Baker, 91 Md. 539, 46 Atl. 1020.

Controlling effect should be given to the circumstances that, while he did, in the first instance, give the entire beneficial interest to the legatee for its purposes generally, he did, in sharp contrast and in striking antithesis thereto, abandon the use of trust terms in the second instance, and unambiguously indicated the particular purposes, which necessarily exclude all other purposes, to which he intended that the fund should be devoted.

Smith v. Church Extension of M. E. Church, 56 Md. 396.

Any attempt to establish a nomenclature or lexicon of precatory words would necessarily result in endless confusion and an irreconcilable conflict of authorities, as the same words and phrases have been held to create or not to create precatory trusts in accordance with their place in the context.

Williams v. Worthington, 49 Md. 573, 33 Am. Rep. 286; Handley v. Wrightson, 60 Md. 199; Nunn v. O'Brien, 83 Md. 200, 34 Atl. 244; 1 Jarman, Wills, 5th ed. pp. 680-696.

The testator used the word "suggest" in the same sense, in speaking of the work at the Williams Chapel, as he did when he provided for the completion of the steeple. Yet in the case of the Williams Chapel there could be no question but that, upon a proper case based upon the maladministration of the fund, a court of equity would interfere, at the instance, even, of a single member of the church's board of trustees, to compel the withdrawal of the fund from its present investment in the ground rent and its devotion to the work at the church mission, if the bequest in favor of the chapel were valid in other respects.

Peter v. Carter, 70 Md. 140, 16 Atl. 450.

If the testator did not intend that the Baptist Church should take the beneficial interest, that interest was held by it in trust for the next of kin.

Needles v. Martin, 33 Md. 614.

If the testator, instead of giving the legacy to the church for its general purposes, saw fit to designate some certain specific purpose for which the fund should be held, the Baptist Church cannot hold it for any other purpose.

Smith v. Church Extension of M. E. Church, 56 Md. 396; Yingling v. Miller, 77 Md. 106, 26 Atl. 491; Peter v. Carter, 70 Md. 142, 16 Atl. 450.

The church, as between it and the next of kin, could not exercise the power, either by purchasing ground rents or otherwise, to invest the fund and devote the income to the work of the mission, because that trust and the power incident thereto constitute, separately or together, a violation of the rule against perpetuities.

Barnum v. Barnum, 26 Md. 172; Needles v. Martin, 33 Md. 618; Missionary Soc. of M. E. Church v. Humphreys, 91 Md. 131, 46 Atl. 320.

The imperative trust in favor of the poor is plainly void.

Yingling v. Miller, 77 Md. 106, 26 Atl. 491; Maught v. Getzendanner, 65 Md. 527, 57 Am. Rep. 352, 5 Atl. 471; Nunn v. O'Brien, 83 Md. 200, 34 Atl. 244; McClerman v. McClernan, 73 Md. 284, 20 Atl. 908.

Messrs. Gans & Haman and Vernon Cook, for appellee:

The word "suggest" is not such a word as will create a precatory trust.

Perry, Tr. § 113; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 41; Pratt v. Sheppard & E. P. Hospital, 88 Md. 622, 42 Atl. 51; Nunn v. O'Brien, 83 Md. 198, 34 Atl. 244; Chase v. Plummer, 17 Md. 165.

A suggestion is something intended for consideration, but not intended as a binding instruction.

The more modern tendency is to restrict this whole doctrine of precatory trusts.

Lewin, Tr. 9th ed. chap. 8, § 2, subsec. 11; Pratt v. Sheppard & E. P. Hospital, 88 Md. 622, 42 Atl. 51; Williams v. Worthington, 49 Md. 572, 33 Am. Rep. 286.

The uncertainty as to the objects of the alleged trust is a cogent reason for holding that no trust was intended.

It is clear that the testator did not by this clause intend to create a trust.

Page, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the testator, after making specific bequests of his furniture, clothing, and books, directed that all the rest and residue of his estate should be "converted into cash," and bequeathed, one half thereof to the Maryland Baptist Union Association, and the remaining half part he bequeathed, in the following words, to "the Committee of the Baptist Church in the City of Baltimore, a body corporate, incorporated of the state of Maryland, commonly called the 'First Baptist Church of the City of Baltimore,' and I suggest, if the spire or steeple of the said church property be unfinished at the time of my death, that the funds received, or such part thereof as may be necessary, be used for the purpose of completing the same; and further suggest, if the spire is finished, that the said funds, or what may be left after completing the said spire, be invested by the said committee, and the income devoted to the work at the church mission known as 'Williams Chapel,' but, if the work has been abandoned, then said income to be used for the relief of the poor of the said church." It is contended on the part of the appellant that, under this clause of the will, the Committee of the Baptist Church does not take an absolute beneficial interest in the sums so raised, but that a trust is created for the purposes there set forth. The bill charges that, by the true construction of the clause, the committee of the church did not take an absolute interest, but that the sum so bequeathed was to be used by it in its absolute and uncontrollable discretion, either for the completion of the spire or for investment, and the devotion of the income therefrom in perpetuity to the work of the church mission, and in the event that it should not apply the sum to the completion of the spire, or the income thereof to the work of the church mission, then the income was to be used for the relief of the poor of the church. It is also charged in the bill that the committee did not apply any part of the sum to the completion of the spire, nor any part of the income to the work on the mission, but had applied the whole sum to the redemption of the ground rent on the ground covered by Williams Chapel, and that in such case the fund or the income not having been used for the completion of the spire, or for the work of the chapel, a "positive and mandatory trust attached to the fund for the relief of the poor of the chapel, and for no other purpose; and that, such trust being null and void for uncertainty, the said sum constitutes a trust fund, held by the committee of the defendant for the benefit of those who are next of kin of the testator." The contention, therefore, is that the fund in the hands of the Committee of the Baptist Church, under the terms of the will, is a trust fund (1) for the completion of the spire, or for the devotion of the income to the work on the chapel, if the committee should elect to do either; or, (2) if it should not so elect, then for the benefit of the poor of the church.

In determining this question, it is the intention of the testator that must be sought for; and unless it can be ascertained from the language of the will, taken alone or in connection with other circumstances proper to be considered, that the testator intended to create a trust, no such trust can be found to exist. Chase v. Plummer, 17 Md. 165; Saylor v. Plaine, 31 Md. 164, 1 Am. Rep. 34; Nunn v. O'Brien, 83 Md. 198, 34 Atl. 244; Pratt v. Sheppard & E. P. Hospital, 88 Md. 622, 42 Atl. 51.

The main reason assigned by the counsel for the appellants for the claim that this clause creates, or was intended by the testator to create, a trust, is in the use of the word "suggest," which, it is insisted, must be regarded, in the connection in which it is used, as a precatory word. In considering what is the proper interpretation of this word as employed by the testator, it must be borne in mind that the bequest to the committee is without any limitation whatever, but is in terms that of themselves convey the grant of an absolute interest. The testator nowhere has said that the donation is made in trust. If, therefore, the subsequent words create a trust, it must do so by qualifying the terms which had been previously used, and undo that which he had previously done. It must also be noted that the word "suggest," as it occurs in the clause, applies to all the provisions which are supposed to designate the objects of the trust and the uses of the fund. The testator "suggests" that the spire be finished, and, if that is already done, that the income shall be devoted to the work on the chapel, and, if the one has been finished and the other abandoned, he further suggests that the income be devoted to the relief of the poor of the church. Can the word "suggest," when used in this connection, without qualifying or explanatory words, be regarded as a precatory word, sufficient to create a trust, as to property previously given absolutely?

We have been cited to no case, and have found none, where it has been so held. A suggestion alone, without other words or circumstances to affect the ordinary meaning, is a mere placing before another a matter for consideration, and, under ordinary circumstances, in no wise carries with it an expression of desire, will, or entreaty, and here it seems to amount to no more than this. The testator gives the whole interest in the fund absolutely to the church. He places no restrictions upon it as to its use, but he does mention several matters for consideration. He "suggests" that a proper disposition would be to finish the spire, or apply the income to the chapel, not as a requirement upon the committee, but as a matter for its consideration. So, also, in respect to the relief of the poor, there is no limitation imposed upon the committee, but a mere suggestion as to what would be a proper use of the fund. There is nothing in the word "suggest," either in its meaning as ordinarily employed or as affected by the context of the will, that can be regarded as expressive of confidence, or belief, or desire, or hope, or will, or as the equivalent of a word of entreaty or recommendation. "Suggest" is in fact, therefore, not a precatory word at all, in the ordinary sense, and there is nothing in this will to justify us in attributing to it any other than its ordinary meaning. If this interpretation of this word be correct, there was no duty upon the committee to perform the acts suggested.

These several matters are suggested for the consideration of the committee, but it is left to the exercise of its own discretion whether any of them should be performed; and where that is the case, and the prior disposition of the property imparts absolute and uncontrollable ownership, courts of equity will not create a trust from words even of a precatory character. Nunn v. O'Brien, 83 Md. 201, 34 Atl. 244.

But, aside from this, there remains a serious difficulty in declaring that the clauses in question create a trust, upon another ground. The claim of the appellant is that the clauses create a trust, but that such trust is void because of the uncertainty of the objects. The controversy here is not as to the indefiniteness of the objects,—that is conceded, as to the use of the fund for the relief of the poor,—but the question is whether the testator intended to raise a trust. Now, this court, in Pratt v. Sheppard & E. P. Hospital, 88 Md. 627, 42 Atl. 56, has discussed clearly and exhaustively the difference between "a trust that is void for uncerfaintly and an uncertainty that is simply indicative of the absence of an intention to create a trust." The court there said: "Where it is sought to show by implication or from the use of precatory words, following an absolute gift, that a trust was intended to be fastened on the gift, an uncertainty as to the objects or as to the subject of the alleged trust will be a reason, not necessarily conclusive, but still a reason, for holding that no trust was designed by the testator." This principle, conformable as it is to the dictates of sound common sense, and amply supported by authority here and elsewhere, ought to have full force and effect given to it in a case like this, where the contention in favor of the trust rests on an expression so feeble to indicate a desire to create a trust as the word "suggest." In the absence of convincing proof to the contrary, it cannot be assumed that the testator intended to create a void trust. If other terms had been employed, clearly indicating an intention of the testator to raise a trust, and the objects expressed were vague and uncertain, the next of kin would take, because it would be clear the legatee was not designed to have a beneficial interest. But, when the gift is made to the legatee in absolute terms, it would be unreasonable to suppose that the testator thereafter, by the employment of a word of uncertain import, in the connection it is used, intended to create a trust for objects so vague and uncertain as to be incapable of enforcement.

The clause is wholly nugatory and void

as a devise, if it be held that it was the intention to create a trust, but, if the word "suggest" be taken in its ordinary meaning, it is clear that the intention of the testator was to present these several objects to the attention of the committee, as proper and worthy ones to receive the benefit of his donation, but that it was not his purpose to place any limitation upon the absolute right of the committee to the exercise of its uncontrollable discretion. Moreover, it is clear that the testator or the draftsman of his will had a knowledge of what were apt words for the creation of a trust, though it is possible he might have had some confusion as to the description of the objects of the trust. In view of this, it is significant, at least, that in the previous bequests he gives one half of the fund "in trust" to the Maryland Baptist Union Association, but, when the bequest of the other half is made to the Committee of the Baptist Church, the word "trust" is omitted, and instead is employed the word "suggest." It cannot be assumed that this change of expression was the result of accident or mistake. If it was not, but the word "suggest" was deliberately used instead of "trust," it would be impossible to hold that, by a mere suggestion, he intended to create a trust.

It follows from what we have said that we are of opinion that the legacy to the Committee of the Baptist Church is absolute, and not subject to any trust, and the decree of the lower court must be affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Re HOUSE BILL NO. 1,291.

(.....Mass.....)

Constitutional requirements of a written vote, and provisions for sorting and counting, will not preclude the use of a voting machine by which the result is effected by a system of wheels, cogs, and indexes in connection with written or printed names of the candidates,—at least if the action of the machine in registering each vote cast is visible to the voter casting it, and the work of the machine in adding the votes is done under the supervision of someone duly charged with counting the votes cast.

(Morton, Barker, and Hammond, JJ., dissent.)

SUBMISSION by the House of Representatives for the opinion of the Supreme Court as to the right to adopt machines for the purpose of registering the vote at elections. Favorable answer returned.

NOTE.—For another case in this series as to right to use voting machine under constitutional provision providing for voting by ballot, see also Opinion of the Justices (R. I.) 36 L. R. A. 547. 54 L. R. A.

The question involved sufficiently appears in the opinions of the judges.

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

The undersigned justices of the supreme judicial court, having considered the question proposed by the honorable house of representatives by its order of March 29, 1901, a copy of which is annexed, respectfully submit the following opinion:

The ground for doubt as to the power of the general court under the Constitution of the commonwealth is to be found in the requirement that representatives "shall be chosen by written vote" (part 2, chap. 1, § 3, art. 3), and in the implication of the provisions for sorting and counting the votes for governor (part 2, chap. 2, § 1, art. 3), and for senator (part 2, chap. 1, § 2, art. 2). To these may be added the requirement that certain militia officers shall be elected by written vote (part 2, chap. 2, § 1, art. 10), and articles 16 and 17 of the amendments, one or both of which might be held to adopt the method of voting for governor for the election of certain other officers. Whether the first-mentioned requirement, as to representation, has been repealed by article 21 of the Amendments, giving the legislature power to prescribe the "manner of ascertaining" the election of representatives, it is unnecessary to consider, although it may be well to bear that amendment in mind in weighing the arguments which we shall adduce. Apart from these provisions, no doubt, the general power of the legislature would extend to authorizing the use of a voting machine. See, for example, Const. Amend. art. 19.

With regard to votes for representatives in Congress it is provided by chapter 154 of the Statutes of the United States for 1899 (30 Stat. at L. 836) that they may be by "voting machine the use of which has been duly authorized by the state law," so that the elections of national officers require no separate consideration.

We assume that the voting machines which the honorable house has in mind vary in their mode of recording votes; that all of them dispense with the use of a separate piece of paper for each vote; that some of them register a large number of successive votes by successive punches upon one strip of paper, in separate lines for separate candidates, with the names, if necessary, against the lines; and that some of them abandon the use of paper altogether in recording, each vote being marked by the partial revolution of a cogwheel or other similar device, and the total number being shown by some easily adapted index. If necessary, however, in this class of machines the names of the candidates may appear in writing attached to the point where the voter registers his vote, in such manner as to indicate that his turning a particular key or pressing a particular knob expresses a vote for the name written above.

The question whether such a machine satisfies whatever requirements or implications there may be in the Constitution of the commonwealth depends upon how far we are to follow the line of argument started by Chief Justice Parker in Henshaw v. Foster, 9 Pick. 312. In that case it was pointed out, with regard to this very matter, that, as the chief justice puts it, "words competent to the then existing state of the community, and at the same time capable of being expanded to embrace more extensive relations, should not be restrained to their more obvious and immediate sense, if, consistently with the general object of the authors and the true principles of the compact, they can be extended to other relations and circumstances which an improved state of society may produce." Page 317.

To state in our own way the mode of approaching the question, it is not so important to consider what picture the framers of the Constitution had in their minds as what benefits they sought to secure, or evils to prevent,—what they were thinking against in their affirmative requirement of writing, and what they would have prohibited if they had put the clause in a negative form. The answer, or a part of it, is given by Chief Justice Parker in the case already cited: "The practice had been to elect many town officers by hand vote, and probably in some instances representatives had been so chosen. It became necessary, therefore, to prescribe that the choice should be made by ballot. But, even the word 'ballot' itself is ambiguous, and therefore it was required that representatives shall be elected 'by written votes.'" No doubt the picture in the minds of those who used the words was that of a piece of paper with the names of the candidates voted for written upon it in manuscript, but the thing which they meant to stop was oral or hand voting, and the benefits which they meant to secure were the greater certainty and permanence of a material record of each voter's act and the relative privacy incident to doing that act in silence. They did not require the signature of the voter, or any means of identifying his vote as his after it had been cast. It was settled by Henshaw v. Foster that they did not require manuscript. In our opinion, they did not require a separate piece of paper for each voter. That is to say, by requiring writing they did not prevent the legislature from authorizing several voters to use a single ballot if the voters all signed it, or in some way sufficiently indicated that a single paper expressed the act and choice of each. It seems to us that the object, and even the words, of the Constitution in requiring "written votes" are satisfied when the voter makes a change in a material object,—for instance, by causing a wheel to revolve a fixed distance,—if the material object changed is so connected with or related to a written or printed name purporting to be the name of a candidate for office that, by the understanding of all, the making of the change expresses a vote for the candidate whose name is thus connected with the device.

So far we have been considering the requirement of written votes alone, and have assumed that all other constitutional conditions are complied with. But it remains to consider whether the result is changed by the provisions as to sorting and counting votes where those provisions apply. These seem to us to raise less difficulty. The provisions do not express a constitutional end. They express merely assumptions that sorting and counting will be necessary if you have written votes, as they would have been necessary a hundred years ago. It would not be true to say that the framers of the Constitution chose the risk of errors incident to sorting and counting in preference to the risk of errors of a different class incident to some different way of finding out the result. They never thought of any other way. Probably the only distinctions which occurred to them concerned different modes of sorting and counting.

It is theoretically possible to exclude by a mechanical device every chance of error in the sorting and counting of votes. Whether that is accomplished by existing machines is a matter about which we have no adequate information, and is a question of fact which it would not fall within our province to determine. We assume that the legislature, before authorizing the use of a machine, would satisfy itself that the voter would be sufficiently apprised of what to do in order to vote for his candidate, that the machine really would carry out and express the intent which it purported to be ready to express, that it was of such mechanical perfection as to exclude the possibility of internal error, and that sufficient arrangements were made to prevent external fraud. Under such circumstances the sorting and counting of the votes shrink by atrophy to a mere survival, but there is nothing contrary to the Constitution in that. If it be deemed technically necessary that the possibility, at least, of sorting and counting should remain, it does remain. Whether in the form of successive punches in a line upon paper, or in the marked revolutions of a wheel appropriated to a given candidate, material changes abide which signify by predetermined language the number of votes cast, exactly to the same extent that it would be signified by slips of paper bearing characters in printer's ink. The votes could be counted as cast, if it were necessary. They can be counted afterwards as well. The fact that the index of machinery has cut down the chance of personal error to a minimum surely is not an objection sanctioned by the Constitution.

The views which we express coincide with the opinion of a majority of the judges of the supreme court of Rhode Island in regard to the McTammany machine (Re Tax Assignment Orders, 19 R. I. 729, 36 Atl. 426), and with some other discussion of the subject which we have seen.

It is proper to add that we have considered only the answer to the general question. What provisions should be made in the exceptional case of challenged votes, etc., is a question of detail, easily dealt with by special arrangements.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

MARCUS P. KNOWLTON.

JOHN LATHROP.

I agree with this conclusion, provided the result of the action of the machine in registering each vote cast is visible to the voter casting the vote, and the work of the machine, in adding up the votes cast, is done under the supervision of some person duly charged with counting the votes cast. I agree that machinery can be used by the voter in making a written vote within the meaning of the Constitution, and also that there is nothing in the Constitution which forbids machinery being used in counting the votes cast. The first difficulty in holding that the provisions of the Constitution are complied with by any one of the several voting machines which are now in use (so far as I know) comes from the fact that in none of them can the voter see what his written vote is. In the method of voting prescribed by the Constitution the voter knows what the written vote cast by him is. It is manifest that the use of a voting machine, which records a written vote without disclosing to the voter what that vote is, involves chances of error quite different from those involved in the method of voting contemplated by the Constitution. There are similar difficulties arising from the fact that the addition of the several votes cast made by many of the voting machines is also invisible, and that the correctness of the result produced by the machine depends entirely upon the machine's having made the addition correctly in the first instance, without the possibility of knowing whether that addition was or was not correctly made, and without the possibility of correcting it if it was not correctly made. And, again, the only guard against a voter's casting more than one vote lies in the fact that the mechanical device put into the machine to prevent double voting has worked correctly, and in that fact alone, without there being any means of knowing whether it did or did not work correctly, and without the possibility of correcting such a fraud if one were committed. It is manifest that in the matter of the record made by the machine being in each instance what the voter intended his vote should be, in the matter of the several votes cast being correctly added together by the machine, and in the matter of double voting, the chances of error involved, where the result of an election is made to depend solely upon the result produced by the voting machine, are quite different from those incident to the method of voting contemplated by the Constitution; at least so far as the voting machines now in use are concerned. And, in my opinion, the chances of error to which I have referred are so far different as to forbid votes cast and counted only by such a machine being held to be a compliance with the provisions of the Constitution in that connection. It is evident that the use of voting machines which I have suggested would destroy to a great extent the secrecy of the ballot; but I find nothing in the Constitution requiring that the written vote there provided for should be a secret one. It has been suggested that a machine could be devised which would indicate that a vote had been cast for some person for a designated office, without disclosing the person voted for, and that by the use of such a machine the secrecy of the ballot could be maintained, and the requirements of the Constitution met. In my opinion, the use of such a machine would not meet the requirements of the Constitution.

WILLIAM CALES LORING.

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

The undersigned justices of the supreme judicial court respectfully submit the following as their opinion upon the question of law stated in your order of March 29, 1901, which question is: "Has the general court the right to authorize the use of voting and counting machines at elections by the people of national, state, district, county, city or town officers?"

First. As to county, city, and town officers, and as to officers chosen by districts, other than councilors, senators, and representatives, we know of no constitutional restriction upon the power of the general court to direct the manner of choice.

Second. As to councilors, senators, and representatives, and as to the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary, treasurer, and receiver general, auditor, and attorney general, there are constitutional provisions which must be considered in answering your question.

The provisions to which we refer are these:

Declaration of Rights, art. 9: "All elections ought to be free. . . ." Part 2, chap. 1, § 1, art. 4: "And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said general court from time to time to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without; so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, and of the subjects of the same, and for the necessary support and defense of the government thereof; and to name and settle annually, or provide by fixed laws for the naming and settling, all civil officers within the said commonwealth, the election and constitution of whom are not hereafter in this form of government, otherwise provided for. . . ."

Part 2, chap. 1, § 2, art. 2: "The senate shall be the first branch of the legislature; and the senators shall be chosen in the following manner, viz.: . . . The selectmen of the several towns . . . shall receive the votes of all the inhabitants of such towns. . . . and shall sort and count them in open town meeting, and in presence of the town clerk, who shall make a fair record, in presence of the selectmen, and in open town meeting, of the name of every person voted for, and of the number of votes against his name; and a fair copy of this record shall be attested by the selectmen and the town clerk, and shall be sealed up, directed to the secretary of the commonwealth, for the time being, with a superscription expressing the purport of the contents thereof, and delivered by the town clerk of such towns, to the sheriff of the county in which such town lies. . . ."

Part 2, chap. 1, § 3, art. 3: "Every member of the house of representatives shall be chosen by written votes." Part 2, chap. 2, § 1, art. 3: "Those persons . . . qualified . . . within the several towns of this commonwealth, shall, at a meeting to be called for that purpose, . . . annually, give in their votes for a governor, to the selectmen, who shall preside at such meetings; and the town clerk, in the presence and with the assistance of the selectmen, shall, in open town meeting, sort and count the votes, and form a list of the persons voted for, with the number of votes for each person against his name; and shall make a fair record of the same in the town books, and a public declaration thereof in the said town meeting; and shall, in the presence of the inhabitants, seal up copies of the said list, attested by him and the selectmen, and transmit the same to the sheriff of the county. . . ." Part 2, chap. 2, § 1, art. 10: "The captains and subalterns of the militia shall be elected by the written votes of the trainband and alarm list of their respective companies; . . . the field officers of regiments shall be elected by the written votes of the captains and subalterns of their respective regiments; the brigadiers shall be elected in like manner, by the field officers of their respective brigades. . . ." Part 2, chap. 2, § 2, art. 1: "There shall be annually elected a lieutenant governor . . . in the same manner with the governor. . . ."

Amendments, art. 16: "Eight councilors shall be annually chosen by the inhabitants of this commonwealth, qualified to vote for governor. The election of councilors shall be determined by the same rule that is required in the election of governor. . . . The day and manner of the election, the return of the votes, and the declaration of the said elections, shall be the same as are required in the election of governor. . . ."

Article 17: "The secretary, treasurer, and receiver general, auditor, and attorney general, shall be chosen annually. . . . The qualification of the voters, the manner of the election, the return of the votes, and the declaration of the election, shall be such as are required in the election of governor. . . ."

Article 21: "The manner of calling and conducting the meetings for the choice of representatives, and of ascertaining their election, shall be prescribed by law. . . ." Article 22: "The manner of calling and conducting the meetings for the choice of representatives, and of ascertaining their election, shall be prescribed by law. . . ."

Article 24: "Any vacancy in the senate shall be filled by election by the people of the unrepresented district, upon the order of a majority of the senators elected."

In our opinion, the requirements as to the choice of senators found in part 2, chap. 1, § 2, art. 3, of the Constitution were not abrogated by articles 22 and 24 of the amendments, nor was the provision of part 2, chap. 1, § 3, art. 3, that "Every member of the house of representatives shall be chosen by written votes," abrogated by article 21 of the amendments. The provision that representatives shall be chosen by written votes was before this court in the year 1830 in the case of Henshaw v. Foster, 9 Pick. 312, in which decision it was held that printed votes are written votes, within the meaning of the provision. The same decision states the general considerations which should have weight in construing the provision, and with that statement we agree: "In construing so important an instrument as a constitution, especially those parts which affect the vital principle of a republican government,—the elective franchise, or the manner of exercising it,—we are not on the one hand, to indulge ingenious speculations, which may lead us wide from the true sense and spirit of the instrument; nor, on the other, to apply to it such narrow and constrained views as may exclude the real object and intent of those who framed it. We are to suppose that the authors of such an instrument had a thorough knowledge of the force and extent of the words they employ, that they had a beneficial end and purpose in view, and that more especially in any apparent restriction upon the mode of exercising the right of suffrage there was some existing or anticipated evil which it was their purpose to avoid. If an enlarged sense of any particular form of expression should be necessary to accomplish so great an object as the convenient exercise of the fundamental privilege or right, that of election, such sense must be attributed. We are to suppose that those who were delegated to the great business of distributing the powers which emanated from the sovereignty of the people, and to the establishment of rules for the perpetual security of the rights of person and property, had the wisdom to adapt their language to future as well as existing emergencies; so that words competent to the then existing state of the community, and at the same time capable of being expanded to embrace more extensive relations, should not be restrained to their more obvious and immediate sense, if, consistently with the general object of the authors and the true principles of the compact, they can be extended to other relations and circumstances which an improved state of society may produce." The decision from which we have quoted applied these principles; and, because printing was, in law, writing, from a time before that when the Constitution was made, and because the use of printed votes was equally well calculated to avoid the evils which the framers of that instrument thought would attend elections if conducted by nomination and hand vote, or viva voce, the court held that printed votes were constitutional, although the uniform practice had been, for some fifty years, to use manuscript votes only. The same decision says further: "This requisition of written votes in the Constitution is confined to the choice of representatives. The important election of governor, senators, and councilors is left unprovided for in this respect, except by implication, and that implication does not exclude printed votes. The votes of all the different communities were to be sorted and counted, and a certificate of the result transmitted to a common focus, the secretary's office, where they were to be examined and compared. This process necessarily requires tickets or ballots, so that there was no occasion to require expressly that the votes should be in writing or in print. There can be no ground to exclude printed votes for these state officers, for all that is required is that they should be so given as that they may be sorted and counted."

Bearing in mind the statement of the Declaration of Rights that "all elections ought to be free," and also the general rules laid down in the case of Henshaw v. Foster, we have examined the published laws under which, during our colonial and provincial periods, and the interval between the Declaration of Independence and the inauguration of our present government, officers have been chosen or appointed. Without giving the citations, it is enough to say that such an examination shows that, while higher officers often were chosen by the casting of separate paper votes by the individual voters, some elections were made by the use of Indian corn and beans as ballots, and that as to much the greater number of officers chosen by the people there was no specific direction as to the manner in which the choice of the individual voter should be expressed; but representatives to the general court were selected by the voters in town, district, or plantation meetings, the votes being given under statutory directions as to the manner of voting contained in Prov. Stat. 1693-94, chap. 14. §§ 2, 6, 7 (1 Prov. Laws [state ed.] p. 147). These directions provide that no voter shall put in more than one vote for any one person, and that "all persons shall put in their votes unfolded to the selectmen or constables appointed to receive the same." These provisions plainly imply that the only legal method of voting for representatives under the provincial government was for each voter to put in his own separate written vote. An examination of the printed records of the town of Boston shows that this was the method there used up to 1780, and the only reason we have found for supposing that representatives to the general court of the province ever were chosen by nomination and hand vote, or viva voce, is the statement in the decision in Henshaw v. Foster [9 Pick.] at page 319, that "probably in some instances representatives had been so chosen." In most elections the votes given in at town meeting were not preserved after the declaration of the result in open meeting. But in the case of the nomination of magistrates or assistants under the Massachusetts Bay Colony charter, the votes cast in the meetings were there sealed up, and then carried to the shire towns, and from each shire town to Boston, where they were finally opened, and the result of the voting in the towns and plantations ascertained. And in the case of county treasurer and registers of deeds under the provincial government the votes given in by the individual voters at the town meetings were there sealed up, and taken to the court of sessions of the county, and opened and sorted in the presence of the justices by men appointed by them for the purpose, and the result thus ascertained in that court.

Interpreting the Constitution in the light of the circumstances existing at the time of its adoption, as well as of the laws and customs which had theretofore prevailed, we think that the language prescribing the way in which the will of the voters shall be expressed and ascertained in the case of the election of governor and of the other state officers, where similar language is used, necessarily implies at least that the choice of the voter shall be indicated by some kind of writing upon a paper or other material thing; that this material thing, bearing this written expression of the choice of the voter, shall, by his act of voting, pass from his possession and control into that of the officers charged with the duty of conducting the election, and that the voter shall have reasonable opportunity to see that it has so passed; that it shall be distinct from that handed in by any other voter; and that these written votes so handed in shall continue to be the same material things capable of being handled, sorted, and counted, and that the whole work of ascertaining and declaring the result shall be the personal act of the election officers, with the written votes before them; the sorting and counting, as well as the declaration of the result, being done by sworn officers. One reason for the requirement of a written vote is that the voter may have a reasonable opportunity of making his choice without immediate influence upon the part of others, and the reason for the requirements applicable to the sorting and counting is that the votes may not fail of their proper force by reason of mistake or fraud in the count. The safeguard erected by the Constitution is that there shall remain after the closing of the voting, in a material form, capable of being read and understood by men, a written vote cast by each voter; and that all these individual votes, each given by the voter to the election officers, shall be read, sorted, and counted in accordance with the several tenor of each, by men acting under the sanction and obligation of their respective official oaths.

So far as we have been informed as to the nature of the machines mentioned in your order, none of them provides for or allows the individual voter to have in his own hands a paper or other material thing bearing upon itself the expression of his choice; none of them allows him to cast or deposit in the custody of the election officers a paper or other material thing bearing such expression as his individual written vote; and none of them, upon the casting of the vote, or at the closing of the polls, places in the hands of the election officers a separate, material thing given in by the voter, which the officers can handle, sort, and count. None of them is so built and worked that the voter can know that, unless sworn officers err, or are false to their oaths, the choice which the Constitution commands him to express by "written vote" will be counted, and counted as he cast it. Yet to give him that certainty, and to give the state the safeguard which comes from his having that certainty is one purpose of the constitutional requirement of "written votes," "sorted and counted" in open meetings, so that each vote must have its legitimate weight in the election, unless an intelligent and responsible man fails in the performance of a simple, sworn duty. The turn of a wheel or of a dial, the punching of a hole in an unseen roll of paper on which are the names of candidates, by a voter who pulls a lever or turns a key, is not the use of a written vote, within the meaning of the Constitution; nor is the inspection of a dial, even if preceded or followed by an inspection of all the cogs and mechanism which have moved the hands of the dial, or the counting of holes in such a paper and the inspection of the machinery which made the holes, the sorting and counting of votes by election officers. If it be said that these are the best and most efficient means to secure a free and honest election, the answer is that they are not the means prescribed for those ends by the Constitution. The Constitution does not authorize the general court to put the expression of the voter's will to the chance of being nullified or perverted by slipping cogs, defective levers, or other mechanical devices which have no living intelligence, no conscience, and no liability to punishment to insure their going right. It requires that every step in the task of seeing that votes, whether given by Indian corn and beans or other ballots, by show of hands, by the living voice, or by paper writing, are counted rightly, shall be intrusted to and performed, not by an inanimate machine, but by sworn officers, and in open meeting, where each step of the work can be verified, and mistakes corrected.

In our opinion, the general court has not the right to authorize the use of the machines mentioned in your order at elections by the people of the governor, the lieutenant governor, the councilors, senators, and representatives, the secretary, the treasurer, and receiver general, the auditor, or the attorney general. A law of Congress requires votes for representatives in Congress to be by written or printed ballot or voting machine, the use of which has been duly authorized by state law. In our opinion, the general court has the right to authorize the use of machines referred to in your order in elections for representatives in the Congress of the United States. In the case of electors for President and Vice President, it might, perhaps, be different, although long usage has given to the manner in which they are now chosen almost the force of an inviolable sanction.

BREWER LUMBER COMPANY
v.
BOSTON & ALBANY RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The right of stoppage in transitu of a carload of lumber is not lost by the storage of the lumber by the carrier for failure to unload within the time required by its rules, when the freight charges remain unpaid, and the carrier has made no agreement to hold the property for the consignee.

NOTE.—As to delivery of part of a consignment of goods to defeat stoppage in transitu, see, in this series, Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Wis.) 33 L. R. A. 351.

As to right to stoppage in transitu in general, see Farrell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (N. C.) 3 L. R. A. 647, and note; Fenkhausen v. Fellows (Nev.) 4 L. R. A. 732, and note; and Kingman v. Denison (Mich.) 11 L. R. A. 347, and note.

2. Taking the purchaser's worthless notes in payment for goods shipped will not defeat the right of stoppage in transitu.
3. The negotiation of notes taken in payment for property shipped will not defeat the right of stoppage in transitu, if they are recovered and tendered back to the maker or his representative before the right is exercised.

(June 1, 1901.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after finding for plaintiff in an action brought to enforce the right of stoppage in transitu of certain lumber sold by plaintiff to George A. Paul. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. N. Hill, for plaintiff:

The plaintiff had the right of stoppage in transitu.

The possession of the defendant was unbroken. The retention of the lumber in a place of deposit, connected with its transmission and delivery, at the place the lumber is to go, does not terminate the transit.

Benjamin, Sales, 7th Am. ed. § 839; Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass. 275; Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 67; Durgy Cement & Umber Co. v. O'Brien, 123 Mass. 12; Kendall v. Marshall, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 364.

So long as the freight and storage remain unpaid there is a strong presumption that the carrier continues to hold the goods as carrier, and in no other capacity; and in order to rebut this presumption there must be some proof of an agreement between the carrier and the vendee, whereby the carrier becomes the agent of the buyer to keep the goods for him.

Giving the utmost effect to the general expression of Paul that he ordered it to be stored, when it was sure to be stored in the course of business, it shows an attempt of the vendee to change the capacity in which the defendant held possession, without its assent. Neither party can so change the relations of the other without an assent. These intents must concur, and there must be an affirmative agreement and something equivalent to an attornment on the part of the carrier, so that the property is held, not as carrier, but as agent of the purchaser.

Ex parte Barrow, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 783; Ex parte Cooper, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 68; Kemp v. Falk, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 573; James v. Griffin, 2 Mees. & W. 623; Jackson v. Nichol, 5 Bing. N. C. 508; Calahan v. Babcock, 21 Ohio St. 281, 8 Am. Rep. 63; Synns v. Schotten, 35 Kan. 310, 10 Pac. 828; Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. 93 Wis. 250, 33 L. R. A. 351, 67 N. W. 424; McLean v. Breithaupt, 12 Ont. App. Rep. 308.

This is a question of fact to be decided on all the evidence, of which there is sufficient to justify a finding that the defendant did not agree, and did not intend, to change its relations and hold the goods other than as carrier. This fact, having been found for the plaintiff, is not subject to revision by this court.

The notes given in settlement do not take away the right of stoppage in transitu.

Stubbs v. Lund, 7 Mass. 453, 5 Am. Dec. 63; Parks v. Hall, 2 Pick. 206; Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 33, 50 Am. Dec. 754; Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass. 275; Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 67; Re Batchelder, 2 Low. Dec. 245, Fed. Cas. No. 1,099; Atkins v. Colby, 20 N. H. 154; Clapp Bros. v. Sohmer, 55 Iowa, 273, 7 N. W. 639; Milliken v. Warren, 57 Me. 46.

Messrs. Frank Paul and Frederick F. Haskell, for defendant:

The plaintiff did not have the right to stop the lumber in transitu, because the plaintiff was not an "unpaid vendor."

Blackburn, Sales, 2d Eng. ed. p. 326; Benjamin, Sales, 1st Am. ed. § 835; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 906.

At the time when the plaintiff undertook to stop the lumber in transitu, the transit was at an end.

In the earlier cases it was thought that nothing but the actual delivery to the vendee would defeat the exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu; but this doctrine has been long abandoned.

Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. p. 603; Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. 43 N. H. 590.

Stoppage in transitu, as its name imports, can only take place while the goods are on their way; if they once arrive at the termination of their journey, and come into the actual or constructive possession of the consignee, there is an end to the vendor's right over them.

Blackburn, Sales, 2d Eng. ed. pp. 333, 334; Kendall v. Marshall, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 356; Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. 43 N. H. 590; Inslee v. Lane, 57 N. H. 459; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 908.

The goods are in transitu so long as they are in the hands of the carrier as such.

Benjamin, Sales, 1st Am. ed. §§ 841, 849; Blackburn, Sales, 2d Eng. ed. p. 335; Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. p. 602; Ex parte Rosewear China Clay Co. L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 570.

The goods have been constructively delivered to the vendee, and the transit is at an end, when the carrier ceases to hold them qua carrier, and enters into an agreement with the buyer to hold them as his agent or warehouseman.

Benjamin, Sales, 1st Am. ed. §§ 841, 849; Blackburn, Sales, 2d Eng. ed. pp. 364, 375; Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. p. 606; James v. Griffin, 1 Mees. & W. 20; Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 Mees. & W. 534; Nicholls v. Le Fœuvre, 2 Bing. N. C. 83; Bolton v. Law- cashire & Y. R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 431; Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. 43 N. H. 590; Inslee v. Lanc. 57 N. H. 459.

The agreement by the carrier to hold the goods for the consignee as his agent, for the purpose of custody on his account, may be implied, as from the course of dealing between the carrier and the consignee, as well as expressly made.

Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 Mees. & W. 534; Bolton v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 431; Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. 43 N. H. 590; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 908, 909.

It is not necessary that the freight charges should be paid before the carrier can agree to hold the goods as the agent of the consignee. His change of character into that of an agent to keep the goods is not at all inconsistent with his right to retain the goods in his custody till his lien upon them for carriage or freight charges is satisfied.

Benjamin, Sales, 1st Am. ed. § 853; Blackburn, Sales, 2d Eng. ed. p. 367; Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. p. 606.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us in a somewhat unsatisfactory manner. It is a report of a justice of the superior court, before whom the case was tried without a jury. The report sets forth certain facts, certain evidence, and requests for rulings by both parties, which were passed upon, and a general finding for the plaintiff, without any findings of specific facts. The report concludes as follows: "Upon the foregoing evidence the court found for the plaintiff, and now, with the assent of both parties, reports the case for the determination of the supreme judicial court, both parties agreeing that if, upon the foregoing evidence, the rulings and refusals to rule and finding were right, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff in accordance with the finding; otherwise, judgment is to be entered for the defendant." The word "evidence" is shown by another paragraph in the report to include statements of facts, documentary evidence, and testimony of witnesses. As this is an action at law, the only question can be whether the evidence warranted the finding. We have no right, if the testimony of witnesses is conflicting, to decide the case upon a view of the testimony which we might take if the evidence were before us for our decision. The action is replevin of a car load of lumber sold by the plaintiff to George A. Paul, a lumber dealer at Boston, and forwarded by the plaintiff, over the defendant's railroad, from East Saginaw, Michigan, to him. The plaintiff claimed the lumber by reason of the exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu, and the action was defended by the trustee in bankruptcy of Paul. The lumber was sold on January 26, 1898, for the sum of $678.28, Paul to pay the freight, and to deduct it from the amount of the invoice. The terms of the payment were to be 2 per cent off for cash, if paid within ten days, or a three months note from date of invoice. On January 31, 1898, the lumber was duly shipped, consigned to Paul, and the invoice forwarded to him. On February 19, 1898, the lumber arrived at the Huntington avenue yard of the defendant in Boston, and Paul was notified of the fact by the agent of the defendant by a postal card, which, in addition to the notice of the arrival of the car, contained the following: "If not unloaded within ninety-six hours from February 19, 6 o'clock P. M. of this date, Sundays and legal holidays not included, the freight will be subject to storage charges, as per rules of the Massachusetts and New Hampshire Car Service Association." On March 4, 1898, the defendant stored the lumber in one of its sheds at its Huntington avenue yard, and notified Paul of the fact. On March 10, 1898, Paul sent a promissory note for $300, dated the same day, and payable to the plaintiff's order at any bank in Boston. This note was indorsed by the plaintiff payable to order of Second National Bank, and under the name of the plaintiff were the letters "B. D." This note was protested on June 10, 1898. On March 11, 1898, the plaintiff sent a letter to Paul, stating that it had placed the $300 note to his credit, and calling his attention to the fact that the date of the note, March 10, was not in accordance with the contract, which called for a three-months note from the date of the invoice, and requested a settlement for the balance. On March 26, 1898, Paul sent the plaintiff a promissory note for $313.68, dated that day, and payable to the order of the plaintiff at any bank in Boston. This note was indorsed in the same way as the other, and it was protested on June 28, 1898. These notes, the report states, were sent to the plaintiff in payment for the full value of the lumber, with interest added from the date of the invoice to the dates of the notes, less freight, which was to be deducted from the amount of the invoice. On receipt of the second of the notes, the plaintiff sent to Paul a statement of account dated January 31, 1898, stating the terms of sale, the items of the lumber, and the amount due less freight, being $607.61. Across the face of the paper was written: "Received settlement as follows: 3 mos. note from March 10/98, $300.00; 3 mos. note from March 28/98, $313.68,—$613.68." This paper also contained a request for the freight receipt, which was not sent, nor was the freight paid by Paul. On April 9, 1898, Paul made a common-law assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors, and the assignee accepted the trust. The plaintiff was notified of the assignment, and a representative of the plaintiff attended the first meeting of Paul's creditors. On April 16, 1898, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant not to deliver the lumber to Paul, and requested the defendant to keep it on storage for it, claiming the right of stoppage in transitu. On July 27, 1898, the plaintiff's attorney tendered the notes of March 10th and March 28th to Paul's assignee, who refused to receive them; and at the trial of this case they were again tendered and refused. This action was brought on August 30, 1898, and before obtaining the lumber the plaintiff was obliged to pay the defendant its claim for freight and storage. We find it unnecessary to state the testimony of witnesses at this point, though we shall refer to some of it hereafter. There being no contention that Paul was not insolvent, the principal questions of law in the case are whether the transit had ended, and what the effect was of giving and receiving the notes.

1. As to the first question, we are of opinion that the transit was not ended when the plaintiff asserted its right to the lumber. It makes no difference whether the goods are in the hands of the carrier qua carrier, or whether he puts them, at the journey's end, in a warehouse. In other words, the transit does not terminate until the goods arrive in the possession, actual or constructive, of the purchaser. Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass. 272, 275; Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 67; Dingy Cement & Umber Co. v. O'Brien, 123 Mass. 12; Inslee v. Lane, 57 N. H. 454. So long as the carrier, or a warehouseman acting for him, is in possession of the goods, he has a lien for the freight or other charges. The purchaser is not in possession or entitled to possession until he discharges the liens, and the right of stoppage in transitu remains. See Benjamin, Sales, 7th Am. ed. 914 (2), and cases cited. While the position of the carrier may be changed to that of bailee or agent for the purchase of the goods, yet that is a question of an agreement between the carrier and the purchaser. Jackson v. Nichol, 5 Bing. N. C. 508; James v. Griffin, 2 Mees. & W. 623; Ex parte Barrow, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 783; Ex parte Cooper, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 68; Kemp v. Falk, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 573, 584; McLean v. Breithaupt, 12 Ont. App. Rep. 383; Calahan v. Babcock, 21 Ohio St. 281, 8 Am. Rep. 63; Jeffrie v. Fitchburg R. Co. 93 Wis. 250, 33 L. R. A. 351, 67 N. W. 424; Symms v. Schotten, 35 Kan. 310, 10 Pac. 828. In the case before us an attempt was made by the trustee in bankruptcy to show that such an agreement was made, but the testimony of Paul falls far short of this. He testified that within a few days after receiving the postal card of February 19th he telephoned to the defendant to store the lumber. He was then asked, "What did they say to you?" and his answer was, "'All right,' or something to that effect." He was then asked, "Will you say that they said anything?" and answered: "They probably said 'All right.' They might say 'Yes, all right,' or something like that." He was again asked, "What did they say?" and answered, "I don't know." On redirect examination he testified that he did not know whether he received any reply to his telephone message, and, in answer to the next question but one testified that he did receive a reply. It seems to us that the judge might well disregard this testimony as too uncertain and vague for consideration. But, if it was to be taken into consideration, the testimony of Turner, the freight agent of the defendant in charge of the Huntington avenue yard, was contradictory to that of Paul. He testified that he remembered the car of lumber, and stored it in the ordinary course of business; and that he received no directions from anyone to store it. If the testimony of Paul can be said to contradict this, it was for the judge sitting without a jury to decide what the fact was. We are therefore of opinion that the judge rightly refused to rule, as requested by the defendant, that the plaintiff had lost the right of stoppage in transitu, or had not seasonably exercised that right. It follows, from what we have said, that the third ruling given at the request of the plaintiff was correct. This ruling was as follows: "The storage of the lumber in question by the defendant, whether according to the custom of storing after the expiration of the limit of time set forth in the notice given by the defendant to the consignee, or in accordance with the notice to store given by the consignee, does not terminate the transit, without evidence of the attornment by the defendant to the consignee, or an agreement to hold as the agent of the consignee." The fourth ruling given was as follows: "The existence of the defendant's lien for the unpaid freight raises the presumption that the defendant continued to hold the merchandise as carrier, and, in order to rebut this presumption, there must be some proof of some agreement or arrangement between the defendant and Paul, whereby the defendant, while retaining its lien, became the agent of Paul to keep the goods for him." While we do not think that this ruling is well expressed, we are of opinion that no harm was done in giving it. We have already stated the law bearing on this subject, and need not repeat it. The undisputed facts in the case showed that the defendant was holding the lumber for the freight and other charges; and it made no difference whether the goods remained in the car or in the warehouse, unless there was proof of some agreement or arrangement whereby the defendant became the agent of Paul. Taking the ruling as a whole, we are of opinion that it means no more than this.

2. The next question is as to the effect of the giving of the notes. The instructions requested by the defendant on this point are the first and second, and are as follows: "(1) If the consignee, intending to pay for the lumber according to agreement, gave to the plaintiff his negotiable promissory notes, dated at Boston, Massachusetts, and payable on time at said Boston, and thereupon the plaintiff receipted its bill for the lumber, and there was no agreement that said notes were accepted as conditional payment, then the law presumes that such notes were given and accepted as absolute payment, and in that case the plaintiff is not an unpaid vendor, and has no further right on the lumber, and must seek his remedy on the notes. (2) The notes constituted a contract to be construed according to the law of Massachusetts. It is the law of Massachusetts that a negotiable promissory note, given in payment of an obligation, is to be deemed to be given and taken as absolute payment of such obligation, in the absence of evidence that the parties intended it to operate only as a conditional payment." On these requests the judge ruled "that, while the rules of law in the first and second requests were correct as general statements, they did not, on the evidence, require a finding for the defendant." The rule in Massachusetts, in simple contract debts, is that a promissory note given by a debtor to his creditor is presumed to be a payment; that the presumption is one of fact, and not of law, which may be rebutted and controlled by evidence that such was not the intention of the parties. In Curtis v. Hubbard, 9 Met. 322, 328, it is said by Chief Justice Shaw: "The rule adopted in Massachusetts that a negotiable promissory note, given for a simple contract debt, shall be deemed payment, is to be taken with considerable qualification. It is founded on the consideration that, when a note is given for goods, even if it is not negotiated, it is equally convenient to the creditor (and generally more so) to sue on the note, as on the original consideration, and so there is no reason for considering the original simple contract as still subsisting and in force; and therefore a presumption arises that it was intended by the parties that the note should be deemed a satisfaction. But this is a presumption of fact, which may be rebutted by evidence showing that it was not so intended, and the fact that such presumption would deprive the party . . . of a substantial benefit has a strong tendency to show that it was not so intended." In a late case the reason of the rule was stated to be for the protection of the debtor, who might otherwise be compelled to pay both the note and the debt; and it is further said: "But full protection is given to him if, in the proceedings to enforce the original debt, it is shown that he has not paid the note, and that it is then owned by the creditor, and if it is surrendered in court for the benefit of the maker." Davis v. Parsons, 157 Mass. 584, 588, 32 N. E. 1117. It is obvious that the rule can have little or no application where a person has a lien, which is a valuable right; and that the court would be slow to deprive a lien creditor of the right to enforce his claim on the ground that he had taken a worthless negotiable promissory note, where the note was produced at the trial, and tendered to the maker, or to his representative, whether the above-mentioned reasons for the rule are the final ones or not. Thus, in Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 33, 50 Am. Dec. 754, a vendor's lien at common law was enforced, notwithstanding a promissory note was given, and also a receipt for the price; and it was said by Chief Justice Shaw that a lien for the price is incident to the contract of sale; that, when a credit is given, the vendee has a right to the possession of the goods, and, if he does so, the lien is gone. It was then added: "But the law, in holding that a vendor, who has thus given credit for goods, waives his lien for the price, does so on one implied condition, which is that the vendee shall keep his credit good. If, therefore, before payment, the vendee become bankrupt or insolvent, and the vendor still retain the custody of the goods, or any part of them; or if the goods are in the hands of a carrier or middleman on their way to the vendee, and have not yet got into his actual possession, and the vendor, before they do so, can regain his actual possession by a stoppage in transitu then his lien is restored, and he may hold the goods as security for the price." In respect to the contention that the note was payment it was said: "We think the answer is that a promissory note, even if in form negotiable, whilst it remains in the hands of the vendor, and not negotiated, but ready to be delivered upon the discharge of the lien, is regarded as the evidence in writing of a promise to pay for the goods purchased, and does not vary the rights of the parties." If this is true of a vendor's lien, it is equally true of the right of stoppage in transitu, which is merely an extension of the vendor's lien. Grout v. Hill, 4 Gray, 361, 366, per Shaw, Ch. J. See also 1 Parsons, Maritime Law, 340, and cases cited in note 2. In Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass. 272, the goods were to be paid for by a draft at three days' sight. The draft was accepted, but was not paid, and it was held that neither the acceptance of the draft nor the sending to the purchasers of an account, in which they were credited with the draft, prevented the plaintiffs from stopping the goods in transitu. To the same effect is Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 67. See also Re Batchelder, 2 Low. Dec. 245, 248, Fed. Cas. No. 1,099.

There is some contention on the part of the trustee in bankruptcy that the notes were negotiated. There was no evidence in the case to show the meaning of the letters "B. D.," and the fact that the notes were indorsed by the plaintiff to the order of the Second National Bank is not important. Whether they were sent to that bank for collection, or were discounted by it, is immaterial. They were not paid by Paul, and were tendered by the plaintiff to the common-law assignee, and to the trustee in bankruptcy. The fact that the plaintiff was then in possession of the notes, and tendered them, is all that is required. Davis v. Parsons, 157 Mass. 584, 588, 32 N. E. 1117. It follows that the second ruling requested by the plaintiff, as modified by the judge, was rightly given. This ruling, so modified, was as follows: "That the giving of the two notes in payment for the lumber according to the agreement, while in form negotiable, does not prevent the right of stoppage in transitu, as they remained in the hands of the vendor, and ready to be delivered up." Nor do we regard it of importance that on receipt of the last note the plaintiff sent to Paul a statement of the account between them. The report does not show that this statement was signed by the plaintiff. But, if it were so signed, the case would stand no stronger for the defendant than if the statement had been, "Received payment by two notes." Then the case would have fallen within the case of Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 33, 34, 50 Am. Dec. 754. See also Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass. 272, 273.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

W. W. WRIGHT, Appt.,

v.

J. E. WALLER.

(.....Ala.....)

A note is not rendered void by the fact that at the time of signing it the maker is voluntarily intoxicated, merely to the extent that he cannot give proper attention to it,—that attention that a reasonably prudent man would be able to give.

(November 27, 1900.)

NOTE.—As to validity of contract made with intoxicated person.

- I. Degree of intoxication.
- II. Taking advantage of intoxicated person.
- III. Fraud.
- IV. Intoxication produced by the other party.
- V. Ratification.
- VI. Habitual drunkards.
- VII. As affecting a bona fide holder of note.
- VIII. Implied contracts.
- IX. Obtaining relief.
- X. Who may show intoxication of party.
- XI. Summary.

I. Degree of intoxication.

In WRIGHT v. WALLER it is held that a man may plead his own drunkenness in avoidance of his contract. But in accordance with the weight of authority, it must be shown that he was incapable of exercising judgment, of understanding the proposed engagement, and of knowing what he was about when he entered into the contract, or else it will be held binding.

The weight of authority at the present day is that a party may plead his intoxication in avoidance of a contract. There is some variance as to what degree the intoxication must reach in order to avoid the contract, although the courts do not often discuss the degree. The decisions, which hold that drunkenness avoids the contract, frequently state the condition of the party in that case on which the holding is made. On this matter they differ somewhat, and in the following cases holding that drunkenness avoids the contract the rule as to the condition of the party is stated as follows:

Drunk. Hyman v. Moore, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 416; Wigglesworth v. Steers, 1 Hen. & M. 70, 3 Am. Dec. 602; Rich v. Sydenham, 1 Ch. Cas. 202.

Intoxicated. Conant v. Jackson, 16 Vt. 335; Fenton v. Holloway, 1 Starkie, 126; Wilmurt v. Morgan (N. J. Eq.) March, 1827.

In a state of thorough intoxication. Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 306.

In a state of complete intoxication. Burroughs v. Richman, 13 N. J. L. 233, 23 Am. Dec. 717; Pitt v. Smith, 3 Campb. 33.

In a constant state of intoxication. Staats v. Freeman, 6 N. J. Eq. 490.

In a state of absolute and total drunkenness. Erskine, Inst. 814, 815.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lee County in favor of defendant in an action on a rent note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Barnes & Duke, for appellant:

A contract made by a person so destitute of reason as not to know the consequences of his contract, though his incompetency is produced by intoxication, is voidable, and may be avoided by himself, though the intoxication is voluntary, and not procured by the circumvention of the other party.

So drunk as not to know the nature of the acts he was doing. Hawkins v. Bone, 4 Fost. & F. 311.

So drunk that he did not know what he did. Cole v. Robins, Bull. N. P. 172a.

Incapable of comprehending what he was doing. Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75, 58 Am. Rep. 848, 80 N. W. 290.

Intoxicated with liquor, and incapable of contracting. Reynolds v. Waller, 1 Wash. (Va.) 164.

So intoxicated as to render him incompetent to contract. Cummings v. Henry, 10 Ind. 109.

So intoxicated that he was wholly void of judgment and discretion. Cavender v. Waddingham, 2 Mo. App. 551; French v. French, 8 Ohio, 214.

Absolute drunkenness, and consequently deprived of the exercise of reason. Stair, July 29th, 1672, Lord Hatton, Pitt v. Smith, 3 Campb. 34, note; Drummond v. Hopper, 4 Harr. (Del.) 327; Hale v. Stery, 7 Colo. App. 165, 42 Pac. 598.

If carried so far that the reasoning power is destroyed. Birdsong v. Birdsong, 2 Head, 289.

From excessive intoxication is deprived the use of his reason, so that he is incapable of giving his serious, deliberate consent to the act. Donelson v. Posey, 13 Ala. 752.

So excessively drunk that he is utterly deprived of the use of reason, and understanding. 1 Fonblanque, Eq. 67; Johnson v. Phifer, 6 Neb., 401.

So drunk as to be without reason and understanding; so destitute of reason as not to know the consequences of this contract. Bush v. Breinig, 113 Pa. 310, 57 Am. Rep. 469, 6 Atl. 86.

When such intemperance produces a deprivation of reason and understanding. Clifton v. Davia, 1 Para. Sel. Eq. Cas. 31.

So intoxicated as to be deprived of the exercise of his understanding. Barrett v. Buxton, 2 Alk. (Vt.) 167, 16 Am. Dec. 691.

If the party was in such a condition of mind that he could not comprehend what were the terms and conditions of the instrument. Harmon v. Johnston, 1 MacArth. 139.

So drunk as to be unable to perceive or assent to its conditions. Wade v. Colvert, 2 Mill, Const. 27, 12 Am. Dec. 652.

Intoxicated to such a degree as to render him incapable of assenting. Longhead v. B. F. Combs & B. Commission Co. 64 Mo. App. 559.

Bush v. Breitw., 113 Pa. 310, 57 Am. Rep. 469, 6 Atl. 86.

A contract entered into by a person who is so drunk as not to know what he is doing is voidable only, and not void.

Carpenter v. Rodgers, 61 Mich. 384, 28 N. W. 156; Story, Sales, § 15; Benjamin, Sales, § 43; Bishop, Contr. § 304; Caulkins v. Fry, 35 Conn. 170; Van Wyck v. Brasher, 81 N. Y. 260; Warnock v. Campbell, 25 N. J. Eq. 485; French v. French, 8 Ohio, 214, 31 Am. Dec. 441; Noel v. Karper, 53 Pa. 97; Dulany v. Green, 4 Harr. (Del.) 285; Cummings v. Henry, 10 Ind. 109; Reynolds v. Waller, 1 Wash. (Va.) 164; Menkins v. Lightner, 18 Ill. 282; Taylor v. Patrick, 1 Bibb, 168; Broadwater v. Darne, 10 Mo. 277; Hutchinson v. Brown, Clarke, Ch. 408; Story, Contr. 27, 28; Chitty, Contr. 153, 164.

Absence of capacity for any deliberate consent. Clifton v. Davis, 1 Para. Sel. Eq. Cas. 31.

To such an extent as to be incapacitated to contract. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 109 Ill. 120.

From habitual intoxication and being almost incessantly under the influence of liquor, or from debility of body and mind arising from a long fit of intoxication from which he was then just recovering, and incapable of transacting business with discretion. Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. 346, 22 Am. Dec. 519.

So debilitated by intoxication as to be unable to sit up in bed and to hold a pen or make a mark unless the pen and hand are held for him. Wilson v. Bigger, 7 Watts & S. 111.

After a party has been on a prolonged drunk, and at a time when he was beginning to recover therefrom, and while he was still in bed, fevered and feeble in body, and his mind clouded, dimmed, and unsettled. Franks v. Jones, 39 Kan. 236, 17 Pac. 663.

Under the influence of liquor, and while in that condition was induced by the plaintiff to purchase goods, and that defendant has no recollection of having purchased the same. Sour Mash Distilling Co. v. Cavanagh, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 373.

Both minds must meet in order to make a deed valid, and if one is so weak, unsound, and diseased that the party is incapable of understanding the nature and quality of the act to be performed, or its consequences, he is incompetent to assent to the terms and conditions of the instrument, whether that state of his mind was produced by mental or physical disease, and whether it resulted from ordinary sickness, or from accident, or from debauchery, or from habitual and protracted intemperance. Johnson v. Harmon, 94 U. S. 371, 24 L. ed. 271.

In Conant v. Jackson, 16 Vt. 335, the court held: "The principles on which courts of equity, as well as courts of law, proceed in relation to the effect of intoxication in affecting contracts, have evidently undergone a considerable alteration. In the time of Lord Coke a party could not set up intoxication in avoidance of his contract. Afterwards it was considered that it could not be set up unless it was procured by the other party; but now it seems to be determined that, if a person was so intoxicated as to be incapable of the exercise of his understanding, he may avoid a contract made while in that state. Equity will not lend its aid to enforce a deed, or contract, obtained from a man when intoxicated; and, in relation to persons whose minds are prostrated by a course of intoxication, and who have become stupefied from previous inebriation, so as to be incapable of 54 L. R. A.

To render the transaction voidable he who sets up intoxication as a defense should have been so drunk as to have drowned reason, memory, and judgment, and impaired his mental faculties to an extent that would render him non compos mentis for the time being,—especially where there is no pretense that any person connected with the transaction aided in or procured his drunkenness.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 775; Bates v. Bates, 72 Ill. 108; Birdsong v. Birdsong, 2 Head, 289.

At the time of making the contract the party seeking to avoid it must have been in such a state of drunkenness as not to know what he was doing.

Johns v. Fritchey, 39 Md. 258.

The proof must show insanity.

Schramm v. O'Connor, 98 Ill. 541; Miller judging upon the propriety of what they do, a court of equity will make a strict examination as to whether the instrument does not contain evidence that advantage was taken of those habits."

The rule at civil law is stated by 1 Pothier, Obligations on Contracts, 49: "It is evident that drunkenness, when it goes so far as absolutely to destroy the reason, renders a person in this state, so long as it continues, incapable of contracting, since it renders him incapable of consent."

In Burroughs v. Richman, 18 N. J. L. 233, 23 Am. Dec. 717, the court said: "There are respectable authorities on both sides of this question. Lord Coke observes that, although he who is drunk is for the time non compos mentis, yet his drunkenness does not extenuate his act or offense, nor turn to his avail; but it is a great offense in itself, and therefore aggravates his offense, and doth not derogate from the act which he did at that time; and that as well in cases touching his life, his lands, his goods, or anything that concerns him. Beverley's Case, 4 Coke, 124."

Under Henry VI. this way of reasoning (that a party shall not be allowed to disable himself by pleading his own incapacity because he cannot know what he did under such a situation) was seriously adopted by the judges in argument, upon a question whether the heir was barred of his right of entry by the feoffment of his insane ancestor. And from these loose authorities, which Fitzherbert does not scruple to reject as being contrary to reason, the maxim that a man shall not stultify himself hath been handed down as settled law; though later opinions, feeling the inconvenience of the rule, have in many points endeavored to restrain it. 2 Bl. Com. 292.

In some cases relief, claimed on the ground of intoxication, was denied where the degree of intoxication was not sufficient to show a want of capacity to contract. The degree required in such cases is stated in various ways as follows:

Drunkenness to such a degree as to deprive a party of the power of distinctly perceiving and assenting to a contract. Lee v. Ware, 1 Hill, L. 313.

Drunkenness, to afford a ground for avoiding a contract, must be so excessive as to render the person incapable of consent, or, for the time, to incapacitate him from exercising his judgment. Reynolds v. Dechaums, 24 Tex. 174, 76 Am. Dec. 101.

He must show such a state of drunkenness as not to know what he was doing. Johns v.

v. Finley, 26 Mich. 249, 12 Am. Rep. 306; 1 Chitty, Contr. 11th ed. p. 192; Reynolds v. Dechaums, 24 Tex. 174, 76 Am. Dec. 101; Henry v. Ritenour, 31 Ind. 136.

Messrs. William H. Thomas and C. O. L. Samford for appellee.

McClellan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by Wright against Waller on a contract in writing signed by the latter to pay rent. Defendant sought to avoid the contract on the ground that he was intoxicated when he signed it. There was evidence tending to show that defendant was in a state "of complete drunkenness, dethroning reason, when he signed the paper," and, on the other hand, there was evidence tending to show that he was not drunk at the time. There was no evidence that plaintiff had anything to do with bringing about defendant's intoxicated condition, if he was intoxicated, nor that defendant's mind was impaired by habitual drunkenness, nor that the contract was in itself unconscionable or unfair. On this state of case, the court, in its general charge, said: "If the defendant was so much under the influence of strong drink or intoxicating liquor that his reason was dethroned to an extent that he could not give that attention to the signing of the note that a reasonably prudent man would be able to give, then the note would be void." And at the request of the defendant the court gave the following charge: "If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant signed the note under such intoxication that he could not give proper attention to it, then the note is not evidence in the case, but void." To each of these instructions

It is only where one is so completely intoxicated as to be incapable of knowing what he is doing, or of understanding the consequences of his acts, that his contracts, entered into while in that state, are rendered void. Taylor v. Purcell, 60 Ark. 606, 31 S. W. 567.

It must appear that he was so greatly under the influence of liquor as to be incapable of knowing the effect of what he was doing. Shackleton v. Seebree, 86 Ill. 616; Foot v. Tewksbury, 2 Vt. 97.

It must appear that the party was in such a condition that he was incapable of understanding the nature of the transaction in which he was engaged. Watson v. Doyle, 130 Ill. 415, 22 N. E. 613; Rodman v. Zillee, 1 N. J. Eq. 820.

It must be shown to exist to such extent as to seriously impair the reasoning faculties at the time of the contract. Pickett v. Sutter, 5 Cal. 412.

Deprived of his right reason or incapable of managing his affairs and business. Doughty v. Doughty, 7 N. J. Eq. 643, Reversing Id. 227.

A drunkard is incompetent to contract only when his understanding is clouded, or reason dethroned, by actual intoxication. Wright v. Fisher, 65 Mich. 275, 32 N. W. 605.

Intoxication will not relieve a party from a recognition where the drunkenness is not such as to deprive the ball of his reason and understanding. Com. v. McAnany, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 292.

They were bound to prove the drunkenness to have been so great as to produce an absolute privation of understanding for the time, similar to cases of idioy or insanity. Harblson v. Lemon, 3 Blackf. 51, 23 Am. Dec. 376.

The law does not visit the follies of drunken men upon innocent parties, nor does it excuse one who voluntarily becomes intoxicated from the performance of his contracts entered into while in that state, unless he can prove that he was at the time in fact non compos mentis. Davidge v. Crandall, 23 Ill. App. 360.

It should appear that he was so drunk as to have drowned reason, memory, and judgment, and impaired his mental faculties to an extent that would render him non compos mentis for the time being. Bates v. Ball, 72 Ill. 108.

It must be shown that drunkenness was so excessive as to utterly deprive the grantor of his reason and understanding. Belcher v. Belcher, 10 Yerg. 121.

Such excitement and drunkenness must be excessive and absolute, so as to suspend the reason and create impotence of mind at the time 54 L. R. A.

of entering into the contract. Cavender v. Waddingham, 5 Mo. App. 457.

Evidence of general intemperate habits of the grantor about the time the deed was signed is insufficient where the signature to the deed was in a clear, firm hand. Guckavan v. Kenney, 4 Kulp, 411 (1887) Woodward, J.

Evidence that seven months after the execution of a mortgage the mortgagor was adjudged insane, and that at the time of executing the mortgage he was in the habit of becoming intoxicated and had acted indiscreetly and improperly, is not sufficient to sustain the defense of mental incapacity where his signature to the mortgage is firm and steady. O'Neill v. Nolan, 50 N. Y. S. R. 641, 21 N. Y. Supp. 222.

It must be shown that the grantor was incapable of making the deed, either by reason of the weak state of his intellect, or by reason of intoxication. Conley v. Nailor, 118 U. S. 127, 30 L. ed. 112, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1001.

A contract to purchase land will not be set aside for insanity, caused by drunkenness of the purchaser, if he was rational and competent to transact ordinary business. Schramm v. O'Connor, 98 Ill. 539.

In the following cases the evidence did not establish sufficient intoxication to invalidate the contract:

Considerably in liquor is no reason for the court refusing a decree for specific performance. Lightfoot v. Heron, 3 Younge & C. Exch. 536.

Considerably excited by drink, but it did not appear that this amounted to incapacity. Hutchinson v. Brown, Clarke, Ch. 408.

The defendant was conscious of his condition, and knew what he was doing at the time. Duker v. Franz, 7 Bush, 276, 3 Am. Rep. 314.

The evidence did not show that he was under the immediate influence of liquor when the contract was executed. Keeler v. Baker, 1 Helsk. 639.

The fact that one of the parties to an agreement was addicted to drunkenness will not invalidate the agreement where he was sober and in possession of all his faculties at the time it was made. Keough v. Foreman, 33 La. Ann. 1434.

A contract will not be set aside where the weight of evidence clearly shows that the party executing the same was not drunk or otherwise incapacitated, and no improper conduct is chargeable to the other party, and the bargain was not unconscionable. Loftus v. Maloney, 89 Va. 576, 16 S. E. 749.

In Martin v. Pycroft, 2 De G. M. & G. 785, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 94, 16 Jur. 1.125, which was a bill for specific performance of an agreement the plaintiff excepted, and their soundness vel non is the question presented on this appeal. On this question as to the degree of intoxication necessary to an avoidance of contracts the following are some of the statements of the governing principle, applicable to cases like this, found in the authorities: ". . . Intoxication so deep as to take away the agreeing mind—in other words, to disqualify the mind to comprehend the subject of the contract and its nature and probable consequences—impairs such contract, if made while it lasts, the same as insanity. But mere drunkenness, or being a drunkard, or simply being drunk at the time, where the intoxication does not extend to the degree thus stated, will not impair the contract. To have this effect, it must render the party non compos mentis for the occasion." Bishop, Contr. §§ 980, of lease, the defense of intoxication of the obligor was not established.

A bill of sale made by a party while he was intoxicated, to his father-in-law, will not be set aside where the party making the same was sufficiently sober to know what he was doing, and the bill of sale was made without the fraudulent procurement of the purchaser. Morris v. Nixon, 7 Humph. 579. In this case it was said that, as the evidence showed the father-in-law had taken the bill of sale to preserve the property, and had paid the grantor's debts out of the same, it would be held on a proper showing that the conveyance was made upon a trust, and that a decree of accounting and a settlement on the daughter and children would be made if they were before the court.

Where a man of weak intellect and habitual drunkenness, on the day of his marriage conveyed his real estate to his brother and made a bill of sale to him after his marriage, it was held that the deed and bill of sale were made with a secret trust, but without fraud, and they were set aside. Rutherford v. Ruff, 4 Desauss. Eq. 365. In this case the court said: "I do not believe he was drunk when he executed this deed, but from many parts of the evidence it is clear there was an understanding between him and his brother, and that the deed was accompanied with a secret trust."

II. Taking advantage of intoxicated person.

A contract made with an intoxicated person is invalid where there is an undue advantage taken of him by reason of the intoxication. This is on the ground that such a contract stands on the same footing as though obtained by fraud. Courts will enforce this rule, even where they decline to follow the cases that hold contracts void that are made with an intoxicated person. The following cases adopt the rule that a contract will be held invalid where advantage is taken of the contracting party by reason of his being intoxicated.

A settlement made where one of the parties was overreached while in such a mental condition from the use of alcoholic spirits as made him an easy victim will not be conclusive upon the party so overreached. Murray v. Carlin, 67 Ill. 286. The court said: "The evidence presented a fair question to the jury, whether plaintiff was not overreached by the alleged settlement, whilst in such mental condition from the use of ardent spirits as made him an easy victim."

And equity will set aside a contract to purchase land, made by an intoxicated person, where advantage is taken of his situation by §4 L. R. A.

981. "The contract of a . . . drunken person is voidable, at his option, if it can be shown that at the time of making the contract he was absolutely incapable of understanding what he was doing." Anson, Contr. p. 150. "An express contract, entered into when the obligor is in a state of intoxication, so as to deprive him of the exercise of his understanding, is voidable." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 773. Drunkenness must "be such as to incapacitate the party from the proper exercise of his judgment, and prevent him from understanding his contract." Story, Contr. p. 15. "A drunkard, when in a state of complete intoxication, so as not to know what he is doing, has no capacity to contract." 1 Benjamin, Sales, § 30. "It is evident that drunkenness, when it goes so far as absolutely to destroy the reason, renders a per-the vendor, who induces him to purchase the land at an excessive price, and no time for reflection, or to become sober, is allowed until the contract is closed. Hotchkiss v. Fortson, 7 Yerg. 67. In this case the purchaser paid more than the land was worth, and took a title bond. His heirs after his death were allowed to defend against a judgment obtained against the administrator of the purchaser.

In Birdsong v. Birdsong, 2 Head, 280, the court said: "Contracts made by persons under the influence of liquor, without being completely intoxicated, are governed by the same principles which apply in other cases, where one party is in a position to expose him to the exercise of an improper influence by the other." And again: "If a party has been led into a hard and disadvantageous bargain, while excited by liquor, equity avoids it. And the same rule applies to persons whose minds are enfeebled by habitual intoxication, although not actually intoxicated."

A conveyance obtained from the grantor while weak and sick, and under the influence of opiates and liquor, will be set aside where undue advantage is taken of the grantor's condition and the consideration is inadequate. The grantor will be required to reimburse the defendant for the consideration paid. Nielson v. Laffin, 50 N. Y. S. R. 277, 21 N. Y. Supp. 731.

And a contract of lease was held void where advantage was taken of the lessor's habits of intoxication, although he knew what he was doing at the time, but executed the lease for an inadequate rent on coming of age, and the lessee had been in the habit of supplying him with liquor. Say v. Barwick, 1 Ves. & B. 195.

A deed procured by undue means, the grantor being addicted to intemperance, will be declared void where the grantor was in a state of mental and physical imbecility, the result of long-continued intemperance, and the grantee from day to day ministered to his passion for strong drink. Adams v. Ryerson, 6 N. J. Eq. 328.

And a conveyance will be set aside where the grantor has been grossly intemperate so long that his mind has become greatly enfeebled in consequence thereof, and he is unacquainted with business except of the simplest kind, and the grantee imposes upon his ignorance to obtain the conveyance. Lavette v. Sage, 29 Conn. 577.

A deed for an inadequate consideration, obtained from grantors of extreme old age, weakness, and imbecility, while they were influenced by liquor, will be set aside by a decree in equity, and the grantors will be required to restore the consideration. Harvey v. Pecks, 1 Munf. 518.

Equity will relieve against a conveyance made son in this state, so long as it continues, incapable of contracting, since it renders him incapable of consent." 1 Pothier, Obligations on Contracts, 49. "Where a party, when he enters into a contract, is in such a state of drunkenness as not to know what he is doing . . . his contract is wholly void," i. e., if he elects to avoid it. 1 Chitty, Contr. 192. "Drunkenness is a species of insanity, but the law is not quite clear respecting this disability. Perhaps it stands thus: One cannot defend by proving his drunkenness, unless he can show that the drunkenness was known to the payee, and taken advantage of by him, or that it was complete, and superseded all use of the mind at the time." 1 Parsons, Notes & Bills, 151. Intoxication, "to the extent only that he [the party] did not clearly understand the business" in hand, "is not enough, however, to render his contract voidable or void." Henry v. Ritenour, 31 Ind. 136. "It is also urged that the plaintiff in error is not bound by the transaction, because he was drunk at the time he assigned the note. We think the evidence shows that he was at the time drunk. . . . But he was manifestly not so drunk but he knew what he was engaged in at the time. He, on the trial, testified to the circumstances attending the transaction. He says he took out the note and threw it down, and told them to take it, and that they had better take his clothes. Had he been so drunk as to render the assignment void, he could not have known or remembered what he did. To render the transaction voidable, he should have been so drunk as to have drowned reason, memory, and judgment, and impaired his mental faculties to an ex-without consideration; and when the grantor, through intoxication, was, to the grantee's knowledge, not himself. But, under the circumstances, complainant was not entitled to costs. Warnock v. Campbell, 25 N. J. Eq. 485. In this case the court said: "A court of equity will hear a party who seeks relief against his own act, on the ground of intoxication, though formerly such hearing was denied. To avoid a contract on the ground of intoxication, it must be shown, either that the intoxication was produced by the act or connivance of the person against whom the relief is sought, or that an undue advantage was taken of the party's situation. If a person, while in a state of intoxication, though not induced by the act or procurement of the grantee, execute an absolute conveyance of his property without consideration, equity will relieve against the conveyance."

In Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. 346, the court said that at common law the old cases held that relief would not be granted against a contract made by a party who was intoxicated unless intoxication was brought about by the other party, but that the rule has been changed, saying of the court of equity: "It would not favor ebriety, but at the same time would not permit it to be taken advantage of with impunity. The good sense of this principle has commended itself to every court, and especially to the courts of equity. Hence it has become the settled rule of the court that it will not interfere to assist a person on the ground of intoxication merely; but, if any unfair advantage has been taken of his situation, it will render him all proper aid."

But a decree for the specific performance of a contract will not be refused on the ground that the purchaser was intoxicated at the time of the sale, unless it appear that such intoxication was produced or procured by the vendor, or that an undue advantage had been taken of the situation of the purchaser. Maxwell v. Pittenger, 3 N. J. Eq. 156. In this case the court said: "These facts, taken together, show that Pittenger, throughout the whole, acted as a sober, rational, and intelligent man would act. And when, in addition to this, it is seen that no evidence is adduced to prove that he gave more for the property than its value, the fair conclusion is that he acted understandingly, and that, even if he had indulged pretty freely in the use of ardent spirits, he was competent for business. . . . Supposing, however, that the conclusion arrived at is incorrect, and that Pittenger was really so much intoxicated on the day of the sale, and at the time of the sale, as not to be able to act understandingly; 54 L. R. A.

then it is incumbent on the defendant to make out, either that such intoxication was produced or induced by the complainant, or that some improper advantage was taken of the defendant while in that situation."

And to avoid a contract on the ground of intoxication it must be shown, either that the intoxication was produced by the act or connivance of the person against whom the relief is sought, or that an undue advantage was taken of the party's situation. Hutchinson v. Tindall, 3 N. J. Eq. 357. In this case the court held: "1. That the court will hear any person who seeks relief on this ground. Formerly such hearing was denied. The party setting up such defense could not be heard. Johnson v. Medlicott, 3 P. Wms. 130, note [a]. 2. That the fact of intoxication is not of itself sufficient to avoid a contract. Cory v. Cory, 1 Vcs. Sr. 19. 3. That to avoid the contract it must be shown, either that the intoxication was produced by the act or connivance of the person against whom the relief is sought, or that an undue advantage was taken of the party's situation. Cooke v. Clayworth, 18 Ves. Jr. 12; Wilmurt v. Morgan, Opinion of Chancellor Williamson, March, 1827 (N. J. Eq.); Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. 346, 22 Am. Dec. 519; Maxwell v. Pittenger, 3 N. J. Eq. 156."

And drunkenness is no excuse for an indorser of a note if he was not drawn in by the indorsee for the purpose of taking advantage of him. Woodson v. Gordon, Peck (Tenn.) 196, 14 Am. Dec. 743. In this case the court said: "At all events, drunkenness, short of a deprivation of reason or insanity, will not do, for then everyone will counterfeit intoxication to get clear of his contracts, and which will lead to the investigation in every case, first, whether the party was really intoxicated, and what was the degree of intoxication, and whether it should prevail to exonerate the person from his engagement, producing the greatest uncertainty, difficulty, and variety of decision upon cases similarly circumstanced, and subjecting everything to the control and the fluctuating opinions of juries."

Where a party to a contract is voluntarily intoxicated, at the time of making it, to the extent only that he does not clearly understand the business, this does not render his contract void or voidable, where no advantage is gained by dealing with him. Henry v. Ritenour, 31 Ind. 136.

And drunkenness alone, without any fraud or imposition being practised, will not avoid a contract. Campbell v. Ketcham, 1 Bibb. 406. In this case the court said: "The law seems well settled, that drunkenness per se is no substan-tent that would render him non compos mentis for the time being." Bates v. Ball, 72 Ill. 108, 111. "Drunkenness, to afford a ground for avoiding a contract, must be so excessive as to render the person incapable of consent, or for the time to incapacitate him from exercising his judgment." Reynolds v. Dechaums, 24 Tex. 174, 76 Am. Dec. 101. A contract executed by an intoxicated person is valid if he is "aware of what he was doing, and not deceived as to the identity of the paper signed." Miller v. Finley, 26 Mich. 249, 12 Am. Rep. 306. "Where a party seeks to avoid an express contract upon the ground that he was intoxicated at the time he entered into it, it is incumbent on him to produce clear and satisfactory proof that he was at the time in such a state of drunkenness as not to know what he was doing or the consequences of tive cause for men to plead in avoidance of their own acts; for this were to encourage drunkenness. But if any unfair advantage was taken of such a situation, as, if the party seeking to avoid his act was drawn in to drink by the person with whom he contracted, or by his contrivance, and an unreasonable or unconscientious bargain, deed, or instrument was procured from the person in that situation, equity would relieve."

In Stirling v. Hinckley (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 824, 4 Atl. 358, the jury were charged that one cannot allege as a reason for not performing his contract that he was drunk when he made it; but they were also told that if the contract was obtained by imposing on a person unable to take care of himself, it would not be obligatory.

In Cooke v. Clayworth, 18 Ves. Jr. 12, the rule was laid down that a court of equity will not assist a person who wishes to get rid of an agreement on the mere ground of intoxication; but there is an exception where any contrivance was used to draw him into drink, or any unfair advantage was taken of his situation, or the extreme state of intoxication deprived him of his reason, which even at law would invalidate a deed. As to whether the paper in controversy contained the agreement as it was first written or was altered, would be left for investigation at law.

The fact of having been in drink is not any reason to relieve a man against any deed or agreement gained from him when in that condition, for this were to encourage drunkenness; scelus, if through the management or contrivance of him who gained the deed, etc., the party from whom such deed has been gained was drawn into drink. Johnson v. Medlicott, 3 P. Wms. 130, note [a].

In Hall v. Moreman, 3 McCord, L. 477, it was said that if people will voluntarily incapacitate themselves from doing their ordinary business they must take the consequences of their own imprudence; that they have no right to call upon this court to protect them from all the consequences of intemperance and folly; that if one man takes advantage of another when in a state of intoxication to commit a fraud upon him, he will be entitled to relief from such fraud. But it was held that there is no direct charge of fraud in this case; and the affidavits to that point, as well as those to the intoxication, are so completely rebutted by the counter affidavits as at least to neutralize that charge; and a settlement and confession of judgment was sustained.

his own acts." Johns v. Fritchey, 35 Md. 258. "A contract made by a person while he is so drunk as to be incapable of understanding its nature and effect is voidable. . . . [but his intoxication] must be so excessive as to render him incapable of knowing what he is doing." Clark, Contr. pp. 274, 275.

The foregoing texts and adjudications clearly declare and thoroughly establish the modern doctrine on this subject, departing from the ancient rule, which forbade a party to a contract to stultify himself by setting up his want of mental capacity to enter into it, to the extent, and only to the extent, of allowing him to show in avoidance that from insanity, drunkenness, and the like, he was incapable of exercising judgment, understanding the proposed engage-

"If people will voluntarily incapacitate themselves from doing their ordinary business, they must take the consequences of their imprudence,"—and they have no right to call upon the court to protect them "from all the consequences of intemperance and folly,"—commenting on this, the court says that this language "could scarcely have been intended to mean that no degree of drunkenness could invalidate a contract, provided the debauchery were voluntary, for that would not at all comport with the doctrine of Wade v. Colvert, 2 Mill. Const. 27, 12 Am. Dec. 652, nor with Cooke v. Clayworth (decided in 1811; vide 18 Ves. Jr. 15), where it is manifest that, assuming the voluntary drunkenness of Cooke, the only question, on an application to rescind a contract, was as to the degree of intoxication."

It seems that a contract will not be set aside on the ground of undue influence, apart from fraud, where proper in itself, and for the advantage of the party who seeks to avoid it; as, for instance, a conveyance by a man habitually intemperate—but not actually drunk—of all his property, in trust, for his wife and children. Birdsong v. Birdsong, 2 Head, 280.

In Cory v. Cory, 1 Ves. Sr. 19, it was held that an agreement, if reasonable and to settle family disputes, and if no unfair advantage is taken, will not be set aside because the party was drunk.

In Stockley v. Stockley, 1 Ves. & B. 23, it was said that family compromises should be favored if reasonable and upon a doubtful right, even if one party was drunk at the time.

III. Fraud.

Where the intoxicated person is induced by the fraud of the other party to enter into a contract it will be invalid.

An obligation granted by a person while he is in a state of absolute and total drunkenness is ineffectual, because the grantor is incapable of consent; for the law has thought it equitable to protect those who have not the use of their reason (even though they should have lost it by their own folly) from the fraud or circumvention of others. Erskine, Inst. 814, 815; Pitt v. Smith, 3 Campb. 35, note.

And where possession of personal property was obtained by means of a contract made with one who, by reason of his intoxication, was without capacity to enter into a valid agreement, and the person obtaining the property knew of the other's incapacity when the contract was made, the transaction is fraudulent. Baird v. Howard, 51 Ohio St. 57, 22 L. R. A. 846, 36 N. E. 732.

ment, and of knowing what he was about when he entered into the contract sought to be avoided. It is plain that the rule given in charge to the jury by the trial court in this case is a radical departure from the established and true rule obtaining in all such cases. One may well be unable, from intoxication, to give "proper attention" to a transaction, and yet know what the transaction involves, and be capable of understanding the terms and effect of a contract issuing out of it, so as to be as fully bound by it as if he was under no degree of intoxication. The charge given at defendant's request should therefore have been refused.

The instruction given by the court ex mero motu is even more patently erroneous. Many perfectly sane and sober men could not bind themselves by contract at all, if the rule laid down there is a sound one. The law does not gauge contractual competency by the standard of mental capacity possessed by reasonably prudent men. A man is not incapacitated because of intellectual limitations arising from intoxication or what not, which prevent him from giving

A deed, fraudulently and improperly obtained from the grantor at a time when he was, by reason of intoxication, wholly incompetent to execute a valid conveyance, will be set aside. Prentice v. Achorn, 2 Paige, 30.

So, if, when a man is so drunk as to render him an easy prey to the fraudulent designs of another, an unfair advantage is taken of his situation to procure from him an unreasonable bargain, a court of equity will interfere and rescind the contract, on the ground, not of his drunkenness, but of the fraud. Calloway v. Witherspoon, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 128. In this case it was not pretended that the party was, at the time of making the contract, drunk to that extreme point which would, of itself, invalidate the act, but that he was so drunk as to render him an easy prey to the fraudulent designs of the defendant.

And the settlement of a groundless action, procured by fraud and duress, made with a party who was in such a condition as to be incompetent to make a valid agreement, is voidable and may be avoided; and it is not necessary to return the discharge of the action in order to avoid the contract. Foss v. Hildreth, 10 Allen, 76.

Where a party when he enters into a contract is in such a state of drunkenness as not to know what he is doing, and particularly when it appears that this is known to the other party, the contract is void altogether, and he cannot be compelled to perform it. A person who takes an obligation from another under such circumstances is guilty of actual fraud. Gore v. Gibson, 13 Mees. & W. 623, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 151, 9 Jur. 140. In this case it was said: "The modern decisions have qualified the old doctrine, that a man shall not be allowed to allege his own lunacy or intoxication, and total drunkenness is now held to be a defense."

And if one whose mental condition, occasioned by excessive drinking, is such that he is unable to protect himself is induced to enter into a contract by means of false statements made by one cognizant of all the facts he is not bound by the contract. Stirling v. Hinckley (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 824, 4 Atl. 358.

In Kling v. Bryant, 3 N. C. (2 Hayw.) 394, it was held that if a party was so drunk at the time that he did not know what he was about, and if in that situation he was induced to sign a paper for a debt which he did not owe, that was a fraud; and a fraud practised upon a man, whether drunk or sober, will vitiate the instrument signed by him.

A lease obtained by fraud and circumvention, from a person in a state of intoxication, is void in equity. Butler v. Mulvihill, 1 Bligh, 137.

And a transfer of shares in a corporation, procured from the owner while so intoxicated as to be incapable of transacting business, by fraud, with knowledge of his condition, and for a grossly inadequate consideration, will be set aside in equity; and if, without any fault of his, he is unable to restore the consideration, provision for its repayment may be made in 64 L. R. A.

the final decree. Thackrah v. Haas, 119 U. S. 499, 30 L. ed. 480, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 311.

A presumption of fraud arises which must be countervalled by proof of a fair consideration and fair and honest dealing on the part of him who seeks to enforce the payment of the note, when a promissory note based upon an insufficient consideration has been obtained from a person under the influence of liquor at the time of its execution, and enfeebled in mind and body by long and continued disease and drunkenness. Holland v. Barnes, 53 Ala. 83, 25 Am. Rep. 595.

And where the agent of a creditor knew that a member of a firm was intoxicated when he executed a preferential assignment for the firm it was held that, while the degree of intoxication was not sufficient to set aside the assignment, yet the imputation of fraud was such that the creditor would not be favored in a court of equity. Bowen v. Clark, 1 Biss. 128, Fed. Cas. No. 1,721.

But where a bill is filed to avoid a conveyance on the ground of incapacity by reason of extreme intoxication at the time of making, and charging that a deed, note, and warrant of attorney were procured by fraud, covin, and misrepresentation, and the charges are fully, distinctly, and unequivocally denied by the answer, the rule of law requires that they should be clearly proved, and not left to presumption or conjecture. Freeman v. Staats, 9 N. J. Eq. 818. In this case the court held: "The decided weight of evidence, as it appears before this court, is that the complainant was not, at the time of the execution of the deed, incapable, by reason of intoxication or otherwise, of comprehending its contents and effect."

In an action on a bond it was held that evidence that a co-obligor directed his distiller to let the defendant have as much whiskey as he wanted, and that he could lead the obligor like a child, was incompetent, where it was not shown that the payee had an agency in the fraud practised. Jenners v. Howard, 6 Blackf. 240. In this case the court said: "Mental incapacity at the time of contracting, produced by drunkenness or any other cause, is a good defense against a contract, whether that contract be evidenced by deed or parol. If the mind be capable of assenting, the law pronounces the contract void. Drunkenness of itself merely, unless fraud be practised, will not avoid a contract; but if the party be in such a state of intoxication that he is for the time deprived of reason, the contract is void."

IV. Intoxication produced by the other party.

It is a general rule that contracts procured from an intoxicated person where such intoxication is caused or aggravated by the other party will be held void. These cases stand on the same footing as those where an undue advantage is taken, or where a fraud is practised.

If any advantage is taken of a man when drunk, or if he is brought into that situation by the contrivance or management of the person to a proposed contract all the consideration that a reasonably prudent man would be able to give it. Indeed, that test has no relation to mental capacity. Competency to contract may well exist in as high a degree in a reckless, careless man as in one of the highest prudence and care, and the inability of the former to give a certain degree of attention to a business matter results, not from mental incapacity to know and understand the matter in hand, but from indifference as to it, or his habit or disposition to drunkenness. And one may sufficiently understand a contract, and the nature and effect of his entering into it, to be fully bound by it, though he be capable of only a very much less consideration of it than would be bestowed by a man of ordinary prudence. The cases of Hale v. Brown, 11 Ala. 87, and Holland v. Barnes, 53 Ala. 88, 25 Am. Rep. 595, relied upon for appellee, involved other considerations than the drunkenness of the party seeking to avoid a contract,—overreaching by the other party, unfair and unconscionable contracts, etc.,—and they have no application to the present case.

Reversed and remanded.

who obtains the contract, it is fraudulent, and the contract or advantage thus gained shall be taken from him. White v. Cox, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 79. In this case the court said: "Here is an unreasonable contract obtained from one in drink. Here is a contract obtained from one drawn into drink by the person who deals with him."

In Brandon v. Old, 8 Car. & P. 440, which was an action by a publican against a man seventy years of age who was in the habit of drinking at the house of the plaintiff, the charge on one day was 86 pints of ale besides spirits, and another day 134 pints of ale. It was held that if a man when in his senses gives beer to others there is no doubt but that he must pay for it, but if he does it while in a state of intoxication he will not be liable because the publican in such case would be taking advantage of an offense which he himself had been instrumental in producing.

And where a party having the power of attorney to sell a valuable farm was encouraged by a purchaser to drink until he became intoxicated and unfit for business, and while in that condition was induced by the purchaser to make a conveyance for $83 in cash, and a transfer, without recourse, of a contract and mortgage which were of little or no value, it was held that such a conveyance was obtained by fraud, and should be set aside. Dunn v. Amos, 14 Wis. 107. In this case the court said: "It is said by the appellants' counsel to be a fatal objection to this action, that the money paid in part consideration was not paid or tendered back before the action was brought, and that the contract and mortgage were not reassigned before the respondent offered to return them. The authorities cited to sustain the objection are inapplicable to this case. They are cases where actions were brought to rescind contracts fairly obtained, on account of some subsequent breach or failure to comply with their conditions. This action was brought to set aside the contract because it was obtained by fraud, and therefore never was the contract or conveyance of the plaintiff."

Intoxication procured by the grantee of a deed to influence its execution makes the deed void unless executed when the grantee was sober, but habitual drunkenness of the grantor of a deed, not procured by the grantee, will not affect it. Woods v. Pindall, Wright (Ohio) 507. In this case the court said: "You may prove fraud in obtaining the deed, as that would make it void. The general habit of intoxication, unless it is expected to connect it with the plaintiff's lessor, will not avail. We suppose the plaintiff will admit the defendant generally drunk if desired, as that will save time, and then, if there be evidence that he was made so by the lessor of the plaintiff, and executed the deed under such influence, it may avail. Unless it is proposed to do that, it will be useless to proceed, as we must instruct the jury that under other circumstances the drunkenness will be of no avail."

And a deed made by a person while in the state of intoxication will be set aside if advantage has been taken of his situation, or if his drunkenness was produced by the act or connivance of the person to be benefited by the deed. O'Conner v. Rempt, 29 N. J. Eq. 156. The court held: "It is clearly proved that when the complainant went to the house of the defendants his mind was disordered; that the day before the deed was executed he was all day in a state of drunken insensibility, and that when he was rescued from the custody of the defendants he was suffering from delirium tremens. In addition, the circumstances attending the execution of the deed, as shown by the evidence offered by the defendants, were not such as to justify the belief that it was not procured by management and artifice.

So, a purchaser cannot call for the execution of a contract procured from a vendor while in a state of intoxication. Whitesides v. Greenlee, 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 152. The court said: "But the fact appears to be well established by the depositions taken in the case, that at the time when he signed it he was intoxicated and not capable of making a contract, that the plaintiff, Whitesides, was not only consensual of his situation, but was instrumental in bringing it about."

In Kuelkamp v. Hidding, 81 Wis. 503, the court said: "If the defendant, with fraudulent intent, had caused or produced intoxication of the plaintiff, and so had obtained the conveyances on the same terms, no one would doubt that equity would relieve against them."

Where a party procures the intoxication of another for the purpose of securing an unconscionable advantage in a contract, the contract will be held void in an action to enforce it. Willcox v. Jackson, 51 Iowa, 208, 1 N. W. 518.

And the signature to a note, obtained while the maker was in a state of extreme drunkenness, the liquor being given by the other party, will be void or voidable as obtained by fraud and artifice, notwithstanding an entry made at that time by the payee crediting the maker of the note with that amount on his account in his ledger. Lyon v. Phillips, 106 Pa. 57. In this case the court said, if the obligation was upon a sufficient consideration, and was without other legal defect, the transaction may be a proper subject for ratification.

So, notes and mortgages are void where they are executed to a supposed friend who supplies the maker with liquor, plays on his fears, as to the action of supposed creditors, and threatens and cajoles him into a state of intoxication, so that without realizing what he is doing the victim at various times signs them without a shadow of consideration. They will be void in the hands of a third party not an innocent purchaser. Knott v. Tidyman, 86 Wis. 164, 56 N. W. 632. In this case the court said that these securities "were conceived in sin and born in iniquity."

It is a good defense to a note that it was given in exchange of horses, and that at the time the defendant was intoxicated and had been made so by the plaintiff, who fraudulently and artfully got him drunk and imposed upon him in that situation. Curtis v. Hall, 4 N. J. L. 361.

In Lacy v. Garard, 2 Ohio, 7, it was said that the defense that a signature of a surety to a penal bond was obtained while he was intoxicated by the procurement of the principal would be a good bar to an action on the bond, and that had the signature been procured in the manner charged the obligation would have been voidable at least.

But in Hamilton v. Grainger, 5 Hurlst. & N. 40, 5 Jur. N. S. 1108, in an action for goods sold where the defendant was allowed to plead never indebted; payment; that the goods were excisable liquors to be sold on plaintiff's premises without a license; that the goods were wine supplied defendant to be consumed in a brothel kept by plaintiff,—the court refused to allow the plea that the defendant was entirely deprived of understanding by intoxication as the plaintiff well knew, and that the goods were liquor supplied to increase his intoxication, and that he derived no benefit from them.

V. Ratification.

The general rule is that a contract, invalid by reason of the intoxication of one of the parties, may be ratified by him when sober, and if so ratified it will be enforced. English v. Young, 10 B. Mon. 141; Carpenter v. Rodgers, 61 Mich. 384, 28 N. W. 156; Lyon v. Phillips, 106 Pa. 57.

And the intoxication of a party executing a contract under seal will not avoid the same where assent is afterwards given when the party is not disabled by intoxication. Arnold v. Hickman, 6 Munt. 15.

And the contract of a man too drunk to know what he is about is voidable only, and not void, and therefore capable of ratification by him when he becomes sober. Matthews v. Baxter, L. R. 8 Exch. 182, 42 L. J. Exch. N. S. 73, 28 L. T. N. S. 169, 21 Week. Rep. 389. In this case Martin, B., said: "The judges in Gore v. Gibson, 13 Mees. & W. 623, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 151, 9 Jur. 140, use the word 'void,' it is true, but I cannot think they meant absolutely void. They simply meant to say that a drunken man's contract could not be enforced against his will. But it by no means follows that it is incapable of ratification."

A contract will be enforced "if a man accustomed to strong drink, and even to be intoxicated every day, but, notwithstanding, possessed of reason, and the power of reflection, determines, with all the deliberation he is capable of, to sell his property, offers it repeatedly for sale, at length sells it at the best price he can obtain, to a man against whom there is not proof of his having taken advantage of the hour of intoxication; if afterwards he professes himself satisfied with the bargain, and assigns a good reason for it—when the bargain is clear, explicit and certain; when it has been fully executed on the other side." Reinicker v. Smith, 2 Harr. & J. 421.

If a person is so intoxicated as not to understand the nature of a contract, or, if not so drunk, his nervous constitution and mental faculties are so shattered that he is equally incapable of understanding the effect of a business transaction, he will not be bound by a note given in settlement of a breach-of-promise suit, but he will be if after he becomes sober and sane he ratifies it. McClure v. Mausell, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 119.

A bond may be avoided by the obligor, by proof that he was so drunk, at the time of the execution, as to have been incapable of contracting; but too ready an ear should not be lent to such a defense; and it should never be allowed, where the subsequent conduct of the party is such as to have the appearance of his having confirmed his contract. If, for instance, he does not return what he received as the consideration of his contract the instant he is restored to his senses, the jury may infer that he intends it to be confirmed. Williams v. Inabnet, 1 Bail. L. 843. In this case the court said: "It is, perhaps, one of the most difficult questions which can be presented to a jury to decide how far the capacity to contract has been destroyed by the too free use of ardent spirits. But too ready an ear should not be lent to such a defense; and in all cases where the subsequent conduct of the party making it is such as to have the appearance of his having confirmed the contract, the defense should not be allowed; for, even if a man be so much intoxicated as not to know what he is doing, yet he may afterwards confirm the contract by his acts. If he does not intend to be bound by it, he should go the instant he is restored to his senses, and return all that he received as a consideration."

In the case of Berkley v. Cannon, 4 Rich. L. 136, the case of Williams v. Inabnet, 1 Bail. L. 843, was distinguished, the court saying: "Notwithstanding, we find in Williams v. Inabnet the remark: 'For even if a man be so much intoxicated as not to know what he is doing, yet he may afterwards confirm the contract by his acts,' it is apparent, nevertheless, the point ruled was, that the defendant's acts of confirmation, joined to the evidence in the case, left the jury without warrant in saying that he was too drunk to bind himself by the original transaction. Whether, if the reverse had been true, and assumed as fact (to wit, that the contract was originally void, from excessive intoxication), that contract could be rendered valid and become a cause of action by the mere force of presumed ratification from acts in a sober moment, was not the point raised in that particular case, for it had to go back on the question of fact as to the degree of drunkenness; and the court was the better satisfied with that result by the view they had of the other question. It is presumed that the new trial would have been granted in that case, even though the court had taken the rule of law to be, that a contract, void for drunkenness, could not be afterwards confirmed, inferentially by acts of ratification."

Drunkenness does not render a deed made under its influence absolutely void, but only voidable. A deed, made by a person when drunk to such an extent as would authorize him to repudiate it, may be ratified by the maker when sober so as to bind him and his personal representatives. Raton v. Perry, 29 Mo. 96.

And in an action upon a note and mortgage, where intoxication was pleaded, it was held that the defendant was fully aware of the nature and effect of the contract when the money was received and disposed of by him, and, therefore, his incompetency (if conceded) at the time of entering into the contract, would not absolve him from the obligations thereof. Hawley v. Howell, 60 Iowa, 79, 14 N. W. 199.

If a sober person ratifies an agreement made when drunk, by giving a bond or deed in pursuance thereof, the court will not interfere to relieve him. Moore v. Reed, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 580. In this case the court said: "If a person will enter into a hard bargain with his eyes open, equity will not relieve him, unless he can shew fraud in the party contracting with him, or undue means to draw him into the agreement." The plaintiff bought a stock of goods, paid part with slaves, and when sober gave a bond for the remainder, and sold the stock during three weeks, and then sold out to his son. He made it impossible for a court of equity to place the parties in statu quo.

Mental imbecility, not amounting to absolute disqualification, induces a vigilant, strict examination, in chancery, of the contracts made by one laboring under it; and when coupled with gross inadequacy of consideration, they constitute such evidence of fraud as may vacate a contract. Cruise v. Christopher, 5 Dana. 181. In this case the mental weakness was induced by long habits of intoxication. The court held that the slight degree of intoxication at the time of the execution of a conveyance would have but little influence on the case where the grantor, when sober, made a second one reiterating the first.

In an action on a mortgage where the maker was so intoxicated as to be incapable of executing it, a recovery cannot be had on the ground that the goods were used, for which the mortgage was given, where the claim is upon the written instrument, and not upon the goods sold. A ratification, to be valid, must be made by the party when sober. Reinskof v. Rogge, 37 Ind. 207. In this case this instruction was given: "If the deceased at the time of the execution of the mortgage, as a result of drunkenness or any other diseased condition of the mind, was deprived of his understanding, so that he had not sufficient capacity to act with discretion in the ordinary affairs of life, the plaintiff cannot recover."

In Johnson v. Harmon, 94 U. S. 371, 24 L. ed. 271, it was said: "Contracts of the kind are voidable only, not void, and therefore capable of being ratified when the party becomes sober."

But in Berkley v. Cannon, 4 Rich. L. 136, it was held that, if a party when drunk purchases a chattel, and gives a sealed note for the price, and afterwards sells the chattel without having offered it back to the plaintiff, such subsequent conduct of the defendant (though it may be used as evidence to show that the note was not, in fact, invalid, or may itself constitute, or even give rise to, a new cause of action), will not amount to a confirmation of the note, if the defendant was, in fact, so utterly drunk when he signed it as to be incapable of contracting. In an action of debt on such a note, as the specific and only cause of action, if the jury find the note to be void, they cannot give the plaintiff the value of the chattel. In this case the court said: "In considering this question we should be misled by assuming that our doctrine, touching a rescission of a contract, applied to the present case. Where the benefit of that doctrine is claimed it is accompanied by the obligation, on the part of him who claims it, to place the adverse party in statu quo; and no disability so to do, arising from his own voluntary act, will work a dispensation from that duty, though impossibilities, as the death of a negro, or a horse, or other unavoidable destruction of property, should be enough to excuse from the performance of the condition. The defendant, however, is not properly driven to the position of one who seeks to rescind a contract in toto. The defendant says there never was a contract such as that sued on, in existence; that though a promise in form made by him is produced, yet that he executed it mechanically only; and that, by reason of gross intoxication, he was incapable of that assent of mind which is the essence of a valid agreement. In short, he affirms that the note sued upon was wholly void, and not merely voidable. If that be true (and be it remembered the jury have found the incapacity of intellect alleged) it is but a step of plain reasoning, fortified by common sense, to the conclusion that such a note was not capable of ratification."

And a note executed by a man when so intoxicated as to be incapable of transacting business is not obligatory upon him; much less where the intoxication has been brought about by the contrivance of the other party; and a subsequent promise to pay the note, made when sober, in consideration of forbearance, is equally invalid. Newell v. Fisher, 11 Smedes & M. 431, 49 Am. Dec. 66. In this case the note was wholly destitute of consideration.

Where an agreement was entered into when sober, and the contract executed when drunk, it was held valid and enforceable. Shaw v. Thackray, 17 Jur. 1045, 1 Smaile & G. 637.

And the same was said to be the rule in Hutchinson v. Brown, Clarke, Ch. 408.

VI. Habitual drunkards.

The general rule is that after an inquisition found an habitual drunkard is incompetent to contract, and this is so provided in some statutes. The inquisition is also prima facie evidence as to incompetency in regard to prior contracts made during the time that the decree finds that condition has existed. There are some exceptions, as where the decree is never carried into effect, or where necessities are furnished, or where the party works and labors and receives pay therefor. It is also held that a decree that one is an "habitual drunkard" does not prevent him from being an executor.

A contract made by a person who had previously been found by an inquisition to be an habitual drunkard is void. Devin v. Scott, 34 Ind. 67. In this case the court said that if this contract was an exception to the rule on the ground of necessities, that fact must be alleged and proved.

So, a party found by inquisition to be an habitual drunkard is not thereafter competent to waive notice of nonpayment and protest; and evidence that at the time of the waiver he was perfectly sober is inadmissible. Wadsworth v. Sherman, 14 Barb. 169.

And one found by inquisition to be an habitual drunkard is thereby rendered incompetent subsequently to enter into an antenuptial contract. Imhoff v. Witmer, 31 Pa. 243. In this case the court said: "The act of assembly of 1836 relating to 'lunatics and habitual drunkards' places both classes on precisely the same footing as regards the remedy as well as the effect of the proceedings."

And the contracts of an habitual drunkard, made after inquisition found, and before its confirmation, are void under Pennsylvania act 1819, Purd. Dig. 1830, 222, providing that drunkard's contracts made after the finding of the inquisition are void. Clark v. Caldwell, 6 Watts, 139.

In Bixler v. Gilleland, 4 Pa. 156, the case of Clark v. Caldwell, 6 Watts, 139, holding that contracts of an habitual drunkard made after inquisition found, and before its confirmation, are void under an act of assembly, was distinguished, and was held not to apply where the inquisition was confirmed in October, 1829, but the commissioners never acted, and the alleged drunkard acted as if no proceedings were ever had, and bought and sold the property in 1831, and saw it levied upon in 1843, and made no objection. And three days before this the inquisition was superseded, and a short time after the sheriff's deed was acknowledged without objection being made.

And a bond and warrant to confess judgment, taken two days after the jury has found on an inquisition that the maker was an habitual drunkard, is void. L'Amoureux v. Crosby, 2 Paige, 422, 22 Am. Dec. 655.

A decree of court adjudging a person an habitual drunkard, rendered about a year after the time of entering into a contract, is admissible in evidence, together with other facts, as tending to show what his condition was at the time of the contract. Stirling v. Hinckley (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 824, 4 Atl. 358.

A finding of incapacity existing before an inquisition for habitual drunkenness casts the burden upon the party contracting with such drunkard during such time to prove that he was sober when he made a settlement. Klohs v. Klohs, 61 Pa. 245.

In Noel v. Karper, 53 Pa. 97, the court said: "An inquisition finding a party either a lunatic or habitual drunkard is prima facie evidence of incompetency to make a contract at any time covered or overreached by the finding, and imposes upon the party introducing a contract executed by a lunatic or habitual drunkard the burden of proving him to have been of sound mind at the time of the execution thereof."

Where a contract of a drunkard is in question, and the fact of drunkenness is established by other means than a legal inquisition, it is competent for the party alleging the contract to prove a lucid interval. An inquisition is some evidence of incompetency as to contracts made before the inquest but during the time the incompetency is found to have existed. Tozer v. Saturlee, 3 Grant, Cas. 182. In this case the court said: "As to contracts made after the inquisition, our statute contemplates a complete transfer of the property to the custody of the law, and the committee is substituted for the lunatic or drunkard, and a lucid interval can avail nothing, for he has nothing in respect to which to contract. This is always the case where the proceeding is perfected. Where it is suspended or abandoned or suspended in mid-course, as seems to have been the case here, it may be doubted whether any stronger presumption is furnished by an inquisition as to contracts made after it was found, than as to such as were made previously, but within the ascertained period of incompetency. If no stronger, then it is not conclusive, and may be rebutted by such evidence as was offered here."

But, if an habitual drunkard, after inquisition found, carries on his business, does work, and receives pay therefor, his receipt is a valid discharge of the debt. Black's Estate, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 266.

Ohio Rev. Stat. § 6318, providing that from the time of service of notice a sale, gift, or encumbrance made by an intemperate person or habitual drunkard shall not be valid, does not prevent a drunkard from purchasing necessities after the service of notice and before the appointment of a guardian; and a drunkard may become liable for services as nurse, rendered while he was in a drunken fit of sickness. Brockway v. Jewell, 52 Ohio St. 187, 39 N. E. 470. In this case it was held that the delivery of a set of harness for services was a payment, and not a sale.

In Sill v. McKnight, 7 Watts & S. 244, it was held that a person found by inquisition to be an habitual drunkard is not thereby deprived of his power to perform the office of executor or administrator, and the power to sell property was held to be well executed by the executor though he had been declared an habitual drunkard. This was because Pa. act 1832, § 26, provides for the removal of an executor or administrator who is an habitual drunkard, and it will be assumed that, unless this statute is invoked and the executor is removed for such cause, his official acts are valid. This statute will control although, under Pa. acts 1819 and 1836, contracts of habitual drunkards in regard to their own property are invalid.

On a proceeding to reopen certain judgments, where the judgment debtor had been adjudged an habitual drunkard for the period of one year before the adjudication, and the notes on which the judgments were entered were given within that year, it was held that the preponderance of the evidence was in the creditor's favor as to sobriety, and overcame the presumption arising from the adjudication that the debtor was an habitual drunkard. Donehoo's Appeal, 2 Monaghan, 213, 15 Atl. 924.

And a saloon keeper was allowed to recover against an habitual drunkard for food, cigars, and drink, where the vendor had no notice of the inquisition found, and the decree was not filed until after the sales, and the purchaser appeared to be able to transact business. Re McGarvey, 64 How. Pr. 135.

Where a party made a deed the 21st day of June, and on the succeeding 5th of July was judicially declared an habitual drunkard, it was held that the deed would not be set aside on conflict of evidence. Van Wyck v. Brasher, 81 N. Y. 262. The court said: "A drunkard is not incompetent, like an idiot or one generally insane. He is simply incompetent upon proof that at the time of the act challenged his understanding was clouded or his reason dethroned by actual intoxication. . . . Here there was no proof of general unsoundness of mind, or of general insanity, and none whatever that the grantee used any artifice, undue influence, or fraud to procure the conveyance."

In some cases the term "habitual drunkard" is used to indicate the condition existing without regard to any inquisition; and in such cases any advantage taken by reason of the party's mental weakness will be ground for setting aside the contract.

In assumpsit, where it appeared that the note sued on was taken from a person of weak intellect and an habitual drunkard under suspicious circumstances, it was held to be a strong badge of fraud if the payee does not make out a fair case and good consideration, it being previously shown that the note was given on settlement of accounts, and the presumption was created, either that nothing was due, or a less sum than the note called for. Hale v. Brown, 11 Ala. 87.

A court of equity will set aside a contract that is unfair, and shows on its face evidence of imbecility and undue influence, made by an habitual drunkard, although made during his sober moments, where his mind has become impaired and weakened by habits of intoxication. Conant v. Jackson, 16 Vt. 335.

And a contract unreasonable in itself, entered into by an habitual drunkard when in a state of excitement from excessive drinking almost amounting to madness, with a person who at the time had him in complete subjection, will be set aside. It is not necessary in such a case to prove actual madness. Wiltshire v. Marshall, 14 Week. Rep. 602, 14 L. T. N. S. 396.

A party will be protected against his own acts, while in a state of insanity, even if brought on by drunkenness. Relief may be granted (where the rights of parties may be restored) against acts done by a party who is so inebriated as to be incapable of contracting, or who, from the effects of inebriation, continues incapable. Menkins v. Lightner, 18 Ill. 282. In this case the court held: "His habit was that of habitual drunkenness for a course of years, before the first sale. There is no contradiction of the alleged fact that, when drunk and when drinking, he was a fool and crazy. One so far gone as to bring on the stages of delirium tremens, or mania potu, may hardly be called sane, simply upon becoming sober."

But a promise made while sober, by an habitual drunkard to a physician, that he should pay him $100, in consideration of which the physician promised and undertook to cure him of his appetite for ardent spirits, may be binding. Fisk v. Townsend, 7 Yerg. 146. In this case it was held that it should be left to the jury whether a recurrence was brought on by a fraudulent purpose to defeat plaintiff's claim.

VII. As affecting a bona fide holder of note.

The general rule is that intoxication of the maker of a note is not a defense as against a bona fide holder for value.

The defense of drunkenness of the maker of a negotiable note is not available against the same in the hands of a bona fide holder for value. State Bank v. McCoy, 69 Pa. 204, 8 Am. Rep. 246. In this case the court said: "If a man voluntarily deprives himself of the use of his reason by strong drink, why should he not be responsible to an innocent party for the acts which he performs when in that condition? It seems to me that he ought, on the principle that where a loss must be borne by one of two innocent persons it shall be borne by him who occasioned it. As between the contracting parties, where one of them is so drunk as not to know what he is doing, the contract is doubtless void, especially if the other is apprised of his condition, and, if not wilfully or culpably blind, he must know it."

And drunkenness of the maker of a negotiable note is not a defense against an innocent holder of the same. McSparran v. Neeley, 91 Pa. 17. In this case the court said that the evidence did not make out the existence of insanity or a state of absolute incapacity.

A person making a note while temporarily deprived of his reason by intoxication will be liable thereon, if the paper is negotiable and has passed into the hands of an indorsee in good faith before maturity, for a valuable consideration. Smith v. Williamson, 8 Utah, 219, 30 Pac. 753. In this case the court said: "It may be said that a person who executes a proposed negotiable paper while deprived of reason by insanity may avoid it in the hands of an innocent indorsee, and that the same rule should apply when the person is deprived of reason by intoxication. The considerations upon which the rules stand are dissimilar. Insanity is involuntary; it is a disease, and is a more permanent state, and usually is not the result of the act of the person imposed upon; while drunkenness is voluntary, and is a temporary state, and is regarded as a vice,—the helpless condition of the drunkard is his own fault."

And where an intoxicated person was aware of what he was doing, and not deceived as to the identity of the note signed by him, it is not void, and any defense to it must rest on fraud. Such a note would be valid in the hands of a bona fide holder for value. Miller v. Finley, 20 Mich. 249, 12 Am. Rep. 306.

The fact that defendant may have been intoxicated when plaintiff discounted certain notes for him in the regular course of business is no defense in an action to recover the amount of the notes, unless the plaintiff had knowledge of that fact. Pittsburgh Nat. Bank v. Palmer, 22 Phila. Legal Int. 189.

And a person able to sign a note, and to remember the next morning that he had done so, and for what the note was given, cannot defeat an action on the note on the ground of complete intoxication. Caulkins v. Fry, 35 Conn. 170. But in this case the court said that complete intoxication, so as to deprive the party of his reason and understanding, would avoid a negotiable note in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value.

A guaranty obtained by fraud from an intoxicated person who is chargeable with negligence may be enforced against him by an innocent party who has acted to his prejudice, upon the faith of the guaranty which was addressed to him. Page v. Krekey, 137 N. Y. 307, 21 L. R. A. 409, 33 N. E. 311. In this case the court said: "While it has been quite uniformly held here that an instrument procured by fraud, trick, or artifice, or executed by a party in such a state of intoxication as to be incapable of consenting or contracting, is invalid as between the parties to the transaction, these facts do not always constitute a defense as against an innocent person, who is himself free from any fraud or negligence, and who has advanced money or property to another upon the credit afforded by an instrument like this." The court places this decision on the same ground as though the contract had been a negotiable note in the hands of a bona fide holder.

VIII. Implied contracts.

It seems that a drunkard may become bound on an implied contract.

Intoxication is no defense to an action on an implied contract for borrowed money. Haneklau v. Felchlin, 57 Mo. App. 602. In this case the court said there was a difference between express contracts and implied contracts; that intoxication might be a good defense against an express contract, but would not be against an implied contract.

An habitual drunkard may become liable for necessities. Brockway v. Jewell, 52 Ohio St. 187, 39 N. E. 470.

And an habitual drunkard may become bound for necessities by a contract made in his behalf by his brother with an attorney, who made application for the appointment of a guardian for the drunkard. Darby v. Cabanne, 1 Mo. App. 126. The court said that the contract may have been authorized by the drunkard at a time when he was sober, and a petition for services rendered was held not demurrable.

In Gore v. Gibson, 13 Mees. & W. 623, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 151, 9 Jur. 140, holding that an indorser on a bill could plead his intoxication as a defense to an action by an indorsee, it was said: "Where the right of action is grounded upon a specific, distinct contract, requiring the assent of both parties, and one of them is incapable of assenting, in such a case there can be no binding contract; but in many cases the law does not require an actual agreement between the parties, but implies a contract from the circumstances; in fact, the law itself makes the contract for the parties. Thus, in actions for money had and received to the plaintiff's use, or money paid by him to the defendant's use, the action may lie against the defendant, even though he may have protested against such a contract. So, a tradesman who supplies a drunken man with necessities may recover the price of them if the party keeps them when he becomes sober, although a count for goods bargained and sold would fail. In this case, the defendant is still liable for the consideration for his indorsement, although the indorsement itself can give the plaintiff no title."

In Devin v. Scott, 34 Ind. 67, it was said that if a recovery is to be sought on a contract made with an habitual drunkard for necessities, it must be alleged and proved that it was for necessities.

In Reinskopf v. Rogge, 37 Ind. 207, it was held that in an action upon a contract, where the defense was intoxication, the recovery, if any, must be on the contract, and not for the value of the goods sold.

IX. Obtaining relief.

In many cases the claim that the contract was made with an intoxicated person was coupled with the fact that undue advantage was taken, or that fraud was practised. In such cases relief is to be had as in cases of fraud. Where a consideration has passed to the person claimed to have been intoxicated, it is generally held that it is incumbent upon him to attempt a rescission by a tender of the consideration received before he can have the contract set aside, although in some cases where he is unable to return the consideration, and advantage has been taken of him, it has been held that equity will adjust such matters in the final decree. Where tender is not required it is generally held that it is not necessary that the intoxicated party should institute a suit in equity to have the contract set aside before he can plead that it is invalid on account of his intoxication.

In Pitt v. Smith, 3 Campb. 33, the court said: "Intoxication is good evidence upon a plea of non est factum to a deed, of non concessit to a grant, and of non assumpsit to a promise."

And the intoxicated person may rescind the contract. Cummings v. Henry, 10 Ind. 109.

And where a contract is made with an intoxicated person, no formal rescission of the invalid contract is necessary before bringing an action to set aside the contract. Baird v. Howard, 51 Ohio St. 57, 22 L. R. A. 846, 36 N. E. 732.

So, where a person by reason of intoxication was incapable of comprehending what he was doing, and he executed an assignment of an insurance policy, he may maintain an action to recover the policy or the value, without first instituting an action in equity to set aside the assignment. Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75, 58 Am. Rep. 848, 30 N. W. 290. In this case the court held that the plaintiff had received nothing on the sale of the policies, and his demand for the return of them was all that was necessary to a rescission of the contract of sale.

But in Mattair v. Card, 18 Fla. 761, it was held that where a married woman had been induced by artifice to purchase property at a price far beyond its value, and her husband joined her in giving a note and a mortgage, the husband being intoxicated and unfit to transact business at the time of executing the securities, the parties cannot, by answer, set up such matters as a defense in a suit to foreclose the mortgage. The remedy of such mortgagors is to file a bill, or a cross bill, to rescind the entire agreement, after tendering a reconveyance and placing the other party in statu quo. This was because the defendants were in possession, and had paid the six months' interest, and had not tendered a reconveyance, and a dismissal of the bill would have left them in possession of the property.

An action of assumpsit may be brought by a drunken purchaser to recover the money paid. Bush v. Breinig, 113 Pa. 310, 57 Am. Dec. 469, 6 Atl. 86.

And equity will set aside a contract made with an intoxicated person. French v. French, 8 Ohio, 214, 31 Am. Dec. 441.

So, equity will set aside a contract to purchase land, made by an intoxicated purchaser. Hotchkiss v. Fortson, 7 Yerg. 87.

A court of equity will decree rescission. (Calhoun v. Witherspoon, 40 N. C. [5 Fred. Eq.] 128), and will set aside a sale, where the vendor was intoxicated. Reynolds v. Waller, 1 Wash. (Va.) 164.

If a vendor of shares was drunk, and is unable to restore the consideration, equity will make provision for its repayment in the final decree. Thackrah v. Haas, 119 U. S. 499, 30 L. ed. 486, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 311.

And will set aside a deed made by a drunken grantor. Johnson v. Phifer, 6 Neb. 401; Donelson v. Posey, 13 Ala. 752; Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. 346, 22 Am. Dec. 519; Lavette v. Sage, 29 Conn. 577.

And will set aside a voluntary deed. Clifton v. Davis, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 81.

Equity will set aside a conveyance made without consideration by a drunken grantor. Warneck v. Campbell, 25 N. J. Eq. 485.

A conveyance will be set aside where the grantor was drunk, and the grantor will be required to refund the consideration paid. Harvey v. Peck, 1 Munf. 518; Nielson v. Laffin, 50 N. Y. S. R. 277, 21 N. Y. Supp. 731.

And a conveyance obtained from a drunken grantor by fraud will be set aside. Dunn v. Amos, 14 Wis. 107. In this case it was held that a tender back of the money paid was not necessary.

And an injunction against waste was allowed where the grantor of a deed was intoxicated. Staats v. Freeman, 6 N. J. Eq. 490.

It was held not necessary to return the discharge in order to avoid a settlement of a groundless action. Foss v. Hildreth, 10 Allen, 76.

The purchaser of a note from a person who at the time is mentally incapacitated on account of intoxication is not void, but voidable, and the owner of such note, having tendered the consideration received, may maintain an action of conversion against such party. Harlan v. Brown, 4 Ind. App. 319, 30 N. E. 928.

If a bill of sale is voidable, either on the ground of fraud or drunkenness, the plaintiff, before he can avoid it and maintain an action for the value of the property thus transferred, must place the defendant in statu quo, by refunding to him what he has advanced in pursuance of the contract. McGuire v. Callahan, 19 Ind. 128.

So, in order to defend against a contract as void on the ground of intoxication at the time of its execution, the party complaining must have restored what was received by him on the contract, before he will be relieved from its obligations. Joest v. Williams, 42 Ind. 565, 13 Am. Rep. 377. In this case it was said, as to whether or not the maker of the note was so much intoxicated as to be incapable of binding himself, there is much doubt.

And the failure of a party, when sober, to restore the consideration and rescind the contract alleged to have been executed when intoxicated will prevent him from avoiding the contract. Mansfield v. Watson, 2 Iowa, 111. In this case the court held that the weight of evidence showed, also, that the party was not so intoxicated as not to be able to understand what he was doing.

In Berkley v. Cannon, 4 Rich. L. 136, it was held that in an action for debt on a note as the specific and only cause of action, such note being given for a chattel purchased by a drunkard, if the jury find the note to be void, they cannot give the plaintiff the value of the chattel. The court held that the doctrine of rescission of contracts did not apply to a case where the note was wholly void, and not merely voidable.

A recognizance cannot be impeached collaterally for the want of capacity, occasioned by drunkenness, of the person by whom it was acknowledged. Doe ex dem. Cooper v. Harter, 1 Ind. 427, 2 Ind. 252. In this case the court held: "But the statute gives it the same force and effect as a judgment confessed in a court of record, and it stands upon higher ground than if it had been an agreement in pais. It is to be inferred that the judges, or other proper officers of the court, would not have permitted a recognizance to be entered by a person absolutely deprived of his understanding by drunkenness. If, by any means, a recognizance entered into by a person in such condition should get upon the records of a court, it would, no doubt, be set aside on proper proceedings for that purpose; but, while standing in full force, a recognizance cannot be impeached collaterally for the want of capacity of the person by whom it was acknowledged."

X. Who may show intoxication of party.

The old rule that a party to a contract could not plead his intoxication or stultify himself was changed at an early date, and it is generally held that a party may show that he was intoxicated so as to avoid a contract. This rule extends to his personal representatives and heirs. But other parties cannot take advantage of this, for the general rule is that such contracts are only voidable, and may be ratified. Third parties cannot claim that it was invalid if the real party affected does not repudiate the same.

In French v. French, 8 Ohio, 214, 31 Am. Dec. 441, it was said that a contract made in such a state of intoxication as to deprive the party of his discretion and ordinary judgment will be set aside in equity, at the instance of his heirs, although the other party had no agency in producing the intoxication. In this case the court said: "It was once supposed to be the law that a deed obtained from a drunken man could not for that cause be avoided. But a more rational rule now prevails; and the law, now regarding the fact of intoxication, and not the cause or author of it, and regarding that fact as affording proof of a want of capacity to contract, which is one of the elements of every agreement, will interfere to relieve. Thus, if a deed is obtained by the exercise of an undue influence over a man whose mind is incapable of acting freely and voluntarily, such deed will be decreed to be canceled."

And the personal representatives of a party to a contract may avoid it on the ground that he was drunk when he executed it, although such drunkenness was not occasioned by the procurement of the other party to the contract. Wiggiesworth v. Steers, 1 Hen. & M. 70, 3 Am. Dec. 602. In this case the drunkard gave a bond for a deed in exchange for other land, and the grantee obtained possession, but never gave the grantor any deed, although he offered to exchange deeds.

A bill in equity by the heirs at law to set aside a conveyance, charging that it was fraudulently and unconsciously obtained without any, or, if any, a totally inadequate, consideration from their ancestor, who, from habitual intoxication and being almost incessantly under the influence of liquor, or from debility of body and mind arising from a long fit of intoxication from which he was then just recovering, was incapable of transacting business with discretion; and that while he was legally incompetent to make any disposition of his property the defendants, for a totally inadequate consideration, procured from him a conveyance, was held good on demurrer. Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. 346, 22 Am. Dec. 510.

And heirs at law may, on the ground of intoxication of their ancestor, attack a contract made by their ancestor with another party. Hotchkiss v. Fortson, 7 Yerg. 67.

In Lazell v. Pinnick, 1 Tyler (Vt.) 247, 4 Am. Dec. 722, the court said: "It has been ruled by this court, that even where a person was made drunken, and enticed to sign a promissory note, he was afterwards permitted to give evidence of the fact, and thus avoided it. The English authorities go no further than to estop a person from stultifying himself. The rule is never extended to the heirs, executors, or administrators."

But a defendant in replevin cannot show that a bill of sale of another party to the plaintiff was made while such party was drunk, as a contract made by a drunken man is not void, but voidable only by the party or his representatives. Broadwater v. Darne, 10 Mo. 277.

And drunkenness does not render a deed made under its influence absolutely void, but only voidable, so long as the grantor in the deed acquiesces in it; and it cannot be impeached by third persons on the ground that it was executed by him when drunk. Eaton v. Perry, 29 Mo. 96.

Voluntary intoxication short of deprivation of reason, unless the opposite party has contributed to produce it, will not disable a person to waive a right to bind himself by a contract, in the absence of fraud or imposition; and his bail, knowing his condition at the time of executing a bail bond, cannot exonerate themselves for that reason. Weldon v. Colquitt, 62 Ga. 449, 35 Am. Rep. 128. In this case the court said: "He was competent to waive his right to be legally tried by the magistrate, and to enter into a binding contract for his appearance at the superior court. It is not pretended that the state, or any of its officers, had any agency in producing his drunkenness. Code, § 2737. His condition, whatever it was, was known to his bail when they united with him in executing the bond. Had his intoxication been such as to disable him to contract, they, as his sureties, being aware of his disability, would have been bound. Code, § 2149. The contract was as beneficial to him as it would have been if he had been sober. By entering into it, the bail procured his discharge from imprisonment, and established a friendly custody of him in themselves. He is not urging the invalidity of the bond, and they cannot urge it for any disability on his part of which they had knowledge."

XI. Summary.

What degree of drunkenness will invalidate a contract made by such party seems a little uncertain, but it may be said that, as a general rule, where the party is so intoxicated as not to know what he is doing, his contract is invalid. Especially when a contract is obtained by taking advantage of an intoxicated person, or by perpetrating a fraud upon him while in that condition, or by reason of intoxication produced by the other party, it will be held invalid. But a contract that is invalid by reason of intoxication may be ratified by the drunkard on becoming sober, and then it will be binding. After an inquisition finding that a person is an habitual drunkard he is incapable of making a valid contract until the judgment has been revoked. Intoxication of the maker of a negotiable note is not any defense as against a bona fide holder for value. A drunkard may become liable on an implied contract for necessities. Where the intoxication of the contracting party was complete, and he has not ratified the contract, the general rule is that he may plead that the contract is void because made when he was in such a condition that he did not know what he was doing. He may also rescind the contract, or may institute a suit in equity to have it set aside. The general rule is that he must return the consideration received, before he can maintain that the contract is void. A party may plead his intoxication in order to invalidate a contract, and so may his heirs and representatives; but this cannot be done by a third party.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

v.
 BARBER ASPHALT PAVING COMPANY,
Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

Compliance with the specific directions for the abatement of the nuisance, in a decree enjoining the conducting of a business in such a way that the dust and fumes therefrom constitute a nuisance, will not absolve defendant from liability to punishment for contempt in failing to obey the general clause of the decree, in case such directions prove insufficient.

(April 16, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Wayne County finding it guilty of contempt in failing to obey a decree of court, and imposing a fine therefor. Affirmed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

Thirty complainants, residents or property owners in the vicinity of the works of the defendant company, filed a bill July 16, 1898, to enjoin the defendant's business as a nuisance, injurious to the health, on account of noxious vapors, odors, stench, dust, and gases emitted from its works. The case was heard before Judge Carpenter, of the Wayne circuit court, and on August 13, 1898, he filed an opinion in which he said: "The complainants have suffered much (more, I think, than from the odor) from the dust arising from the handling of crushed stone in the defendant's works. In my judgment, this suffering could have been avoided, had defendant used proper appliances and due care. It is to be hoped that the improvements decided upon by the defendant will abate the dust nuisance. If they do not, additions or changes will be made in the manner hereafter directed, which will abate it." He then ordered a reference to an expert, Mr. Charles F. Burton, to take proofs, and determine and report the most practicable method of abating the dust nuisance and of diminishing the odor. Mr. Burton took proofs, made his report, and on February 1, 1900, a decree was entered declaring defendant's works, as operated, to be a nuisance, creating offensive and injurious fumes, stench, gases, and dust, and reciting that it satisfactorily appeared that by the use of certain measures and appliances the defendant could effectually subdue and confine to its own premises the offensive and injurious qualities of such fumes, etc. The decree then states: "Therefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said defendant shall immediately cover the vats in which the asphalt is boiled with a substantial metal cover, and shall cause the steam and other matter arising from said boiling asphalt to be conducted to and passed through the fires in the furnace of said works, to destroy such fumes, stench, gases, and dust complained of in the bill of complaint filed in this cause, and shall cover the settling chamber or dust collector, to which the bulk of the dust complained of shall be carried and stored, with two or more thicknesses of cloth, so as to prevent the emission of dust as complained of in said bill. It is further ordered that said defendant company shall be forever restrained from permitting to be emitted from its said works, fumes, stench, gases, and dust offensive and injurious as aforesaid in such quantities as to materially injure the health of said complainants, or either of them, or to in any way interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of their homes." On July 18, 1900, one of the complainants presented a petition setting forth no abatement of the nuisance, and charging a wilful disobedience of the decree, and asked that the defendant be punished for contempt. The answer is as follows: "This defendant, answering, says: That it has fully complied with the decree of this court. That it has caused its vats to be covered, and has caused all steam and other matters arising from the melting asphalt to be passed through the fires of a furnace, and has caused the dust collector to be covered with cloth, as directed in said decree. A more particular description of the work done to insure the carrying out of the terms of said decree, and of the directions given to its employees in relation thereto, are set forth in the exhibits hereto annexed. That this defendant in good faith has endeavored to carry out the provisions of said decree. It caused its vats and dust collectors to be covered as directed; and the vapors and dust to be collected and carried by fans and taken care of as directed; but, the apparatus not proving efficient in practice, this defendant has recently caused the entire apparatus to be reconstructed, at a cost of upward of $2,000, and this defendant avers that the same is a full compliance with the provisions of said decree. Said apparatus was constructed and put in operation within the present month, and about ten days before the filing of said petition, and the employees have had, necessarily, to become familiar with its operation, to secure the best results. This defendant avers that it is its intention if the present apparatus, after a fair trial of its efficiency, should not prove entirely satisfactory in practice, to further improve the same so far as it may be practicable to do so. This defendant further says that, from the nature of the business, it is not practicable to remove all odors of asphalt. If asphalt paving is to be laid at all in the city, it is essential that the plant be located on or near to the line of a railroad, because the great weight and bulk of the material used, and the great cost of such transportation by wagons for a great distance, make it impracticable to locate the plant at a great distance from a line of railroad, and, further, that the fact that the material must be laid upon the street while heated to a temperature of upward of 300 degrees, as well as the great cost of hauling, renders it indispensable that the works be located near to the streets to be paved; that in loading and hauling the heated asphalt from the works to the street being paved, and during the progress of paving, the odors of heated asphalt will necessarily be given off, and there is no practicable means of preventing it; that the wagons engaged in hauling the material to the streets now in course of paving pass near to petitioner's dwelling, and this defendant believes and avers that any odors which may be smelled by petitioner or his family emanate from the material which is being loaded or while being hauled near to said dwelling, and are not given off during the process of preparation or manufacture. This defendant avers that the odor of asphalt so given off during the loading and hauling is not unhealthful, nor does it produce any said discomfort as gives a right to petitioners to complain." Issue was joined, and a large amount of testimony was taken before Judge Hosmer, who, by the consent of the parties, visited the defendant's works and saw them in operation. He found the defendant guilty, and imposed a fine of $150. After referring to his examination of the works and to the testimony, and stating that the fumes are not noxious to him, his opinion proceeds: "Under these circumstances, I cannot but find that the defendant has been guilty of the violation of the injunction. A finding of this character, I think, probably will preclude any annoyance in the future. Of course, there is no one before the court except the defendant itself, which is a corporation; but if there was a subsequent violation the officers of the corporation might be easily joined, or those in charge of the building, in an application for contempt proceedings. As it is now, in view of the fact that the repairs or the alterations were made under the express direction of the court, I cannot but believe there is a certain element of good faith about it, but at the same time I have no doubt that it did continue with the operation of the works after it must have become apparent to them that there was a violation of the injunction."

The condition of the defendant works since the untiring efforts of the corporation to prevent any nuisance from being created have been studiously employed has been such that the doctrine of "proper management," as claimed in McMorran v. Fitzgerald, 106 Mich. 649, 64 N. W. 569, can never apply.

The plant is a nuisance; and the testimony offered in the contempt proceedings fully proves that statement.

16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 950-954.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is evident from reading the opinion of Judge Carpenter that in entering this decree he followed the case of Ballentine v. Webb, 84 Mich. 39, 13 L. R. A. 321, 47 N. W. 485, and made a reference to ascertain what could be done to prevent the escape of the dust and the noxious vapors. He recognized the business of the defendant as a legitimate one, which could not be restrained by the injunction of the court until all proper means had been tried to prevent the escape of dust, noxious vapors, etc. Upon the filing of the report he decreed certain specific things to be done, and to this added the general clause. It is a fair inference from Judge Hosmer's opinion that he finds that defendant complied with this order, as to the preventives directed by the court, but that they failed to accomplish the object; that this failure was known to the defendant, and yet it continued the nuisance. The result of Judge Hosmer's findings is either that the defendant can, by proper precautions, avoid the dust and fumes which are injurious, or that it must and will close its works entirely, for he states that his finding "probably will preclude any annoyance in the future." In what manner it will preclude the annoyance does not clearly appear. The testimony on the part of the complainants is that the dust and vapors are worse than they were before the original decree was entered, and the devices and means therein provided carried out. If this be so, and their testimony as to the effect upon the inhabitants is true, and no means can be devised to prevent it, clearly the defendant's business should be enjoined in toto. The case would then clearly fall within Robinson v. Baugh, 31 Mich. 290; McMorran v. Fitzgerald, 106 Mich. 642, 64 N. W. 569; and People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 9 L. R. A. 722, 46 N. W. 735.

It is the contention of the defendant that the specific precautions decreed to be taken by it control; that it complied with those precautions, and, if they failed to produce the desired result, it cannot be held guilty of contempt for proceeding to carry on its business contrary to the general clause of the decree; and that complainants must proceed against it by filing a supplemental petition in the original case. Its counsel claim that these particular provisions control the general language of the decree, invoking the rule that is applied in the construction of statutes, and citing Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 399, 295. It is also urged that we should look to the opinion of Judge Carpenter, citing Third Reformed Dutch Church v. Fox, 12 Phila. 296. None of the issues in the original case can be retried in this proceeding. They are res judicata. The decree prescribed certain things to be done, which, in the opinion of the court, might effect a remedy. The court, however, saw fit to add a clause in unmistakable language prohibiting the carrying on of the business to the injury of the health of the complainants, or to the interference with the comfortable enjoyment of their homes. The plain purpose of this clause was to prohibit the business unless the injurious effects upon the complainants and their families could be obviated by the use of the means proposed, or by other means. The defendant, under the finding of the court, found these specific provisions a failure, and yet that the defendant continued to carry on its business in a manner which it knew was in violation of the injunction. The complainants in the chancery suit were not required to investigate the defendant's plant, determine what it had done, and virtually commence another proceeding. The facts were peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant. Complainants could only be expected to know that the nuisance continued, and had the right to proceed upon the theory that its continuance was in violation of the decree. When the defendant ascertained that these provisions were ineffectual, it could 54 L. R. A.

have tried other means without any violation of the injunction; or it could have applied to the court for leave to provide other means, if it was advised that it could not proceed without the direction of the court. Its answer shows that it was contemplating other means if the ones adopted should prove ineffectual.

Under the findings of the court, we think that the order adjudging the defendant guilty of contempt should be sustained, and it is affirmed, with costs.

Long, J., did not sit. The other Justices concur.

v.

BESSEMER STEAMSHIP COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The master's liability for injury to a servant by a defective tool furnished for his use is not defeated by the fact that the defective condition was known to a fellow servant who procured the tool for use by himself and the injured one, and who was therefore negligent with regard to such use.
2. A judgment will not be reversed for failure of the trial court to expressly state that certain requested instructions are given, where it states that counsel have handed it some requests as stating propositions of law by which the jury should be guided in determining their verdict, and proceeds to read them to the jury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Bay County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. A. E. Weadock and J. O. Weadock, for plaintiff in error:

In work of the character that plaintiff was doing, pieces of steel and iron will fly, when and where no one can foretell. The eye is the vital part of the anatomy that the force of the blow is usually sufficient to injure, and the risk of the employment is well understood, and, as a matter of law, is assumed by the employee.

Upon the theory of plaintiff's own testimony, he was negligent; and upon the theory of Lapan's testimony, Lapan was negligent; and upon either theory the accident was either the ordinary risk of the employment, or was the result of the negligence of Noble or his fellow servant Lapan.

Messrs. Pierce & Kinnane, for defendant in error:

Lepan used the defective tool only after he had exhausted every effort to get a better one, and he says he had to work. Concede that Lepan was negligent. The defendant was guilty of negligence also, and when, as in this case, although Lepan and Noble were fellow servants, the negligence of defendant contributes to the injury, the law says plaintiff can recover.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case for the recovery of damages on account of the loss of an eye. From a judgment of $4,000, obtained by plaintiff, defendant has brought the case here by writ of error.

Plaintiff was employed as calker upon a vessel being constructed at F. W. Wheeler & Co.'s yard in West Bay City by defendant. Wheeler & Co. had commenced the work, but, failing in the performance of its contract, the defendant took the yard and crew, and proceeded to finish it. Plaintiff commenced working for Wheeler & Co., and continued when defendant took over the operation of the yard. Plaintiff and his witnesses testified that on July 26, 1899, plaintiff was engaged in striking with a riveting hammer a soft-head held against a rivet then being put in on the bulkhead bar of a vessel by one John Lepan. A piece of steel flew from the soft-head, and struck him in the eye, putting it out. The soft-head in question was made from a riveting hammer, and it is claimed that the head which was to be struck with the riveting hammer was not properly tempered. Plaintiff had been a riveter for four years and upward, and claims he knew nothing about the condition the soft-head in question was in. The defendant furnished the tools used by its employees. There were between 50 and 60 riveting gangs then at work for defendant in the yard, each gang consisting of four men—a head riveter, an assistant riveter, a heater, and a holderon. John Lepan was head riveter of the gang in which plaintiff was working. A tool storeroom was maintained by the defendant, in charge of a keeper named Gereoux, whose duty was to give out and furnish tools to the workmen. It is the claim of the plaintiff that Lepan went to the storeroom for a soft-head, and Gereoux gave out one to him, but before using it at all Lepan returned it to Gereoux, and complained of its defective condition. Lepan testified as follows: "I did not pick out the tool myself. Gereoux gave it to me. 54 L. R. A.

He was the man in charge of the storeroom where the employees were accustomed to go for tools to do their work. The soft-head which he gave me was made from a broken riveting hammer, the hammer end being cut off. It was too hard, because it had been tempered as a riveting hammer, and the temper had not been taken out so to make it a soft-head. I took it back to the storeroom the same day I received it, and wanted to get another one. Mr. Gereoux told me, if I could find a better one, to take it; but he said that was the best one he had in the storeroom. I looked over the rest of the soft-heads in the storeroom, and they were all worn out, and not fit for use. He had them thrown in one pile of cull tools. I told Mr. Gereoux that I did not want to use the tool. He said 'I will give you an order to go to the blacksmith and get it fixed.' He gave me an order to go to the blacksmith, and the blacksmith told me he could not fix any more tools unless I would get an order from Mr. Gilkey, who was foreman of all the riveters on all the boats. The blacksmith referred to was the man employed by the company to repair tools for the machine shop and the riveters. That was his business. I then went to Mr. Gilkey for an order, and told him what was the matter with the tool. He said: 'John, I cannot give you an order. I have got to finish those boats with the tools we have got. I was told by the company not to make any more expense on these boats. They would have to be done with the tools we had. To do the best we could.' I then went right down, and went to work. That was the day before Noble started to work with me. After Noble came, we used the soft-head on three rivets. We hadn't finished the third one; just two and a half. We were finishing the third one, when this piece broke, and Noble was injured. We had not used it before he was injured, and the soft-head had remained without use from the time I took it to the shop until the time Noble was hurt. It was kept in a keg, with other tools, except when we had to shift from one boat to another. I did not tell Noble that I did not think it was a safe tool to work with, because, if I told him, he would have quit, the same as the other one quit before, and I would be out of work." Plaintiff also claimed that at the time of the injury he was striking the soft-head as riveters usually do, and Lepan was holding it against the rivet in the usual way, and that he did not know the dangerous condition of the soft-head. The defendant denied that the tool was not reasonably safe for use, and also denied Lepan's version of his obtaining the tool.

In his charge to the jury, after stating the claims of the parties, the trial judge said: "The claim of the plaintiff—and I say to you the only ground in this case on which the plaintiff can recover—is the claim that the soft-head which he struck with that hammer was not a safe tool, was not reasonably safe to be used by men engaged in riveting as these men were at that time.

Now, a hammer or soft-head might be safe when given out to workmen, and it might become unsafe by reason of its use by them; but I say to you as a matter of law in this case, and I wish you to distinctly remember that part of it, that the defendant in this case is not liable in case you find that the defect in this soft-head, if you find it was defective, was caused by the use that it had had. The plaintiff claims that at the time Lapan got it from the storehouse, or at the time he first commenced to use it, he discovered that it was not a safe tool to use, and if you find that to be the fact,—if you find that at the time Lapan got this soft-head from the storehouse it was not then a reasonably safe tool with which to do the class of work which it was expected by the defendant Lapan and those associated with him would do,—then the company is negligent. The law imposes the duty upon those who employ laborers and who furnish them with tools to use to see to it that those tools are reasonably safe and fit for the use for which they are intended; and when Lapan went to the storehouse, if he was given this tool by the person whose duty it was to keep those tools and deliver them out to the men, that was a representation by the defendant itself that that tool was reasonably safe and fit for use. Now, it appears from the testimony that Lapan, before he used it, discovered that it was not so, as he claims. That would not be any defense to this defendant in this case unless you find that it became so from use. If this tool was reasonably safe and fit for use at the time Lapan got it, then the company has done all that their duty called upon them to do; but when Lapan took it back, and asked for another, the company, while they should have given him another, or should have put this in proper order as a matter of mere right, were not under any legal obligation to do it. He knew that the tool was unsafe, and it was his option either to work with it or to quit. If he continued to work with it after he knew it was unsafe, he was guilty of just as much negligence as the company was, and you haven't any right to award a verdict against the defendant in this case by reason of the fact that they refused to repair this tool for Lapan. That is not in the case at all, as far as your consideration of it is concerned. The first question for you to determine, and the important question, is, What was the condition of this soft-head at the time it was furnished to Lapan to work with? It seems that he was the boss or the head of the gang of riveters. He had charge of that particular gang, and this soft-head was furnished to him for the use of that gang. Now, the question is, What was the condition of it at that time? The plaintiff claims it was unsafe to use; that it was a broken riveting hammer; and that the temper had not been abstracted from the head of it that had been broken. Now, from the testimony of the witnesses in this case you must determine what you believe the fact to be. If you find that the hammer at that time was in a reasonably safe and fit condition for use, then the plaintiff in this case cannot recover, no matter what you may find the other facts to be. On the other hand, if you find that that hammer at that time was not a reasonably safe tool with which to perform the work that the company designed for it, then the next question for you to determine is, Had the plaintiff, Noble, himself knowledge of the fact that it was unsafe? If he had, and he continued to use it after he had that knowledge, then he cannot recover in this case. After a man discovers that a tool is unsafe, if he continues to use it under the circumstances detailed by the witnesses in this case, without protest to his employer, and he did not protest, and I might add further, without a promise to fix it up, and ask him to use it a little while, until they could get a chance to fix it, those are the only circumstances under which he would be relieved of the knowledge that he had, if you find he did have it, that the tool was unsafe. As bearing upon that question whether or not Noble had knowledge that his tool was unsafe, if you find it was unsafe, you have a right to consider the manner in which the work was being carried on. You have a right to consider the fact as to whether it required a careful examination of the tool itself to determine its condition, or whether one could tell by a casual glance at it. You have heard the testimony of the witnesses. And, even though you may find that Noble's attention was not particularly called to the defect in this tool by Lapan, if you find as a fact from the evidence, exercising your common sense as applied to the fact, that Noble did know as to what the condition of this soft-head was at the time it was used that day, and that he knew it was unsafe, then I say to you, as a matter of law, that he cannot recover in this suit. I think I have already said to you that if this soft-head was in a reasonably safe condition for use at the time Lapan got it, and if during the time that he was using it, by use or otherwise, it became in a defective condition, and unsafe and unfit for use, that the plaintiff could not recover in this case. In that case the negligence of his fellow servant, Lapan, in working with the tool, would be counted as the negligence of the plaintiff, and it would prevent his recovery. To make that plain to you, perhaps, I should say further, if two men are working together for a common employer, at the same class of work, and one is injured through the negligence of the other, of course the employer himself is not responsible to the one who is injured. He does not guarantee to a man, when he sets him to work, that all the other workmen with whom he is engaged will exercise care and caution. A man, when he goes to work among a number of others, must in law be held to realize that he accepts all the dangers which are naturally incident to the business; and, if the injury in this case was caused by the negligence of his fellow servant, Lapan, then he cannot recover. I desire to make that particularly clear to you, and I say to you again, if you find that this soft-head was in proper condition, and fit for use, at the time Lapan got it, then the company had done their full duty to Lapan and the plaintiff. They had furnished him a reasonably safe tool for use, and, if Lapan afterward discovered that by use it became unfit for use, and continued to use it, he could not recover had he been injured; and, if he could not recover, the plaintiff could not recover, because his injury is caused by the negligence of Lapan in using this tool. If, however, it was not reasonably safe and fit for use at the time Lapan got it from the shop, then I say to you, as a matter of law, that, no matter if Lapan did use it after he knew it was unfit for use, the company were negligent themselves in failing to provide their workmen with an article or tool that was reasonably safe and fit for use, and the plaintiff can recover. You have a right, in determining these questions, to consider the nature of the tool. It is not an intricate piece of machinery. It had been exhibited before you, and your common sense may be applied to the question as to whether or not men who had had experience such as the plaintiff claims he had in the use of such tools would, by ordinary observation, have been able to determine whether or not this tool was safe or not. If you find that he knew it was not safe, and still continued to use it, he cannot recover in this case. Counsel have handed me some requests, as stating propositions of law by which you should be guided in determining your verdict. 'It is the duty of the plaintiff to satisfy you by a preponderance of evidence that all the material allegations of the plaintiff are true, and, unless he has done so, you must find a verdict for the defendant.' 'The defendant is not an insurer of his employees against accidents, and the fact that plaintiff has lost an eye by an accident in and of itself does not entitle the plaintiff to a verdict.' 'Before you can find a verdict for the plaintiff, you must be satisfied that the defendant failed to supply the plaintiff with a reasonably fit safe tool with which to work, and that the plaintiff, on account of such failure, and wholly without negligence on his part, was injured.' 'If you find that the tool in question was a reasonably safe one, and that the accident was such a one as might happen by the ordinary use of tools reasonably safe, then it was a risk of the employment, which the plaintiff assumes, and he cannot recover.' Defendant's counsel has also suggested that I should say something to you in the way of instruction relative to their omission to produce Gereoux, the man who kept the shop, as a witness. That omission upon their part has been strongly commented upon by the attorney for the plaintiff, and it is not, perhaps, out of place that I should say something to you about it. Mr. Gereoux might, of course, have been called by either party. The plaintiff would have a right to call him, or the defendant would have that right. It appears by the statement of counsel that he is outside of the jurisdiction of this court,— that he is in New York state, where he could not be reached by a subpoena of the court; and I say to you that, unless you find as a fact in this case that the defendant had some reason for not procuring Gereoux as a witness, and, even if they had, that the plaintiff had just as much right to call him as the defense, and you shall not infer anything against the defense in this case by reason of their omission to call him as a witness. He is not a party to the case, and the plaintiff had the same right to call him as the defendant."

Upon the trial the judge was requested to direct a verdict in favor of defendant. It is insisted that, as Lapan knew the hammer was a defective one, it was negligence for him to use it; that he was a fellow servant of plaintiff; and that one of the ordinary risks incident to the employment of the plaintiff was the negligence of his fellow servants, and for that reason the plaintiff cannot recover,—citing Hefferen v. Northern P. R. Co. 45 Minn. 471, 48 N. W. 1; Rawley v. Colliau, 90 Mich. 31, 51 N. W. 350; Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co. 118 Mich. 275, 76 N. W. 497. We do not think those authorities are conclusive of this case. In the Hefferen Case the court said that the condition of the tool was the ordinary result of use, "and if a workman should, of his own choice, and unnecessarily, use a tool thus plainly defective, when others were provided for his use, he is not absolved from the consequences of his own choice. . . . He [the servant] may . . . in general, assume without particular inspection that the instruments which he is thus required to use are reasonably safe; but when, from use, they have become obviously defective and unfit, and the master has provided others, so that the servant knows that he is not required to use the former, the reason of the law holding the master to responsibility is inapplicable. . . . According to the evidence, it must be taken as a fact that the servants used this particular tool because they did not choose to get another." In Rawley v. Colliau it was said: "The hammer which caused the injury had been in use for a long time, and its condition had been brought about by such use. . . . We cannot assume as a matter of law that the defendants were negligent because this sledge hammer was lying about the shop with its face cracked or battered, when there were others that were sound, and in fit and safe condition for use, and when neither the plaintiff nor any of his fellow employees were obliged or directed by defendants to use this particular hammer in their work, and when they could have used a hammer not defective." The court further says: "If this hammer had been the only one in the shop, or the only one that could be used, or defendants had directed it to be used knowing its condition, another case would be presented." In Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co. the court said: "The record shows defendant furnished an excellent quality of steel from which to make the tool. It was made by a competent blacksmith. There is no claim that when made it was not a proper tool with which to do the work required. . . . The men were not required or expected to use a tool after it became unsafe because of use or for any other cause. They were at liberty to take a defective tool at once to the blacksmith, and have it repaired or get a new one in its place. . . . The only testimony to the contrary is given by the plaintiff, who never saw the tool, but was of the opinion, judging from the appearance of the small piece of steel taken from his eye, the tool was not a proper one to use." In none of these cases was it shown that the master, the alter ego, knew the tool was defective, and, after such knowledge, directed its continued use, the injured person not knowing of the defect. In the Hefferen Case it was also said: "The responsibility of the master for injuries resulting from unsafe instruments or machinery may be said to rest upon the ground that these are the means by which the servant is expected and required to do his work. The master furnishes them for that purpose, and expects and intends that the servant shall use them. The servant knows that this is expected of him. He may, therefore, in general, assume, without particular inspection, that the instruments which he is thus required to use are reasonably safe. But when, from use, they have become obviously defective and unfit, and the master has provided others, so that the servant knows that he is not required to use the former, the reason of the law holding the master to responsibility is inapplicable. If the master provides the proper tools for the use of his servants, responsibility for neglect to remove from the premises such as have become obviously unfit for use, if such responsibility exists, must rest, not on the ground that it is the duty of the master to furnish reasonably safe means for the prosecution of the work which his servants are required to do, but upon the ground that he is chargeable with negligence in suffering dangerous things to be where his servants may be injured by them. This principle is applicable under many circumstances, — as in respect to concealed dangers, like a pitfall. It cannot be applied under the circumstances here stated without ignoring the duty of the servant to exercise ordinary care in respect to matters concerning, which he has no right to assume that there is no danger. If he knows that safe tools are provided for his use, he cannot be expected to use those which have become so defective that the defects could not be overlooked." In the case of Paulmier v. Erie R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 155, an engine broke through a trestle, killing a fireman. It was claimed the engineer knew of the insecurity of the trestle-work, and had been directed not to go upon it. It was claimed in that case, as it is claimed here, that, because the negligence of the fellow servant contributed to the injury, there could be no recovery; but it was held the company was liable. In Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. 78 Mich. 513, 7 L. R. A. 54 L. R. A.

500, 44 N. W. 502, Justice Champlin had occasion to refer to this case, and used the following language: "The defendant requested a charge to the effect that, although the jury might find the defendant guilty of negligence, yet, if the fellow servant of deceased contributed to produce his death, the plaintiff could not recover. This request was rightly refused. The correct rule, and the reason for it is stated in Paulmier v. Erie R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 155, as follows: 'The servant does not agree to take the chance of any negligence on the part of his employer, and no case has gone so far as to hold that where such negligence contributes to the injury, the servant may not recover. It would be both unjust and innolitic to suffer the master to evade the penalty for his misconduct in neglecting to provide properly for the security of his servant. Contributory negligence, to defeat a right of action, must be that of the party injured.' Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 700, 27 L. ed. 266. 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Keegan v. Western R. Corp. 8 N. Y. 175, 59 Am. Dec. 476; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Sirett, 45 Ill. 197, 92 Am. Dec. 200; 2 Thomp. Neg. 98; Perry v. Lansing, 17 Hun, 34; Busch v. Buffalo Creek R. Co. 29 Hun, 112; Gray v. Philadelphia R. Co. 24 Fed. 168." See also Sclleck v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 93 Mich. 380, 18 L. R. A. 154, 53 N. W. 556.

Exception is taken to the manner in which the trial judge gave defendant's request to charge. Counsel state their contention as follows: "It will be observed that the circuit judge failed to say that he gave the request so read by him, or that the propositions of law therein were correct. During the argument of the law questions, the jury was excused from attendance upon the court, and it had no means of knowing that the particular requests were only part of those made, and therefore considered by the court to be correct. The court simply stated that counsel had handed them up as stating the law. Upon information, we will say that parties who heard the charge did not understand that the requests read were given. We wish to say that we understood them to be given, and were somewhat chagrined when informed that the jury did not; but, upon reading the charge, we see the force of the claim, and it is apparent that the jury was not given to understand that the requests as handed up embodied the law upon the subjects mentioned therein, and should control them in arriving at their verdict. This is made more apparent when attention is given to the court's action in relation to the oral requests, for in that case he stated the oral requests, and then proceeded to state his view. We were entitled to have these requests given, and, had we been impressed with the true situation at the time the charge was delivered, we should have called the court's attention to it; but the error cannot now be remedied except upon a new trial." If the record was in a condition to raise the question, we do not think the point is well taken. A reading of the charge in connection with what occurred satisfies us the jury must have understood the requests were given.

Complaint is also made of that part of the charge referring to the oral request to charge the jury that they have no right to consider the failure of the defendant to procure the attendance of Mr. Gereoux as a witness. It is said the court told the jury that it might find the defendant had some reason for not procuring Gereoux as a witness, and, if so, then that should be considered. We do not so understand the charge. The request to charge was not in writing, but was oral, and evidently the court did not have much time to consider it. While the language used by the court at first is somewhat involved, it calls the attention of the jury to the statement of counsel as to why Mr. Gereoux was not present, and concludes by saying to the jury: "You shall not infer anything against the defense in this case by reason of their omission to call him as a witness. He is not a party to the case, and the plaintiff had the same right to call him as the defendant." We do not think the jury could have failed to understand this plain language.

Other questions are discussed by counsel. We have examined them carefully, but do not deem it necessary to refer to them further in this opinion. Many questions of fact were in dispute. We think they were properly submitted to the jury.

Judgment is affirmed.

The other Justices concur.

v.

TOLEDO, SAGINAW, & MUSKEGON RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....Mich.....)

A shed of a third person under which a railroad company runs a spar track is within the rule that the working place furnished by the master must be reasonably safe, to the extent that the company is bound to see that the roof does not fall upon brakemen who are required to go there for cars.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gratiot County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Watson & Chapman for plaintiff in error.

Mr. E. W. Meddaugh, with Messrs. Geer & Williams, for defendant in error.

There is a fatal variance between the pleadings and the proof.

NOTE.—As to liability of railroad company to employee for injuries received in the line of his duty from defective track not owned by the master, see Engel v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (Mass.) 22 L. R. A. 283, and note.

The defendant owns the track that runs into the shed, but it had nothing to do with the erection of the building, and has never had anything to do with keeping it in repair.

Batterson v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 49 Mich. 184, 13 N. W. 508; Klanowski v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 64 Mich. 279, 31 N. W. 275; Schindler v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 77 Mich. 136, 43 N. W. 911.

If A owns a building, or is the lessee of it, then the duty of inspection is upon him; but if he neither owns nor controls it, then no duty of inspection is imposed upon him, even though he may occasionally send his servant upon the premises to do work, as was done in the case at bar.

Plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

The plaintiff was an experienced brakeman, and was fully aware of the way the business was conducted on the defendant's road. The condition of the building was open and obvious, and if there was any apparent danger the plaintiff could see and guard against it just as well as the defendant could; and under such circumstances there is no case that holds the master liable.

Where the servant sees and knows that the master does not regularly inspect the structure in question, or has not had opportunity to inspect it, then the servant must inspect for himself and at his own risk, if he makes use of it.

The plaintiff was performing work upon a side track, where the defendant owed him a different duty from that which it would have owed him if he had been performing work upon its main track. He himself was required to be on the lookout, and he assumed any and all risks that were incident to doing switching upon a side track.

The company had the right to rely upon the owners of the building performing their duty, and it was not negligent in assuming that they would do it.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover for personal injuries received by him while in the employ of the defendant. The trial judge directed a verdict in favor of defendant. The case is brought here by writ of error.

The Sparta Brick & Tile Company is engaged, near Sparta and near the line of the defendant's road, in making bricks and tile. Their kilns are under a center building, upwards of 200 feet long. This building consists of posts set in the ground, and extending above the ground about 16 feet, upon the top of which are plates. The roof boards extend from these plates to the center of the building, the highest point being midway between the rows of posts. On each side of the center of the building, and extending its entire length, is a lean-to, about 13 feet wide. The sides of the building are open. The outside of the lean-to is made of tamarack posts, 6 to 8 inches in diameter, set in the ground at intervals of 12 or 14 feet, and 12 feet high. On the tops of these posts plates are spiked. At frequent intervals rafters lead from the outside plates to the outside plates of the center building. The rafters are connected with each other by strips, some of which are 2 inches by 4 inches, and some 4 inches by 4 inches. Upon the tops of these strips, inch boards, 16 feet long, were nailed, reaching from the plates on top of the 12-foot posts to the plates on the center of the building. The boards on the center building were loose, and when the fires were started in the kilns were removed from the center building, and slipped over on the roof of the lean-to. The defendant company built a siding into the lean-to from its track over the land of the brick and tile company, which company loaded the cars from bricks which had been taken from the kilns, and which were sometimes piled in the lean-to while awaiting shipment. When the cars were loaded, usually when the brakes were loosened, they could easily be run outside of the building, where they were received by the defendant company, but sometimes it was necessary to go into the building for them. The building was erected by the brick and tile company, and, so far as it was kept in repair, was repaired by them; the railroad company exercising no control over the building. The plaintiff was twenty-five years old. He had been a brakeman nearly three years. He was in the employ of the defendant, and had made four trips over its road in the capacity of a brakeman on a freight train. These trips took him near the building in question. On December 28, 1898, the main part of the train was left near the station, while the locomotive and a box car were backed upon the siding for the purpose of getting two flat cars that were under the lean-to. The plaintiff was instructed to make the coupling. While the train was moving slowly, he was attempting to remove the pin from a Jenney coupler, which was attached to the moving car, for the purpose of making the coupling when he should reach the cars under the shed. He had got but 8 to 18 feet into the shed, when a portion of the roof fell, and he received the injuries which are the cause of this litigation. It is his claim that it was the duty of the defendant to furnish him a reasonably safe place to work, and to keep this building in a reasonably safe condition, and that, not having done it, the company was guilty of negligence which gave him a cause for action. The negligence is stated in the declaration as follows: "Plaintiff alleges that said defendant wholly failed to maintain said building in a reasonably safe condition, or in reasonable repair, but it allowed said building to become old, rotten, and worn out; the roof and rafters thereof become weak, and in such a condition that they would separate from whatever substance or thing they were attached to; that said building had stood so long, and was in such a condition, that it was rickety, and was liable at any minute to fall from its own weight, and it not being of sufficient strength to hold itself together, which condition was apparent to anyone upon any reasonable examination of the same; and this plaintiff alleges that it was the duty of said defendant to have examined said building, and to have ascertained its condition, but that said defendant wholly failed and neglected to make any such examination." The testimony offered by the plaintiff was to the effect that the building was not properly constructed in the first place, that it was old and weak, and that its condition was apparent to anyone who would examine it, and that about two years before the accident occurred a portion of the roof had fallen. On the part of the defendant the testimony was to the effect that the building was well built, and was of the same character of construction usual for buildings erected for the purpose for which this was used. The testimony showed that when the portion of the roof fell, about two years before the accident, its falling was occasioned by a heavy fall of snow, coming upon a portion of the roof which was a part of an extension then in process of construction before the posts and rafters were permanently in place; that the building had been in constant use by the employees of the brick and tile company, and that there was nothing in its appearance to indicate to anyone there was any danger of its falling. The lean-to was built to keep the rain off the side of the kiln, and from the bricks piled under the lean-to, and to protect the men when loading the cars. The shed was so low the locomotive could not be run under it. If refrigerator or furniture cars were run under it, they would hit against the rafters and boards, and a like result had occurred once or twice from the end of a break rod on a high car hitting the roof. The evidence shows that the roof had been struck a week or two before the accident, but the injury had been repaired, and the roof left in perfect condition. It is not shown how the accident occurred, unless it is disclosed by the answer of Mr. Warner on the cross-examination as to what made the roof tumble, when he said, "I don't know of any reason, unless there had been an excessive weight of snow, or they struck it with their cars when they came in, as they had done before." Or the testimony of the engineer, who gave the signal to stop when the roof fell, that he saw Mr. Doyle coming out of the shed holding his left hand, apparently dazed, and that he was covered with snow.

Counsel for the plaintiff say: "When the servant in Michigan accepts service from a master, there is a contract between him and the master that the master will furnish him a reasonably safe place in which to work, and it is a duty that the master cannot shirk or charge to others than himself by contract, bargain, or any sleight of hand performance; citing Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. 81 Mich. 423, 46 N. W. 111; Van Dusen v. Letellier, 78 Mich. 492, 44 N. W. 572; Johnson v. Spear, 76 Mich. 139, 42 N. W. 1092; Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 272, 44 N. W. 270; Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. 78 Mich. 513, 7 L. R. A. 500, 44 N. W. 502; Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 79 Mich. 409, 7 L. R. A. 623, 44 N. W. 1034; Brown v. Gilchrist, 80 Mich. 56, 45 N. W. 82; Balhoff v. Michigan C. R. Co. 106 Mich. 606, 65 N. W. 592." We have no doubt this proposition is fully sustained by the rulings of this court. Counsel say the same doctrine applies when a railroad company is using property belonging to another company or to someone else; citing Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 196; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Peyton, 106 Ill. 534; Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 46 Wis. 497, 1 N. W. 112 49 Wis. 609, 6 N. W. 303; and other cases.

It is insisted by defendant that an examination of these cases shows the defects resulting in the injury related to the roadbed itself, or to the train or its equipments, and for that reason do not apply to the case at bar. If the principle determined by these cases is to control, we think it cannot be said that the duty of the company to maintain a safe place for its employees whose duty it is while employed to pass under it. Was it, then, the duty of the company to its employees to see that this place where it built its track, and where it sent its employee to work, was reasonably safe? In Ross v. Iona Twp. 104 Mich. 320, 62 N. W. 401, it was held, in effect, that, in building an approach to a bridge, the township authorities may not ignore surroundings, but are bound to exercise such caution as existing circumstances suggest. If the duty of maintaining this spur was a duty which the company owed to its employees, it will not do to say that this duty was performed by building a track which had no defects in itself, if there was that above the track which endangered the safety of the employee. The rule is established by the weight of authority that, when a railroad company runs its trains over tracks owned by another, the company is bound to see that the tracks are in a safe condition. Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 46 Wis. 497, 1 N. W. 112; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cagle, 53 Ark. 347, 14 S. W. 89; Wisconsin C. R. Co. v. Ross, 142 Ill. 9, 31 N. E. 412; Murray v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 66 Conn. 512, 32 L. R. A. 539, 34 Atl. 506. See also Spaulding v. W. N. Flynt Granite Co. 159 Mass. 587, 34 N. E. 1135.

It is urged by counsel that, though they have not been able to find a case just like this, applying the principles announced in Pahlan v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 122 Mich. 232, 81 N. W. 103, to this case, it justified the judge in directing a verdict in favor of defendant; counsel citing also Carolan v. Southern P. Co. 84 Fed. 84. The Pahlan Case was determined upon the assumption of risk by the employee, who had knowledge of like conditions along the way of the company. The opinion of Justice Hooker recognized that the company was bound to furnish a reasonably safe place to work. Nor is the case of Carolan v. Southern P. Co. 84 Fed. 84, in point. In that case the question was whether the company was liable to an employee for injuries received by him because of the improper piling of boxes or freight on a wharf adjacent to defendant's track. The condition which caused the injury to plaintiff arose, not through an unsafe condition of the premises, but because of an improper use made of premises in proper condition, of which the plaintiff had notice. In the present case the plaintiff cannot be said to have assumed the risk that the building into which the company ran its tracks was liable to fall down upon him while in the performance of his duties. It is not a case in which the structure could be avoided, as in the Pahlan Case. If in any case an employee has a right to rely upon the performance of the duty to provide a safe place, it would seem that he may do so when he is called upon to pass under a building, to the extent, at least, of assuming that the building will not fall upon him by its own weight. We think the case was one that should have been left to the jury under proper instructions from the court.

Judgment is reversed, and a new trial granted.

Montgomery, Ch. J., and Grant, J., concur. Long, J., concurs in the result. Hooker, J., did not sit.

Rubie FERRIS
v.
Albert D. NEVILLE, Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A paper is a will which is duly executed as such, and reads: This is good to Miss Rubie Ferris for eight hundred dollars for care and attendance rendered by her to me in my last sickness. This eight hundred dollars is to be collected out of my estate after my death, provided, however, I die a bachelor.
2. Parol evidence is admissible to show that a will was properly executed and witnessed according to the requirements of the statute.

(July 10, 1901.)

APPEAL by contestant from an order of the Circuit Court for Bay County admitting to probate an instrument alleged to be the last will and testament of Jacob E. Embody, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Porter & Haffey and McDonnell & Duffy for appellant.

Mr. James Van Kleeck, with Mr. T. E. Webster, for appellee:

The instrument is a will pure and simple. The manner of making, witnessing, and the right reserved to destroy its effect by marriage,—all tend to show the intent of the maker to treat the instrument as a will.

The intention of the maker is the pivot of the question, and is to be gathered from all parts of the instrument.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the probate court of Bay county admitting to probate a certain writing which is claimed to be the last will and testament of Jacob E. Embody, deceased, who died May 8, 1898. The paper reads as follows:

State of Michigan, }
County of Bay } ss.:

To Whom It may Concern: This is good to Miss Rubie Ferris for eight hundred dollars, as payment for care and attendance rendered by her to me in my last sickness. This eight hundred dollars is to be collected out of my estate after my death; providing, however, I die a bachelor.

Jacob E. X Embody. [L. S.]
mark.

Signed and sealed in presence of James Petterson.

Edwin U. Hover.

Dated at Lengsville, Bay county, Michigan, this 19th day of February, A. D. 1898.

There is no question but that the deceased died a bachelor.

The cause was tried in the circuit court before a jury on the appeal, and judgment entered on verdict finding the instrument above set forth to be the last will and testament of Jacob E. Embody, deceased. The administrator of the estate has appealed. His counsel says in brief that but two questions are raised, to wit: "(1) Does this paper constitute a will, even if properly executed and witnessed? (2) Did the court err in the admission and exclusion of testimony offered showing that the will was properly executed and witnessed according to the statute, and was that question of fact properly submitted to the jury?"

The proponent of the will called James Petterson as a witness. He testified that he came to the house of one Mr. Ferris, at Lengsville, on February 19, 1898; that he saw the deceased, Jacob E. Embody, upstairs in the house, and talked with him awhile, when deceased tapped on the window and called Edwin Hover, the other witness to the will, who came up; that the paper here claimed to be the will of Mr. Embody was then signed in his presence by Embody, and that he and Hover signed as witnesses to it at Mr. Embody's request; that the witnesses both signed at the request of Embody, and in his presence and in the presence of each other; that Hover wrote the words, "Dated at Lengsville, Bay county, Michigan, this 19th day of February, 1898," at the request of Mr. Embody; that Embody then requested Hover to take the paper and keep it until he (testator) died or got better, and if he died it was to be given to Mr. Ferris, and if he lived it was to be returned to deceased. Edwin U. Hover, the other witness to the paper, was called, and testified that he had known Mr. Embody, the testator, about a year; that it was his signature to the will; and that the date looked like his handwriting, but that he was not positive it was his handwriting. He further testified that he signed the paper at his home, near Unionville, about a year after it was dated (that is, about the 6th or 7th of February, 1899), that Mr. Ferris brought the paper to him and asked him to sign it; that Ferris told him that he wrote the body of it, but that Embody died so suddenly they did not get it quite finished, and that he (Ferris) knew it was all right, and he (witness) supposed it was all right, and signed it; that the other witness (Petterson) was not there, and Embody was not there. On his further examination the witness testified that, if he testified on the hearing in the probate court that he signed the paper in the presence of Petterson and at the request of Embody, it was false. He then stated: "I lied in probate court because I was under the influence of liquor. . . . I was somewhat under the influence of liquor when I signed this." The proponent introduced testimony tending to show that, while Mr. Embody was still living, Mr. Hover, the above witness, had this paper in his possession; that he showed it to one Otto Bruce, and at Embody's request read it over to Bruce; and that he showed it to Mr. Ferris's son Fred, and let him read it, and said he was going to give it to Mr. Ferris. The judge of probate of Bay county was called as a witness, and testified that Hover was called as a witness on the allowance of the will, and stated that "he was passing the house where the deceased was at that time, and that the deceased beckoned to him to come up; that he went into the upper room of the house and there were parties present (that is, the two subscribing witnesses and the deceased); that the deceased presented him the paper and asked him to witness it; that the name of the testator had been signed to the will; and that he then and there signed it at the request of the deceased. Other testimony was also given of like character. The witness Hover was recalled, and gave testimony tending to show that he never showed the paper to Fred Ferris or Otto Bruce.

Upon this and other testimony introduced in the case, the court charged the jury: "Now, I charge you explicitly that unless this will was signed at the time that Petterson says he signed it, in the presence of the testator and in the presence of each other, the will is void, it never took effect, it never became a will; and if the testimony of the young man that it was carried down to Tuscola county long after its execution—if what the witness said was true, the will was never completed, because it must be completed during the lifetime of the testator. Now, that brings us to the second question. If the will was signed in the presence of these two witnesses and in the presence of the testator, and at his request, the will is valid and effectual. There is a question of law as to whether the instrument is a will or not, and it is a close question. My first impression was the same as my brother McDonnell's. I thought it was a mere promise or agreement to pay. A subsequent partial examination somewhat changed my views, and I charge you, as a matter of law, that it is a will; that is, if it is proved to be properly executed. If it were a claim against the estate, it would come in for its share of the money with the other creditors, and might consume all the estate, and might be of value to the amount of the whole face of it unless the debts exceed the whole value of the estate. But, as a will, it is subject to all the debts of the estate before the legatee gets anything, and no injustice would be done if it is allowed as a will or claim, providing it is honest and just. Now, in regard to the proof of this will: You have heard the testimony of Petterson. He was on the stand as a witness. You saw how he behaved, and heard what he had to say, and, no doubt, observed his method of giving his testimony. If you believe Mr. Petterson, you may find in favor of this will. But, before you can find in favor of the will, you must find that both Petterson and Hover signed this will as witnesses at the time that Petterson says he signed it. Now, in support of that view of the case, this may be said: The testimony of this boy was given before the probate court some time ago. There he testified substantially the same as Petterson testified, according to his own testimony and the testimony of Judge Wright. The events about which he spoke were more recent in his recollection than they are now, or will be at any later day than that date. I do not see in the case (it has not leaked out, at least) what inducement or temptation was held out to this boy to commit perjury at that time, or to make a forgery by signing the will as a witness, because it is a forgery to attest a will that is false. Now, you will consider that in regard to his testimony. He was living up there in that neighborhood. He was well acquainted with, and a near neighbor to, the parties interested; and his name appears upon that instrument, and he appeared before the probate court and testified to it. Now, so far, there would seem nothing unusual about him, or the evidence that he gave, or the things that he did. If anybody else had done it, it would be a very natural thing to do; but he says that he swore falsely before the judge of probate; that he never witnessed the will until the day before the 8th of March last,—the 7th of March,—when Mr. Ferris and someone else came to him, down in Fairgrove, and told him that he knew that the will or paper contained the last wishes of Mr. Embody, which he assented to, and thought there was no harm in signing it. It is possible that the boy was innocent in signing that document, and that he was imposed upon or induced to sign it. His testimony in regard to the liquor that he drank you may consider, but it is very dangerous evidence for you to pay much attention to. He details exactly what happened immediately after that same time, and, so far as it casts a dark shadow on this transaction and seems to shed light on the other side, you will consider it with the utmost care, if you give any credence to it whatever. He testifies that he signed it on the 7th of March. Judge Wright comes here and testifies that the paper was filed in his court on the 8th day of March, and that he saw it in the hands of Judge Webster two weeks, and maybe three weeks, before that day; and he says that, while he cannot swear positively it is the same paper, he thinks it was. Now, if it was before Judge Wright two or three weeks before the 8th day of March, it could not have been witnessed by this Hover on the 7th of March, and his testimony is false if that was so; and still you will consider it. Hover himself, in answer to my questions, stated that the testimony that was given was false, that he was a cousin of one of the attorneys in the case, and that he advised him to keep out of the way of the officer who wanted to serve a subpoena upon him. My friend McDonnell has stated that that was no offense under the law of Michigan,—to keep out of the way of an officer. If he had kept out of the way entirely,—got away before he was served with the subpoena,—it certainly would have left his own reputation a great deal better than it may be after this trial. But he admits that he swore falsely on a former occasion. He plastered himself over many times more by detailing his connection with the forgery of this will, if his version be true. Now, gentlemen, you can believe that testimony if you want to, or you can reject it totally, or you can believe any part of it you are a mind to, and reject the balance. You have the whole matter in your hands, and you ought to apply your best judgment to it. It is a general rule of law that, if a witness deliberately and intentionally and knowingly testifies falsely in regard to one part of a case, that all his evidence in the case may be rejected by the jury, and in many cases ought to be, because the law does not trust even to the jury the task of picking out the truth from the false parts of the perjurer's testimony. In support of the will there is the boy Bruce, who said he saw this man Hover have it along at an early day; that it was given to the deceased; that he read it and gave it back to him. Petterson said it was given to this young man for safe-keeping when the execution of the will was finished. The Ferris boy testified that he worked some days to pay up a debt of his father to Hover, and that he saw the will; that this man told him that when he had worked out the debt he was going to give it to his father. These are confirmatory circumstances that you may consider, always bearing in mind that to sustain this will you have got to find that it was signed at the time Petterson signed it, in the presence of the deceased, at his request, and in the presence of each other. If you do not find that fact, you will find against the will. If you do find it, you will find in favor of the will; and it seems to me that that is the critical point in the case, and so far as the testimony tends to confirm that view of it, or tends to disaffirm that view, you ought to consider it carefully. If you find a verdict, it will either be that you find in favor of the will, or that you find against the will. Put it in those words, and the court will understand by that that you find that no will was executed or proved, or you will find that this will was executed."

Section 9266, Comp. Laws 1897, provides: "No will made within this state, except such nuncupative wills as are mentioned in the following section, shall be effectual to pass any estate, whether real or personal, nor to charge or in any way affect the same unless it be in writing and signed by the testator or by some person in his presence and by his express direction, and attested and subscribed in the presence of the testator by two or more competent witnesses." It is the contention of counsel for contestant that this paper does not constitute a will; that, if it was ever executed, it is nothing more than a duebill or acknowledgment of a debt of $800 owing to Miss Ferris by the deceased. We cannot agree with this construction of the paper. It is a will, and not an acknowledgment of a debt. If it were a duebill or an acknowledgment of a debt, it could not have been defeated by the marriage of the testator. It was to take effect only at the death of the testator. It was said in Lautenschlager v. Lautenschlager, 80 Mich. 292, 45 N. W. 147: "The form of any instrument is of little consequence in determining whether it is a will or not. If it be executed with the formalities required by the statute, and if it is to operate only after the death of the maker; it is a will." Many cases are cited in that case in support of the above proposition, to which attention is called. Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, *61, and notes. The jury found, under proper instructions, that it was the intention of Jacob E. Embody to will to Rubie Ferris the sum of $800, to be taken by her at his death, on condition that he died a bachelor; and we think the finding is supported by the evidence.

We find no error in the record, in the admission or rejection of evidence. The cause was fairly submitted to the jury.

The order of the court below must be affirmed.

The legislature is not authorized, in the exercise of the police power, to enact a measure in order to protect one person or a dozen persons from disease or fraud.

Cream is a natural product, and when not diseased or impure is not only harmless, but beneficial, as food and for many other purposes, whether it contains 10 per cent of fat or 35 per cent of fat. It is commonly known that there is no practice of adulterating cream, as there is in the case of milk, nor of simulating it, as in the case of butter, and that pure cream is wholesome though it contains less than 20 per cent of fat.

All classification must be based upon substantial distinctions.

Mr. W. B. Douglas, Attorney General, also for respondent.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the municipal court of the city of St. Paul convicting the defendant of the offense of selling cream containing less than 20 per cent of fat, contrary to the provisions of Gen. Stat. 1894, § 7002. The record contains no settled case or bill of exceptions; but the judgment recites upon its face that before sentence the defendant's counsel moved that the defendant be discharged on the ground that the statute was unconstitutional; hence the facts charged did not constitute a public offense. Some technical objections are here made to the complaint, but so far as appears from the record, they were not made in the court below, and the sole question for our decision is the constitutionality of the statute. It is in these words: "No person shall sell or offer for sale any cream taken from impure or diseased milk, or cream that contains less than 20 per cent of fat. Whoever violates the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100." The defendant claims that this statute, in so far as it prohibits the sale of cream solely because it contains less than 20 per cent of fat, is unconstitutional, because it is unreasonable, and not a proper exercise of the police power, is based upon an arbitrary classification, and is special legislation, and is an unlawful restraint of trade, and illegally restricts the citizen's right to contract and to pursue a lawful calling, and deprives him of his liberty and property without due process of law. The section of the statute in question is a part of the General Statutes of the state, which were enacted to prevent deception in the sale of dairy products, and its obvious purpose is to fix a standard for cream, and forbid the sale of any cream, as such, which is below the prescribed standard, whereby unsuspecting purchasers may be defrauded. It must be, and is, construed so as to effectuate such purpose. We accordingly hold that the statute in question forbids, and only forbids, the sale of cream, as such, which is below the prescribed standard. So construed, the statute is a proper exercise of the police power of the state, and is valid. Its constitutionality rests upon the same principles as does the validity of statutes prohibiting the sale of milk unless it contains a prescribed percentage of fat and solids, and other similar statutes. The constitutionality of such statutes has been uniformly sustained. Butler v. Chambers, 30 Minn. 69, 30 N. W. 308, 1 Am. St. Rep. 644, and notes; Com. v. Evans, 132 Mass. 11; State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344; State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 13 Atl. 585; Kansas v. Cook, 38 Mo. App. 660. Counsel for the defendant, while practically conceding the validity of statutes fixing a standard for milk, and forbidding the sale of milk below such standard, seeks to distinguish such statutes from statutes of the character of the one we are considering, for the reason that "cream is a natural product, and, when not diseased or impure, is not only harmless, but beneficial as food and for many other purposes, whether it contains 10 per cent of fat or 35 per cent of fat. It is commonly known that there is no practice of adulterating cream as there is in the case of milk, nor of simulating it as in the case of butter, and that pure cream is wholesome, though it contains less than 20 per cent of fat." We cannot take judicial knowledge of the supposed facts thus asserted; for, if this is a matter in which we are required to take judicial notice of the facts, we know that it is entirely feasible to mix pure cream with a limited amount of milk, and produce a mixture which may be sold to the inexperienced as pure cream. Undoubtedly there is less necessity for a statute to prevent deception in the sale of cream than there is of one to prevent fraud in the sale of milk, because the latter may be classed as a necessity, and the former as a luxury, and its sale not as general as that of milk; but the distinction is one of degree, not of principle. In either case the legislature is the sole judge of the necessity and propriety of preventing deception in the sale of the article, by appropriate legislation. Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257. And the legislature, by this statute, having, in the exercise of the police power, fixed a standard for all cream to be sold as such, the act is valid.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. Sections 7028, 7037, Gen. Stat. 1894, relating to the sale of lard substitutes, construed. Held, that they forbid the sale of cottolene which is manufactured so as to resemble lard, unless the package containing it is labeled, "Lard Substitute."
2. Evidence in this case justified the conviction of the defendant of the offense of selling cottolene without its being so labeled.

(June 21, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Municipal Court of Minneapolis convicting him of violating the provisions of a statute against the selling of lard substitutes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Flannery & Cooke and Wendell Hertig, for appellant:

The manifest purpose of the legislature in enacting the law of 1893 was to take cottolene, a compound consisting of a mixture of beef stearine and refined cotton-seed oil, out of the provisions of the law of 1891, and to permit its manufacture and sale in this state without requiring it to be labeled "Lard Substitute," provided, however, that it shall not be "manufactured in imitation of lard."

The fact of resemblance does not of itself establish the fact of imitation.

The mixture called cottolene may be made "in semblance of lard," or "as a substitute for lard," and "designed to take the place of lard," in either case, without being labeled "Lard Substitute."

A natural and inherent resemblance does not constitute an imitation.

demeanor within the express wording of the law.

But it could not require artificial coloring to prevent a resemblance.

Collins v. New Hampshire, 171 U. S. 30, 43 L. ed. 60, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 768.

Messrs. Frank Healy and Edward F. Waite, for respondent:

This legislation has been greatly modified, if not wholly wiped out, by chapter 280, Laws 1901. The clear intention was to conditionally exempt from the requirements of the act the specific substance styled "cottonene," describing it by its distinctive ingredients, and permit it to be sold without other mark than its own name and the name of its maker, so long as it should be made as a "Lard Substitute" merely, and should not be brought within the class of "simulated articles," i. e., articles defined by the legislature as "made in the semblance of lard, or as an imitation of lard," and by this court as articles "which so resemble lard that they are liable to be passed off on the public as lard."

The amendment gave the manufacturers of cottonene the choice between two courses, each with its appropriate obligation; they might market the article under its and their names only, in which case the duty was imposed to continue to make it so that it should not resemble lard closely enough to be "liable to be passed off on the public as lard;" or they might make it "in the semblance of lard, or as an imitation of lard," in which case they must continue to market it under the brand or label "Lard Substitute." If, therefore, this appellant sold cottonene which was made "in the semblance of lard, or as an imitation of lard," and was not marked "Lard Substitute," he can find no protection under the amendment of 1893. The phrase, "manufactured in the imitation of lard," in the amendment, is precisely synonymous with the phrase "made as an imitation of lard," in the original act, and the latter phrase is synonymous with, "made in the semblance of lard," as used in the same act. The amendment therefore permits the sale of cottonene without the brand or label "Lard Substitute" only when so made as not to be "in the semblance of lard," i. e., not to so resemble lard as to simulate it in appearance and be "liable to be sold and passed off on the public as lard."

McAllister v. State, 72 Md. 390, 20 Atl. 143; State, Bayles, Prosecutor, v. Newton, 50 N. J. L. 549, 18 Atl. 77; People v. Arensberg, 105 N. Y. 123, 59 Am. Rep. 483, 11 N. E. 277.

If an article of food should, under any circumstances, be marked under such a regulative law, it is difficult to see why the 54 L. R. A.

fact that it bears its natural and inherent outward appearance furnishes any reason for omitting such marking.

Palmer v. State, 39 Ohio St. 236, 48 Am. Rep. 429; Pierce v. State, 63 Md. 592; State v. Snow, 81 Iowa, 643, 11 L. R. A. 355, 47 N. W. 777; State, Bayles, Prosecutor, v. Newton, 50 N. J. L. 549, 18 Atl. 77; Stols v. Thompson, 44 Minn. 271, 46 N. W. 410.

The natural color of an article of food may even be required to be artificially changed in order to prevent deception.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted in the municipal court of the city of Minneapolis of the offense of selling a can of cottonene, manufactured in imitation of lard, and designed to take its place, without labeling the package "Lard Substitute." He was sentenced to pay a fine of $25 and costs. He appealed from the judgment, and the important question for our decision is whether his conviction was justified by the evidence. The statute upon which the conviction rests is Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 7028, 7037. So far as here material, § 7028 is to the effect that every person who manufactures or sells any substance made in the semblance of lard, or as an imitation thereof, or a substitute therefor, designed to take the place of lard, shall cause the package containing it to be labeled "Lard Substitute." The original of this section is Laws 1891, chap. 12, § 3, and it has never been directly amended; but § 12 of the same chapter, which originally declared any violation of the provisions of the act to be a misdemeanor and fixed the penalty, was by Laws 1893, chap. 128, amended by adding thereto substantially this: "Provided, however, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to cottonene, a compound consisting of a mixture of beef stearine and refined cotton-seed oil, where the . . . package . . . shall be labeled . . . with the word 'Cottonene,' . . . and provided, further that said cottonene shall not be manufactured in imitation of lard, and shall not contain any substance deleterious to health." Section 12, as so amended, is now § 7037. It is to be observed that the offense is defined by § 7028, and the gist of it is the selling of any substance made in the semblance of lard, or in imitation thereof, or a substitute therefor, designed to take the place of lard, unless the package containing it is labeled as required, while the proviso of § 7037 excepts from the operation of § 7028 cottonene, consisting of the mixture therein designated, if labeled as such, and if it is not manufactured in imitation of lard, and does not contain any substance deleterious to health. This proviso, then, must be construed as an exception to the statute creating the offense, and as imposing the burden upon a defendant charged with the offense, and shown to have sold any substance made in the semblance of lard, or as an imitation thereof or a substitute therefor, designed to take the place of lard, without the label, of proving that the article sold was within the exception. State v. Corcoran, 70 Minn. 12, 72 N. W. 732. No testimony was offered on behalf of the defendant, but it is here claimed that the state affirmatively proved that the article sold was within the exception, and that the proviso to § 7037 was fully complied with by the defendant in making the sale. If this be so, it follows that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the conviction. The evidence, however, was practically conclusive that the article sold was intended as a substitute for lard, and that it resembled in its appearance commercial lard; that is, lard made exclusively from the fat of the hog, and prepared and sold by the large packing houses of the country. But the defendant insists that such resemblance was a natural one, and has no tendency to establish the fact that it was manufactured in imitation of lard, within the meaning of the statute. That is, it is claimed that the selling of cottolene, which is designed to take the place of lard, without labeling it "Lard Substitute," is not within the statute, although it resembles lard made exclusively from the fat of the hog, unless such resemblance is artificially and intentionally created in manufacturing it. This limitation of the meaning of the words of the statute, "manufactured in imitation of lard," is too narrow. The meaning of these words is to be ascertained by reading them in connection with the provisions of § 7028, which were construed and held constitutional in the case of State v. Aslesen, 50 Minn. 5, 52 N. W. 220, in which the court said: "It is evident from its language that its provisions are not confined to articles 'made in the semblance of lard, or as an imitation of lard,' or which so resemble lard that they are liable to be sold and passed off on the public as lard, and which, for the sake of brevity, we may call 'simulated articles.' The act applies as well to any substance made as a 'substitute for lard, and which is designed to take the place of lard,' and which consists of any mixture or compound of animal or vegetable oils or fats, other than hog fat, in the form of lard, whether such substance resembles lard in appearance or not." On the trial of the case cited, the defendant offered to show, not only that cottolene was wholesome, but that it did not resemble lard in appearance. At the next session of the legislature after the filing of the decision in that case the proviso in question was enacted, whereby cottolene, labeled as such, was excepted from the provisions of the statute, if not manufactured in imitation of lard. The statute before its amendment required the label "Lard Substitute" on all articles offered for sale which were made in the semblance of lard, or as an imitation thereof, and also upon any substance designed to take the place of lard, whether it resemble lard or not. Now, it is manifest that the intention of the amendment was to permit any substance designed to take the place of lard, which does not resemble lard, to be sold under its own label, because such a substance cannot be passed off upon the public as lard. It is equally clear that it was not the purpose of the amendment to permit the sale, without the prescribed label, of any article made in semblance of lard, or as an imitation thereof, so that it would be liable to be put off as lard. To give the amendment any other construction would defeat the very purpose of the statute. It follows that the words of the amendment, "manufactured in imitation of lard," are to be given the same effect as the words, "semblance of lard, or as an imitation of lard," in the original section. We therefore hold that §§ 7028 and 7037 forbid the sale of cottolene which is manufactured so as to resemble lard, unless the package containing it is labeled "Lard Substitute," although such resemblance is a necessary result of its manufacture,—an improbable hypothesis. This construction of the statute does not render it unconstitutional, for it does not prohibit the sale of cottolene, but simply requires that when it is designed to take the place of lard, and so resembles lard that it is liable to be passed off upon the public for lard, the package containing it must be marked "Lard Substitute." Or, in other words, the statute, as we have construed it, does not attempt to prohibit the sale of cottolene. It may be manufactured and sold, but if it is designed to take the place of lard, and is manufactured in imitation of lard, it is not within the provisions of the act of 1893, excepting it from the operation of the act of 1891. In such a case the provisions of the latter act only apply, and it must be labeled "Lard Substitute." On the other hand, if it is not so manufactured, it is within the exception, and the provisions of the act of 1891 do not apply, and it may be sold without such label. There is no hardship in this requirement that cottolene manufactured so as to resemble lard shall be labeled "Lard Substitute." If cottolene is just as wholesome, just as good, and cheaper than lard, let it compete with the hog product on fair terms, under a label declaring the truth,—that it is a substitute for lard, and not lard, as it appears to be. It probably is true in this particular case that the package containing the cottolene was so marked that no intelligent purchaser could be deceived into believing that he was buying lard. But it is the province of the legislature to determine what precautions must be observed to prevent deception in the sale of food products, and courts have no power to substitute something else which they may deem to be equally as efficacious. It is only when the specific means prescribed by the legislature to prevent such deception are arbitrary or prohibitive that the courts can interfere. We hold, upon the whole record, that the evidence is sufficient to justify the conviction of the defendant of the offense of selling a substance manufactured in imitation of lard, and designed to take the place of it, without the prescribed label, within the meaning of the statute as we here construe it, and, further, that the evidence received for that purpose was competent and material.

Judgment affirmed.

Brown, J., dissenting:

Statutes of the character of the one under consideration in this case are constitutional and valid only when enacted in the interests of the public welfare. A statute prohibiting the manufacture or sale of a wholesome article of food could not be upheld for a moment, but the manufacture or sale of unwholesome food products may be prohibited, and statutes enacted for that purpose are sustained by all the courts. But no case can be found sustaining an absolute prohibition of the manufacture or sale of wholesome articles. Such statutes are within the authority of the lawmaking power when their object or purpose is to preserve the public health, or to prevent fraud and deception by the sale of articles manufactured in imitation of other commodities. To preserve the public health and to prevent fraud and deception of this kind, it is perfectly legitimate and proper for the legislature to prohibit the sale of unwholesome articles of food, and to require that all imitations and substitutes be placed on the market and sold under their true names. Oleomargarine statutes are illustrations on this subject. That article or commodity was manufactured, not only as a substitute for butter, but in imitation thereof, and for the purpose and with the intent of placing it on the market to be sold as butter. To prevent fraud and deception, and in the interests of the public good, laws were enacted whose object and aim was to compel oleomargarine to stand or fall on its own merits. No complaint can be made of such statutes, nor of the decisions upholding them. They become clearly within the police power of the government, and are necessary to the proper protection of the public. The statute under which defendant in the case at bar was prosecuted is §§ 7028-7037, Gen. Stat. 1894. The statute was enacted in 1891, and provides generally that no person shall, within this state, manufacture for sale, or have in his possession with the intent to sell or expose for sale, as lard, any substance not the legitimate product of the fat of the hog, unless such article or substitute be plainly marked "Lard Substitute." Penalties are provided for a violation of the statute. Subsequent to the passage of this act the case of State v. Aslesen, 50 Minn. 5, 52 N. W. 220, arose, and was there construed and interpreted. The defendant was charged in that case with violating the statute by selling an article for lard without having it marked and labeled as required by the act, and he interposed in defense that the article sold by him was cottolene. He offered to prove that cottolene was a wholesome article of food, but was not permitted to do so, and his conviction was sustained because of the fact that the article was not properly labeled as required by statute. In 1893 the legislature, acting evidently on the theory that cottolene was a wholesome article of food, and was proper to be manufactured and sold under its own title and upon its own merits, amended the act of 1891 by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, however, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to cottolene, a compound consisting of a mixture of beef stearine and refined cotton-seed oil, where the tierce, barrel, tub, pail, or package containing the same shall be distinctly and legibly branded or labeled in letters not less than one-half inch in length, with the word 'Cottolene' and the name and location of the person or firm manufacturing the same, and provided further that said cottolene shall not be manufactured in imitation of lard and shall not contain any substance deleterious to health" [§ 7037]. By this amendment cottolene was expressly taken from the operation of the prior act, and explicitly recognized as not being a substitute for lard, but a proper and wholesome article of food. So that, under the law as it stands to-day, cottolene may be sold if distinctly labeled "Cottolene" on the pail or the package in which it is contained. And the only provision of the statute which can have any bearing upon the case is the second provision contained in the act of 1893, as follows: "Provided further, that said cottolene shall not be manufactured in imitation of lard, and shall not contain any substance deleterious to health." And the only proper and legitimate inquiry is whether the pail of cottolene sold to complainant was manufactured and sold in imitation of lard. That it was not seems to me beyond controversy. The package in which it was contained was plainly marked "Cottolene," as required by the statutes, was sold to complainant as cottolene, and there is no pretense of a claim that he was deceived or defrauded in any way. He asked for cottolene, and was given that article, not as a substitute or an imitation of lard, but for what it purported to be, and what he asked for and desired to purchase. The burden of proof was upon the state to establish a violation of the law by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. In this the state wholly failed. It was incumbent upon the prosecution to show and prove that the cottolene sold to complainant was manufactured in imitation of lard,—not that it had the semblance of lard in appearance or color, but that it was in fact purposely and intentionally manufactured as an imitation. Clearly, under this statute, in order to show that an article is made in imitation of another, it is necessary to prove an intention and purpose on the part of the manufacturer to do so. If a combination of the natural ingredients of cottolene, namely beef stearine and refined cotton-seed oil, resembles lard in color, it by no means follows that it was manufactured in imitation of that article. It appeared in this case from the evidence introduced by the state itself that the cottolene in question contained nothing but the ingredients specified in the act of 1893. The purpose and intent necessary to be shown by the prosecution for the violation of a statute like the one here under consideration are very clearly discussed in the case of People v. Meyer, 44 App. Div. 1, 60 N. Y. Supp. 415. The case is one involving the statute on the subject of oleomargarine, and is directly in point. The court there said: "The defect in plaintiff's proof was the omission to show that the appearance of oleomargarine in its natural condition differed from that of the substance which the defendant sold as butter, or, in other words, that the oleomargarine had been changed in some manner so as to make it look like butter. It is settled that the legislature cannot constitutionally prohibit the sale of oleomargarine, except so far as the product is made to simulate some other substance and thereby deceive the people. . . . In order, therefore, that the express prohibition against the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine contained in § 26 of the agricultural law . . . shall be deemed constitutional, it is essential to construe that prohibition with the remainder of the section, as forbidding only the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine when it is manufactured in imitation or semblance of natural butter. Adopting this construction, there was, as has already been said, a failure of proof on the part of the plaintiff, in omitting to give evidence of the imitative character of the substance sold by the defendant. It is impossible to say that the appearance of the oleomargarine had been altered so as to make it resemble natural butter, unless we know in the first instance what oleomargarine looks like in its normal condition. There is no testimony in the record on this subject, and it is not a matter of which the courts can take judicial cognizance." The opinion of the majority in the case at bar, it seems to me, goes far beyond the necessities of the occasion, and is evidence of much labor and ingenuity to sustain this prosecution. They expressly hold that the statutes forbid the sale of cottolene unless the package which contains it is labeled "Lard Substitute," although its resemblance to lard is an incidental result of its manufacture. The decision is palpably in the teeth of the statute, and a construction thereof which renders it unconstitutional and void. It is in the teeth of the statute because the amendment of 1893 expressly provides that the provisions of the prior act—that of 1891—shall not apply to cottolene. Notwithstanding this express declaration of the legislature, the majority apply the former statute to the same extent and with the same force and effect as though the act of 1893 had not been passed. The construction given the statute by the majority renders it unconstitutional and void, because it interprets the same as prohibiting the sale of a wholesome article of food. It is conceded that cottolene is wholesome, and the books will be searched in vain for a case upholding legislation prohibiting the sale of such an article simply because it resembles some other article. For these reasons I dissent.

Lewis, J., dissenting:

I concur with Justice Brown. The reasoning of the majority opinion is based upon purely technical grounds, and I feel it my duty to register a protest. Chapter 12, Gen. Laws 1891, contains a plain and direct prohibition against the selling as lard, and as a substitute for lard, or as an imitation of lard, any compound designed to take the place of lard, unless the same shall be provided with a label containing the words "Lard Substitute," and stating the ingredients and the name of the manufacturer. In the Aslesen Case the defendant sold cottolene without labeling it, and it was held that cottolene was a lard substitute, and, if sold, must be labeled as provided by the act. The decision rests upon the theory that this compound was designed to take the place of an old and well-known article, and, such products being comparatively new on the market, their qualities and ingredients are not usually a matter of common knowledge. As stated in the opinion in that case: "Many of them, like cottolene, may be entirely wholesome, but, in this day of the common adulteration of articles of food, others may be composed of deleterious ingredients. And what may be wholesome for one person may be unwholesome for another. Moreover, it is also a matter of common knowledge that, whether well founded or not, there is a popular prejudice against certain ingredients as an article of food. This is so, for example, with cotton-seed oil. Many would not purchase or use a lard substitute of which that oil was an ingredient, or any article of food prepared with it. In view of all these facts, the legislature has seen fit to require the seller of these lard substitutes to label the article which he sells with what, for convenience, we may call a quantitative analysis of its ingredients, and to require the seller of any article of food prepared with such lard substitute to give notice of the fact to the purchaser, so that he may know just what he is buying. This certainly does not deprive the seller of his property without due process of law. No man has a constitutional right to keep secret the composition of substance which he sells to the public as articles of food." Upon this theory, it was immaterial whether the compound, cottolene, was wholesome or not, which was the exact point for review in that case. At the very next session the legislature proceeded to remove the effect of that decision by enacting the proviso of chapter 126, Gen. Laws 1893. In the referred-to decision the court had declared that, even if cottolene was a wholesome preparation, it must be labeled "Lard Substitute;" but the legislature, recognizing the wholesomeness of the article and the public demand for it, amended the act of 1891 by providing that it should not apply where cottolene consisted of a mixture of beef stearine and refined cotton-seed oil, and was labeled "Cottolene," containing the name and location of the manufacturer. In other words, by the amendment the legislature enabled manufacturers of cottolene to place the product on the market upon its own merits. As a precaution against fraud, and to further protect the public against injurious compounds in the form of cottolene, the second proviso was added, which simply means this: That in the manufacture of cottolene nothing shall be added to the ingredients of its composition (beef stearine and refined cotton-seed oil) which will cause it to be an imitation of lard. If, through the manufacturing process of the ingredients recognized by the statute, cottolene comes out to resemble lard, that fact is immaterial, so long as no foreign substance, deleterious to health, is introduced in its composition. It is well known that lard varies in color, running from a grayish tint to a pure white, according to the care taken in its making; and in like manner cottolene may vary in color. Under the evidence in this case before us, it was conclusively shown that the product was a compound of pure beef stearine and refined cotton-seed oil, although it resembled commercial lard. The reasoning of the main opinion leads to the most absurd results. As if, with the label "Cottolene," in large type, encircling the can, a purchaser might be deceived and his innocence imposed upon, because, on opening the can, he found its contents resembling commercial lard,—a clearer white than might be produced by the natural mixing of the ingredients. With equal reason it may be argued that deceit has been practised, and some concoction imposed on innocence, when lard, in its process of making, does not come out a clear white, as is frequently the case, though made of pure hog fat. As the court has construed the law, it would seem to offer a premium on adulteration, to make the article sell upon its merits as cottolene.

(84 Minn. 90.)

*Where the flow of a stream of water has been diverted from its natural channel, or obstructed by a permanent dam, and such diversion or obstruction has continued for the time necessary to establish a prescriptive right to perpetually maintain the same, the riparian owners along such stream of water, who have improved their property with reference to the change and in reliance on the continuance thereof, acquire a reciprocal right to have the artificial conditions remain undisturbed; and the person who placed the obstruction in the stream, or caused the diversion of the waters, and all those claiming under or through him, are estopped upon principles of equity from restoring the waters to their natural channel or state to the injury of such riparian owners.

APPEAL by complainant from an order of the District Court for Stearns County denying a new trial after judgment in favor of defendant in an action to enjoin him from removing a milldam. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Reynolds & Roeser, for appellant:

The doctrine of the law of the case is not applicable to the present action for the following reasons:

1. When this court filed its final opinion upon the former appeal it clearly indicated to the litigants that it intended that the action should be retried upon the merits.

2. The questions involved in the present appeal are of great public importance.

Where the questions involved are of great importance, and great public interests are involved, courts frequently withhold their assent from their own previous adjudications.

Hammond v. Inloes, 4 Md. 138; Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. 26, 131; Hamilton v. Marks, 63 Mo. 167.

3. The doctrine that a prior decision is conclusive upon subsequent appeals, where such prior decision is erroneous, or that it is conclusive whether right or wrong, is one from which many of the states are receding, and which ought not to exist anywhere.

Hastings v. Foxworthy, 45 Neb. 676, 34 L. R. A. 321, 63 N. W. 955.

4. The doctrine of the law of the case does not apply to the present appeal for the reason that the findings of fact in the present record are materially different, and the principles of law announced on the first appeal are not applicable.

A prior decision is not conclusive upon questions presented on the second appeal, where there are material changes in the evidence, pleadings, or findings.

Where the facts are different, and the opinion was not intended to be res judicata, but remanded the case for a trial de novo, the doctrine of the law of the case does not apply.

Johnson v. Bailey, 17 Colo. 59, 28 Pac. 81; Burton v. Perry, 146 Ill. 71, 34 N. E. 60.

Section 6878, Gen. Stat. 1894, provides:

"No person or persons shall drain or attempt to drain any lake, pond, or body of water in this state, which has been meandered and metes and bounds established by the government of the United States, in the survey of the public lands."

Where an act is prohibited by law, or the doing of it is a criminal offense, no legal right can be predicated upon said act.

S. 421, 36 L. ed. 759, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 884.

The meandered lakes above the dam, being more than 160 acres in extent, and capable of a beneficial public use for fishing, fowling, boating, or furnishing water supplies for domestic, municipal, or agricultural purposes, are public waters the use of which for such purposes cannot be interfered with by individuals, whether riparian owners or not.

Minn. Gen. Laws 1897, chap. 257, § 1; Lamprey v. State, 52 Minn. 181, 18 L. R. A. 670, 53 N. W. 1139; Miller v. Mendenhall, 43 Minn. 95, 8 L. R. A. 89, 44 N. W. 1141; Minneapolis Mill Co. v. St. Paul Water Comrs. 56 Minn. 485, 58 N. W. 33.

The appellant, Kray, being a riparian owner on Knaus lake, as well as an operator, in connection with his hotel, of a steamboat upon the navigable waters of the lakes and river, has suffered a special damage not common to the public; and a private action to enjoin the defendants from interfering with such right can be sustained.

The defendant Muggli and his grantors have obtained, by adverse possession for a period of more than forty years, the right to maintain a dam across the Sauk river, and to flow the water upon the lands of riparian owners above such dam; and such riparian owners have also, through the adverse possession of themselves and their grantors for the same period, obtained the reciprocal right to have the water remain at such high stage; and the defendant Muggli, and the other defendants claiming under him, are estopped from restoring the water of such river to its original state.

Where the natural flow of water has been diverted or collected by a permanent artificial dam into an artificial channel, and such condition has continued for more than twenty years, the riparian owners along such stream of water obtain the prescriptive right to have the water remain at such high stage, and the person who placed the permanent obstruction in the stream, and all other persons claiming by, through, or under him, are estopped from restoring the water to its original state.

The erection of a permanent dam in the year 1856 by the grantors of the defendant Muggli, and the maintenance thereof since that date, have created a new channel or level of the waters of the Sauk river and the several lakes through which the same courses, which has become by long lapse of time the natural channel or level thereof; and the removal of such dam, as threatened by the defendants, is an unlawful interference with such new natural channel of level of said river and lakes, and the water therein.

Where a permanent obstruction has been placed in a natural watercourse, and the flow and level of the waters have been diverted and changed, and such change continues for more than twenty years, the same rights may be presumed in favor of the owners of land through which it flows as if such artificial stream had been the natural one.

The respondent and other riparian owners have, through the adverse possession of themselves and their grantors for a period of forty years, obtained the prescriptive right to have the water remain at the stage created by the dam, and this artificial condition or level of the water having ripened into the natural condition, the defendants cannot justify the commission of the overt act of removing the dam upon the ground that they have a right to abandon their easement.

Where courts have applied the doctrine of estoppel to persons who have acquired a right to the use of the waters of a stream, and who have sought to change such use in a way that would do great injury to the property of those who had relied upon the continuance of the previous use, the following conditions have appeared:

1. The riparian owners have acquiesced, from the inception of the acts of the diverter, in what he has done, and, from the inception, the rights of all parties have been adjusted in view of the changed condition and in reliance upon its permanence.

2. The rights of the dominant owner have been asserted and enjoyed for a long period of years; and the owners of the servient estate, or those directly affected by the exercise of the prescriptive rights, have enjoyed rights and exercised privileges wholly at variance with the right to restore the original condition of affairs for substantially the same length of time.

3. There has been a total abandonment of the original right, and acquiescence in such abandonment, the creation of a new right, and the vesting of valuable property interests based on such new right.

4. The owner of the dominant estate was not seeking to abandon his rights; he was seeking to retain them and exercise them in a different manner, and in a manner which would be injurious to others who had relied upon the continuance of another manner of their exercise.

5. The owners of the servient estate did not seek by the injunction to prevent an abandonment of the easement, but to prevent the exercise of it in a way which would be highly injurious to them, and would profit the user but little.

6. In many of the cases it was claimed and established that the contemplated acts of the defendants would be injurious to the public health, and by exposing marshes, bogs, and slimy shores create a nuisance which would seriously interfere with the enjoyment of the plaintiff's property rights.

7. And lastly, the controlling element in all these cases was that the use of the stream as contemplated by the owner of the dominant estate would directly, adversely, affect the valuable property rights and interests of many persons whose rights had been made and become valuable in reliance upon the permanence of existing conditions, which property rights would be injuriously affected by the contemplated change.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to restrain and enjoin defendants from removing or destroying a certain milldam across Sauk river at Cold Springs, in Stearns county. The defendants recovered in the court below, and plaintiff appeals from an order denying a new trial. A former appeal in the case is reported in 77 Minn. 231, 45 L. R. A. 218, 79 N. W. 964, 1026, 1064. The facts are substantially as follows: In 1856 a dam was built and constructed across Sauk river at Cold Springs, Stearns county, by the Cold Springs Mill Company, which has ever since, except during a short period in 1865, when out of repair, been maintained for the purpose of developing water power to propel and operate mill machinery. No authority was obtained to so construct or maintain the dam by application or resort to legal proceedings, but the same was so built and constructed without special or granted right, and subsequently maintained by the mill company and its successors for over forty years, with the acquiescence and consent of the owners of riparian property affected thereby, by reason of which continued maintenance, and the consequent raising of the level of the water, and the adverse, uninterrupted, and exclusive use of the dam for said period of forty years, the mill company and its successors, Muggli and his grantors, acquired the right by prescription to perpetually maintain the same. The effect of the dam was to raise the level of the waters of the river to a height of 7½ feet, cause the same to set back and overflow large tracts of adjacent land to a distance of about 16 miles up the river, and the formation of several lakes and ponds along its course. By the construction of the dam, and the consequent raising of the level of the waters of the river, the greater part of the land described in the complaint has since that time been overflowed and rendered valueless for agricultural purposes. The defendants, other than defendant Muggli, own land abutting upon the river, and are residents and freeholders of the towns through which the river runs and flows. Nearly all of said defendants and their grantors have for more than forty years owned and occupied the lands so adjacent to said river and the lakes, and have cultivated and improved the same with reference to the conditions created and caused by the dam and the increased quantity of water occasioned thereby. Some of the defendants owned and occupied land bordering on the river prior to the construction of the dam, and, so far as the record in the case shows, at no time did they object to the dam or to its maintenance. At the time of the construction of the dam the public domain in this section of the state was unsurveyed. It was subsequently surveyed, and with reference to the conditions existing, with the waters of the river raised above its natural level 7½ feet, and the lakes formed thereby were meandered in all respects as though natural bodies of water. Some time prior to the commencement of this action defendant Muggli, who owns the mill property, entered into a contract with the other defendants by which he attempted to sell and transfer to them the right to take out and remove the dam; such other defendants paying him for that right and privilege the sum of $5,000. It is claimed by such defendants that by the removal of the dam large tracts of submerged land will be reclaimed and made valuable for agricultural purposes. Acting under this contract, such defendants threatened to take out and remove the dam, and this action was brought to restrain them from doing so.

The action was tried in connection with that of Friedman against the same defendants, 86 N. W. 1102, the object of which was the same as the object of this action. They were submitted to this court together. Plaintiff in this action is in the actual possession, under claim of title, of land bordering on the river, and has improved the same with reference to the conditions existing subsequent to the construction of the dam. His improvements were made in reliance upon the continuance of such conditions, and that the level of the waters in the lakes would remain as it had existed for years prior thereto, and for purposes of a pleasure resort, and for boating, fishing, and other amusements, in and about which improvements he expended a large sum of money, which will be practically a total loss if the dam is taken out. A portion of the land has been used for the pasture of stock, and the stage of water as made by the dam is necessary to be maintained in order that he may fully enjoy his property. He placed a steamboat in the river at Cold Springs, which boat is used for transporting passengers from that point to a distance of about 20 miles up the river; and, if the waters are lowered to their stage before the erection of the dam, the river will be made non-navigable, and the lakes almost wholly destroyed. In the other case (Friedman against the same defendants, 86 N. W. 1102) the plaintiff therein owns a large tract of land bordering on the river, and has been such owner and in the actual possession for the past thirty years. His land is used exclusively for farming and agricultural purposes. His fences, buildings, and other improvements were erected and made with reference to the artificial stage of the waters, and, if lowered by the removal of the dam, he will be greatly injured and damaged in the enjoyment of his property. The findings of the trial court with reference to the rights of the respective parties in the two actions are very full, and detail the facts with greater particularity than is necessary in this opinion. What we have stated, however, will give a general idea of the situation of the parties and the merits of the controversy. When the action was here on the former appeal, it was determined adversely to plaintiff on the theory of comparative equities; it being held by the majority of the court at that time that the continued maintenance of the dam would work a greater pecuniary injury and damage to the defendants, who, as we have noted, purchased the right to remove the same, than the removal thereof would result to plaintiff. The reasoning of the opinion on the former appeal we are satisfied, after mature reflection, was erroneous and cannot be followed. The evidence before us at this time is materially different from what it was on the former trial. The trial court expressly finds that there was received on this trial a large mass of new and additional evidence, and the findings of fact are different in one respect, at least, from what they were on the former trial. This being the situation, the doctrine of the law of the case does not apply. None of the cases hold that such doctrine applies on the second appeal of the same case, where the evidence on the second trial was essentially different than on the first. McNamara v. Pengilly, 64 Minn. 543, 67 N. W. 661. To follow the reasoning of the former decision would result in confusion and flagrant inconsistencies. Although the defendants may have shown that the continued maintenance of the dam would work a greater injury to their property and rights than the removal thereof would work to the plaintiff's property, in another action brought by a riparian owner desiring the continuance of the dam it might be shown that the injury and damage to him and his rights would be superior and greater than the injury to the same defendants. So that we would have in one action the solemn judgment of the court that, as between the parties to the particular action, the dam should be maintained in its present condition, and in another action, where other interested parties might seek to have the dam maintained, the solemn adjudication of the court that it be removed. If the equities, from a pecuniary standpoint, may be compared and applied at all, they must, in the nature of the surrounding conditions, be applied as between all those riparian owners and interested parties who desire the removal of the dam on the one hand, and all those desiring it maintained on the other. If the equities in favor of those desiring the removal were collectively greater and superior to those who desire its maintenance, the comparison might possibly be given effect. But we are aware of no rule of law under which all such parties could be compelled to join in such an action. It is clear, however, that as between individual owners, contending on the one hand for the maintenance of the dam and on the other for its removal, to apply the doctrine would be to inject into the situation difficulties and conflicting results, from which the court could not extricate itself. It appears from the memorandum of the learned trial judge that his views of the law on this subject were fully in accord with the result we have reached, but he had no alternative but to apply the rule laid down in the former decision of the case. Plaintiff in this action is in the actual possession of the land described in the complaint, and such possession is sufficient on which to base a right of action. Witt v. St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 38 Minn. 122, 35 N. W. 862.

Passing the question as to comparative equities, we come directly to the main controversy in the case, namely, what right in law or equity has the plaintiff to insist upon the continued maintenance of the dam? The right to maintain it, on the part of the mill company, was acquired by prescription. The mill company, in erecting it, obtained no express grant to do so from the riparian owners; but the erection and maintenance thereof for more than forty years created a prescriptive right to continue its maintenance perpetually. The inquiry is, What right, if any, accrued to the plaintiff and his grantors, and the other owners of property bordering on the river and the lakes formed thereby, as a result from the acts of the mill company and the acquisition by it of the prescriptive right to maintain the dam? The riparian owners improved their property, erected their buildings and fences with reference to the artificial stage of the water as made by the erection of the dam, and acquiesced in its maintenance during the time necessary to create and establish in the mill company and its successors the perpetual right to do so. It is contended on the part of plaintiff that there grew out of the relations between the parties, with respect to the construction and maintenance of the dam, reciprocal rights and privileges, —the right on the part of defendants to maintain it, and the right on the part of plaintiff to insist that it be maintained; while it is contended on the part of defendants that the only rights or privileges resulting from such relations accrued to them, that they may maintain the dam so long as they feel inclined to do so and then destroy it, regardless of the consequences to plaintiff and other riparian owners, and that the only right or benefit which accrued to plaintiff is the very valuable privilege of quietly submitting to the wishes and pleasure of defendants. We adopt the contention of plaintiff as most in consonance with the equity and justice of the case. If plaintiff and his grantors acquired a reciprocal right to have the dam maintained, it is not material that its removal will result in less injury and damage to them than to defendants. Prescriptive rights find no support in pecuniary considerations. It is a right or privilege appurtenant and incident to realty, and passes with the title thereto.

The authorities are numerous that where the flow of a stream of water has been diverted from its natural channel, or obstructed by a permanent dam, and such diversion or obstruction has continued for the time necessary to establish a prescriptive right to perpetually maintain the same, the riparian owners along such stream of water, who have improved their property with reference to the change and in reliance on the continuance thereof, acquire a reciprocal right to have the artificial conditions remain undisturbed; and the person who placed the obstruction in the stream, or caused the diversion of the waters, and all those claiming under or through him, are estopped upon principles of equity from restoring the waters to their natural channel or state. Beeston v. Weate, 5 El. & Bl. 986; Roberts v. Richards, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 297; Jones, Easements, § 808; Gould, Waters, §§ 159, 225; Arkwright v. Gell, 5 Mees. & W. 203; Belknap v. Trimble, 3 Paige, 577. In the latter case, one involving the question here presented, the court said: "I apprehend, also, that this rule must be reciprocal, and that a proprietor of the head of a stream, who has changed the natural flow of the waters and has continued such change for more than twenty years, cannot afterwards be permitted to restore it to its natural state, when it will have the effect to destroy the mills of other proprietors below which have been erected in reference to such change in the natural flow of the stream." In the case of Woodbury v. Short, 17 Vt. 387, 44 Am. Dec. 344, a case involving this principle, it appeared that the course of a stream, running across the land of defendant to plaintiff's land, was changed by a sudden and unusual flood, so that it did not thereafter flow over the land of the latter. Defendant permitted the water to run in the new channel for ten years, and it was held that his acquiescence in the new conditions for so long a time gave rise to a right in plaintiff to insist that the new remain as the natural conditions. Other cases supporting this same doctrine are: Ford v. Whitlock, 27 Vt. 265; Shepardson v. Perkins, 58 N. H. 354; Delaney v. Boston, 2 Harr. (Del.) 489; Mathewson v. Hoffman, 77 Mich. 420, 6 L. R. A. 349, 43 N. W. 879. The latter case is very similar to the one at bar, and directly in point. The court there said: "The exclusive enjoyment of water in a particular way for twenty years, without interruption, becomes an adverse enjoyment sufficient to raise a presumption of title against a right in any other person, which might have been, but was not, asserted. This rule must be reciprocal, and one who has taken the water from the original channel, and has continued to divert and enjoy it for a period beyond the statute of limitation as to real actions, cannot afterwards be permitted to restore it to its original state, when it will have the effect to destroy or materially injure the property of those through or by which it formerly flowed." Smith v. Youmans, 96 Wis. 103, 37 L. R. A. 285, 70 N. W. 1115; is also directly in point. It is there held that it is but a fair inference that riparian owners, in view of advantages that might or would accrue to them by raising the level of the waters of the lake on which their lands border, were induced to consent and acquiesce therein, and in the use of the dam and waters as raised thereby, in view of which it was held that the relations and interests of the parties thus originated and created became fixed by prescription, and imposed upon each reciprocal rights and duties. The 54 L. R. A.

court said: "It has long been settled that the artificial state or condition of flowing water, founded upon prescription, becomes a substitute for the natural condition previously existing, and from which a right arises on the part of those interested to have the new condition maintained. The watercourse, though artificial, may have originated under such circumstances as to give rise to all the rights that riparian proprietors have in a natural and permanent stream, or have been so long used as to become a natural watercourse prescriptively; and 'when a riparian owner has diverted the water into an artificial channel, and continues such change for more than twenty years, he cannot restore it to its natural channel, to the injury of other proprietors along such channel, who have erected works or cultivated their lands with reference to the changed condition of the stream, or to the injury of those upon the artificial watercourse who have acquired by long user the right to enjoy the water there flowing.'" See also Canton Iron Co. v. Buwabik Bessemer Co. 63 Minn. 367, 65 N. W. 643.

The dam in question, having been erected for the purpose of developing power to operate mill machinery, must be taken to be a permanent obstruction; and, it having existed and been maintained as such for so great a length of time, the artificial conditions created thereby must be deemed to have become the natural conditions. There is no suggestion in the evidence that the dam was placed in the river for temporary purposes, and, even though it may at one time have been out of repair, it was nevertheless originally intended as a permanent structure. The authorities all hold, as far as our examination has extended, that in such cases the conditions arising from the permanent obstruction, though artificial to begin with, become by long lapse of time the natural conditions, and interested parties are bound by the rules of law applicable to such conditions. Magor v. Chadwick, 11 Adol. & E. 571; Beeston v. Weate, 5 El. & Bl. 986; Roberts v. Richards, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 297; Mathewson v. Hoffman, 77 Mich. 420, 6 L. R. A. 349, 43 N. W. 879; Finley v. Hershey, 41 Iowa, 389; Murphy v. Gates, 78 Me. 300, 4 Atl. 698. In the case at bar even nature herself became adapted to the new surroundings. A native growth of hard-wood timber sprang up along the shores of the lakes formed by the raise of the river, thus giving a natural effect and appearance to the conditions created by the dam. The government, in the survey of the lands in that vicinity, recognized the artificial as the natural state, and surveyed the public lands with reference to the lakes, meandering them precisely as other natural bodies of water are surveyed and meandered. There can be no difference on principle between cases where the natural channel of a stream is changed and diverted, and those where a permanent obstruction is placed therein. In either case the rights of the parties are essentially the same.

An examination of the books discloses that this same doctrine is applied to public highways and public parks. Where a highway or public park has been laid out by lawful authority, or acquired by dedication or prescription, the owners of property abutting thereon acquire a special right in the continuance of the park, street, or highway, as the case may be, of which they cannot be deprived except by due process of law. The right accrues to them, in cases where the highway or park is acquired by dedication, by the same proceedings and acts that vest the right in the public. Where land is expressly dedicated for a public park, and is improved as such by the public authorities, special rights result and accrue to abutting owners, which vest and are created by the act of dedication. Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286-292, 1 L. R. A. 493, 39 N. W. 629. In the case of Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 7 L. R. A. 548, 10 S. E. 689, it was held that the owners of lots cannot be deprived of the easement appurtenant in the street adjacent thereto, which is distinct from the public right, nor can the legislature grant power to take it from them. The abutting owners in such cases have the right to insist that the street remain. The case of Le Clercq v. Gallipolis, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 218, 28 Am. Dec. 641, was an action by owners of lots adjoining a public park, which had been dedicated to the public use by the owner of the land, to enjoin the public authorities from vacating the park. It was there held that the plaintiffs, though individual owners of lots abutting the public square, could maintain their action to preserve the park for public use. It appeared that they improved their property with reference to the park, and the decision was placed distinctly on the ground that the act of dedication conferred upon them a separate and independent right to have the park maintained. In the case of Rensselaer v. Leopold, 106 Ind. 29, 5 N. E. 761, it was held that the owners of lots abutting the public street have a peculiar and distinct interest in the easement, and that such interest is distinguished from the rights of the general public, in that it becomes an interest legally adhering to the contiguous grounds and buildings thereon, by affording more convenient facilities for their use; and, as the owner of the abutting property may have erected his buildings and made his improvements with reference to the street as existing, it is a valuable property right, which is recognized by the law, and cannot be appropriated or taken from him without his consent. Elliott, Roads & Streets, §§ 150, 877. The act which gives rise to the public right, the act of dedication, vests a distinct and independent right in abutting property owners, which they may protect by application to a court of equity. The doctrine of these cases is applicable to the case at bar. The mill company acquired its right to maintain the dam by prescription, and during the time such right was maturing a reciprocal right in the riparian owners to insist that it be maintained, at least that no overt act be taken for its removal, was also maturing, which ripened and became equal to the right of the mill company upon the completion of the prescriptive period. The reciprocal right thus created was not merely a personal one, but a right appurtenant and incident to the lands.

Something was said on the argument with reference to the right of a mill owner to abandon his mill and permit the dam to become out of repair and finally destroyed by the elements, and the question was suggested as to whether he could be compelled to repair the same or be required to maintain the dam after its abandonment; and it is further mooted whether or not the riparian owners would have the right to enter upon the mill owner's property, in the case of his failure or neglect to keep the dam in repair, and put it in order and maintain it at their own expense. These questions are not involved in the case, and we do not decide them. When they are presented in any proper case, they will be taken up and disposed of in the usual way. It may be doubted whether the mill owner could be compelled to maintain the dam in good repair. No principle of law making it his duty to do so now occurs to us. But it is not so clear but that the riparian owners, having acquiesced in the maintenance of the milldam for such a length of time as to create a perpetual right in the mill owner to maintain it, out of which, within the authorities we have cited, grew the reciprocal right to insist that it be not disturbed, and that the water as raised by the dam be maintained at its artificial height, would have the right to enter upon the property and repair any defects in the dam, and keep and maintain it in order and repair at their own expense. But these questions are not before the court, and we do not decide them, nor do we wish to be understood as expressing any opinion with reference thereto. The action is to restrain and enjoin defendants from taking any active or affirmative steps looking to the removal of the dam, and whether they may be compelled by law to keep it in repair is not involved in the determination of the case. We hold that they may be restrained from committing any overt act, and from taking any affirmative steps looking to the removal of the dam. Perhaps the apparent difficulties in the matter of keeping the dam in repair after abandonment by the mill owner may be relieved and obviated by an application of the provisions of chapter 88, Laws 1897. We have not considered the question whether defendants could be restrained from taking out the dam because of the statutes prohibiting the draining of meandered lakes. The disposition of the case on the other question renders it unnecessary.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Peter M. WALLIN, Resp't.,
v.
EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY of Min-

(.....Minn.....)

*1. The complaint in this action states that appellant operated a railroad in the state of Wisconsin, and engaged a "bridge gang" at West Superior to operate from that point the repair and reconstruction of bridges along its line. As a part of the consideration of the hiring contract, appellant agreed to daily transport the men to and from West Superior to the station nearest the place of their day's labor, by means of its regular trains, and for their transportation from such station to their point of work they were furnished hand cars, to be propelled by themselves. While respondent, who was one of the crew, was riding on a hand car from the place of that day's work to a station where they would board appellant's train back to West Superior, another hand car, propelled by other members of the same gang, overtook the first car, and was negligently propelled against it, derailing it and causing injury to respondent. One of the handles on the front end of the rear car, as it was then approaching, was broken off; and, because of its absence, the other handle on the same end of that car caused the preceding car to be pushed laterally and derailed. Held, that the complaint states a cause of action, in the following particulars: The respondent and other members of the crew were employees of appellant, and at the time of the injury were engaged in their duties as such, within the meaning of chapter 220, Wis. Laws 1898. Benson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 78 Minn. 808, 80 N. W. 1050, distinguished.

2. Appellant was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to provide suitable rules and regulations for the control and operation of hand cars under such circumstances.

3. The defective handle may, under the circumstances, have been the proximate cause of the injury, and the proper rule in such case is as follows: "A person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced person fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed, whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not, would at the time of the negligent act have thought reasonably possible to follow if they had occurred to his mind." Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640, approved.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. W. E. Dodge, for appellant:

Plaintiff and his companions, members of the bridge gang, were not, within the purpose and meaning of chap. 220, Wis. Laws 1893, at the time of the alleged collision and injury, engaged in the discharge of their duties under their employment.

The law does not require the master to promulgate rules for the protection of its servants where the risks and dangers are obvious or arise from the negligence of co-servants engaged in the common employment.

The absence of one of the handles from one corner of the hand car following that on which the plaintiff was riding was not the proximate cause of the derailment and consequent injury to the plaintiff; and the derailment was not such a consequence as, under the facts pleaded, could or ought to have been foreseen by the defendant as likely to follow the absence of the handle.

In an action in tort it is not necessary, in order to make the master liable for the acts of his servant, that the servant should have acted within the scope of his employment;

it is sufficient if the act is in the course of his employment.

The defective condition of the second hand car (one of its front handles being broken off) was a concurring and contributing cause of the accident, and defendant's carelessness in furnishing this defective car constitutes actionable negligence.

Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action states, in substance: That the defendant is incorporated under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, owning and operating a line of railway between St. Paul, Minnesota, and West Superior, Wisconsin, and that about 22 miles of its tracks extend through the state of Wisconsin. That in the year 1899 defendant was engaged in repairing and reconstructing the wooden bridges and culverts on that division of its line extending from the city of West Superior, Wisconsin, to the village of Sandstone, Minnesota, for which purpose defendant employed a gang of about twelve men, comprising carpenters and helpers, designated as the "bridge gang." The plaintiff was a carpenter by trade, and on May 12, 1899, was employed by defendant to work as a member of the bridge gang, to assist in the repairing and reconstructing of bridges and culverts on the Wisconsin side of defendant's line of railway. That all members of such bridge gang were at the time of their employment by defendant located at West Superior, Wisconsin. That such bridge-repair work was then and there carried on by defendant from West Superior as the starting point, and as a part of the contract of employment of the plaintiff, and in consideration of his agreement to perform such services, defendant undertook, promised, and agreed with plaintiff to carry him over its line of railway every morning from West Superior to the places along its tracks where he would be required to work during the day, and every evening back again to West Superior, by means of regular trains to the nearest station, and from such point to the place of work by hand cars. It is further alleged: That on October 4, 1899, and during the whole of that day, such bridge gang, including plaintiff, were, in the course of their employment with defendant, engaged in repairing a certain bridge on defendant's line of railway at a point in Wisconsin about 11 miles southwest of West Superior. That at about 5:30 o'clock in the afternoon of that day, while so engaged in such employment, plaintiff, with the other members of the bridge gang, was ordered by defendant to go upon one of defendant's hand cars, so furnished, and to assist in propelling the same over defendant's tracks and railroad line towards Saunders, for the purpose of enabling plaintiff and members of the bridge gang to take defendant's passenger train back to West Superior. That, while plaintiff was engaged in his duty as such employee in propelling such hand car, defendant then and there caused another hand car to be also propelled over such track by other servants of defendant, members of the same bridge gang, in close proximity to and immediately following the hand car propelled by plaintiff. The car in charge of the other members of the bridge gang was defective, in that one of the handles on the front end of the car, as it was then proceeding, was broken off, and the car was so carelessly and negligently handled by the parties in charge of it that, without fault on plaintiff's part, and without any warning or notice, it ran into and collided with the preceding car, upon which plaintiff was riding, and by reason of the absence of the handle the preceding car was pushed off the track and derailed, thereby injuring plaintiff. It is then charged that defendant was guilty of negligence by its failure to provide reasonable rules and regulations to control the running of hand cars upon its tracks. The complaint then sets forth chap. 220, Wis. Laws 1893, which provides that a railway company shall be liable for damages sustained within that state by any employee of such company, without contributory negligence on his part, when injuries are occasioned by any defective apparatus, etc., or while engaged in operating trains, and while engaged in the performance of his duty as such employee, which injuries shall have been caused by carelessness or negligence of any other employee. This complaint was demurred to upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, the demurrer being overruled, defendant appeals. Defendant attacks the complaint upon three independent grounds: First, that plaintiff and his fellow workers were not, at the time of plaintiff's injury, employees, engaged in their duties as such, within the purpose and meaning of the Wisconsin act;

second, that, under the circumstances alleged in the complaint, defendant was not required to furnish rules regulating the use and operation of hand cars; third, that the absence of one of the handles from the following car was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, and that the derailment of the car was not such a consequence, under the facts pleaded, as could or ought to have been foreseen by defendant as likely to follow the absence of the handle.

1. In support of the first proposition appellant relies upon the case of Benson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 78 Minn. 303, 80 N. W. 1050. In that case the railway company were engaged in repairing and resurfacing its track, and, for convenience, kept and maintained, on a side track near where the repairs were being made, a number of cars for the boarding and lodging of the men. When the necessities of the work required the men to be separated some distance from these cars, the railway company furnished hand cars for the convenience of the men, on which to transport themselves to and from their occupation; and, while plaintiff in that action was riding upon a hand car between the place of his employment and the boarding cars, another hand car, carrying other employees, engaged in similar work, overtook and collided with it, whereby the injury was occasioned. It was held that at the time of the injury the men in charge of the hand cars were not engaged in the discharge of their duties under their employment, within the meaning of the Wisconsin act. The decision rests upon the ground that defendant had no control over the men at that time, was not boarding them, had not undertaken to transport them to and from their work, and that the hand cars were furnished merely for the convenience of the employees, who were in no sense acting in the performance of their regular duties. The facts stated in the complaint we are now considering are entirely different. While there is an apparent lack of candor and fullness in the allegations of the complaint upon the question whether or not the wages of the men covered the entire time of their absence from West Superior, yet we think it must be inferred from the statements therein contained that the employment for each day commenced at the time they left West Superior, and ended at the time of their return. It is stated that the men were employed at West Superior; that the work of repairing and reconstructing was conducted from that point; that, as a part of the consideration of their employment, the defendant agreed to transport them to and from the places of work by the means specified; and that during the whole of the day of the occurrence of the injury they were engaged in the performance of their duties as such employees. We, therefore, consider the complaint sufficient in this respect,—that it shows with reasonable certainty that at the time of the injury not only respondent, but the other members of the bridge gang in charge of the other car, were employees of appellant, and engaged in the performance of their duties as such.

2. Conceding, then, that respondent and the other men in charge of the hand cars were employees of appellant, and as such engaged in the performance of their duties at the time of the injury, we now consider whether or not the company was required to have in force suitable rules and regulations to govern and control the operation of hand cars under such circumstances. It is well known that the operation of hand cars by men engaged in repairing a railway track is attended with considerable danger. Men frequently go in separate gangs on two cars to some point upon a railroad, and are obliged to run rapidly to avoid passing trains, and accidents are not infrequent as a result of collisions of hand cars thus operated; and it would seem that such business is of so dangerous and hazardous a character that ordinary men who are called upon to take charge of hand cars under such circumstances should be guided by reasonable rules and regulations. In the case of Steffenson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Minn. 355, 11 L. R. A. 271, 47 N. W. 1066, reference is made to the danger of operating hand cars; and in the case of Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640, it appears that a rule of that company was in force which required hand cars to be kept apart for a distance of 540 feet. It is true these men were not engaged in the same capacity as section men are, who remain constantly at work along the track for the purpose of repairing it, and are usually in charge of some manager or section boss, but that fact would not lessen the duty of the master to impose rules and regulations for the operation of hand cars. It would, rather, tend to increase that duty; for there would be more necessity of reasonable regulations with respect to inexperienced men for such purposes than where a section crew is operating under the control of a manager. This requirement should not be regarded as a hardship upon a railway company, as it tends to the safety of the public as well as employees, and certainly inures to the protection of the company itself. Our conclusion is that, under such circumstances, it was negligence on the part of appellant to place its employees in charge of such defective car, and permit them to operate it in the manner stated, in the absence of reasonable rules and regulations for their guidance.

3. If the members of the bridge gang riding on the rear car were employees of defendant, and engaged in their duties as such, it follows, under the Wisconsin act, that appellant is responsible for the injury resulting by reason of the collision of the cars, provided such collision was caused by the negligence of those in control of the rear car, and without contributory negligence on respondent's part. It is charged in the complaint that the injury was occasioned in that manner, and it therefore, in that respect, states a cause of action. But the complaint also charges that the derailment of the first car was occasioned by the absence of a handle which had been broken off from the second car, and we have to consider if in this respect a cause of action is stated. Conceding that the rear car was negligently operated, and that it might have so collided with the forward car as to cause its derailment, even though the handle were not broken off, yet it is possible that the car might have been so operated that derailment would not have occurred except for the absence of the handle. The act in question provides as follows: "When such injury is caused by a defect in any locomotive, engine, car, rail, track, machinery, or appliance required by said company to be used by its employees in and about the business in their employment, if such defect could have been discovered by such company by reasonable and proper care, tests, or inspection, and proof of such defect shall be presumptive evidence of knowledge thereof on the part of such company." As heretofore stated, the complaint sufficiently charges that the car in question was being used by employees of appellant in and about the business of their employment. It also appears that the defect is one that could have been discovered by reasonable and proper care or inspection; and the complaint alleges that appellant, under its contract with respondent, was required to furnish him and the other men with hand cars for the purpose of conveying them between the stations where they were required to take a train to the places where they were at work. Assuming, therefore, that there was no negligence on the part of the employees in charge of the rear car which would have derailed the front one, had the handle been in place, was the absence of the handle the proximate cause of the injury? It will be noticed, from the above-quoted section, that proof of defect in a car or appliance so furnished shall be presumptive evidence of knowledge on the part of the company that such defect existed. Objection is made to this portion of the complaint upon the ground that the missing handle was not the proximate cause of the injury, and that the derailment of the car, and resulting injury, was not such a consequence as could have been foreseen by appellant as likely to follow the absence of the handle. Handles are placed on hand cars for the purpose of lifting them off and on the track. In case it should become necessary to hastily remove a car from a track, the absence of a handle might be the cause of delay, and, hence, consequent injury; and, if an injury were occasioned under such circumstances, it might reasonably have been anticipated. Under the circumstances of this case, it may be conceded that it could not have been reasonably anticipated that the mere absence of a handle from a car would occasion the derailment of another with which it might happen to collide. But, after knowing how it happened, and being told it was occasioned because the handles were so situated that those on the rear would strike evenly upon a preceding car, and push it evenly, we can readily understand how, if one of the handles was broken off, the other handle might, under such circumstances, tend to push the car to one side, and thus derail it. The question is, Is it the proper rule of law that an injured person cannot recover, under such circumstances, unless the master, at the time cars were furnished to a servant and his collaborators, could reasonably have anticipated that an injury was liable to happen in that particular manner? Or is this the proper rule: that the master would be liable if it could have been reasonably foreseen that injury in some form was likely to result, even though the precise nature of it could not be anticipated? In the case of Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640, the workmen in charge of a rear hand car were running at such rapid speed, contiguous to the preceding one, that they were unable to stop their car, and ran over a person who fell from the first car. In that case the question was raised as to what was the proximate cause of the injury; and it was contended that plaintiff therein could not recover, because under such circumstances such a result could not reasonably have been foreseen. In the opinion attention is called directly to the confusion in the use of the word "negligence" and the term "proximate cause," and it is there stated that the correct rule is that if the act is one which the party ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have anticipated as likely to result in injury, then he is liable for any injury proximately resulting from it, although he could not have anticipated the particular injury which did occur. To the same effect the rule is stated in Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251. In discussing this question, Shearman & Redfield in their work on Negligence, 5th ed., § 28, state that the weight of authority seems to be against holding a defendant liable for all actual consequences of his wrongful acts, when they are such that no human being, even with the fullest knowledge of the circumstances, would have considered likely to occur, and, again, that the best authorities seem to be quite opposed to the theory that a defendant should be held liable only for such consequences as he ought himself to have foreseen; and they lay down as a proper rule the following: "A person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced man fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed (whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not) would at the time of the negligent act have thought reasonably possibly to follow if they had occurred to his mind." This statement somewhat extends the definition announced in the Christianson Case, is more comprehensive, and probably as perfect as it is possible to formulate an abstract proposition upon the subject. Upon first impression, such a rule might not seem applicable to the facts in this case, but the safety of all persons engaged in so hazardous a business as railroading requires that the company be held strictly to account in regard to its cars, implements, and appliances. If the handle had been in place on this car, the preceding one might have been pushed along evenly, although forcibly, without damage; and, while appellant could not reasonably have anticipated that an accident would happen in the manner it did, it would occur to any reasoning person, after being put in possession of the facts, that such a result might follow. Other cases within this rule, substantially as stated in Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640, are Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Chapman, 80 Ala. 615, 2 So. 738; Ehrgott v. New York, 96 N. Y. 264, 48 Am. Rep. 622; Western & A. R. Co. v. Bailey, 105 Ga. 100, 31 S. E. 547. Counsel for appellant cites the case of Weissel v. Eastern R. Co. 79 Minn. 245, 82 N. W. 576, in support of the rule of law which he contends should apply to this case. Special reference is made to a sentence quoted from the opinion in that case, as follows: "The defendant ought not to be required to anticipate that so unusual and peculiar combination of circumstances would occur as to occasion so extraordinary and unexpected an accident." It is claimed this language implies that this court has abandoned the doctrine announced in Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640, and intends to adhere to the rule that the defendant in such case can be held liable only when it appears that the manner in which the injury took place could reasonably have been anticipated. The sentence quoted must be read in connection with what follows, and with regard to the facts in that case. The decision is based upon the ground that the original piling of the coal in the manner stated was not in itself a negligent act, and hence it followed that such fact was not the proximate cause of the injury, and upon the further ground that, if the lump of coal causing the injury was displaced by the act of plaintiff's coservant, then, under the prior decisions of this court, the plaintiff could not recover, for the reason that such servants were not engaged in the operation of the railroad, and were not exposed to the peculiar dangers attending that business.

Brown, J., dissenting:

There is no substantial difference between the case at bar and the Benson Case with respect to whether the employees in question were at the time of the accident engaged in the discharge of their duties as such, and the latter case should be followed and applied. There is no doubt but that plaintiff and his associates were employees of the company, but they were no more in the discharge of the duties of their employment at the time complained of than were the employees in the Benson Case. In that case it appeared that the men were permitted to take and use the hand cars to transport themselves to and from their work, while in the case in hand the cars were furnished for the same purpose under an agreement upon the part of the company to do so. In response to this agreement the company furnished the cars, and the workmen operated and controlled them. No one was placed in charge by the company, so far as the complaint informs us, nor did it operate the cars. This the men did for themselves. The attempt of the majority to distinguish the cases is rather strained, and without substantial elements. They say that the complaint does not candidly and fully allege whether the "wages of the men covered the entire time of their absence from West Superior; yet it must be inferred from the statements therein contained that the employment for each day commenced at the time they left West Superior, and ended at the time of their return." The relevancy of this fact, conceding it to be a fact, is not apparent. It has no tendency to show that the men were engaged in repairing or building bridges (the work for which they were employed) during the time they were returning from the active discharge of their duties to their homes in West Superior. But, whether relevant or not, the complaint will be searched in vain for any statements or suggestions that the men were engaged by the day, by the month, or by the hour. If they were engaged by the month, their wages would cover the entire time from the commencement to the end of their employment; and, if I understand the contention and theory of the court, they would be employees actually engaged in the discharge of their duties as such during all that time. It would be much better to overrule the Benson Case than to indulge in a distinction inclosed within such narrow limits. It seems very clear that, if plaintiff can recover at all in this action, it must be upon the theory that defendant negligently failed to keep and perform the agreement alleged to have been made by it to carry and transport the plaintiff, with his collaborators, to and from their work. If this agreement was made and entered into, and in the performance thereof defendant was guilty of negligence with respect to the manner of performance, or the means provided therefor, in consequence of which plaintiff was injured, he should recover. Upon this branch of the case, plaintiff alleges two specific acts of negligence, viz.: (1) That defendant was negligent in failing to adopt and promulgate suitable rules for the operation of the hand cars; and (2) that one of the hand cars furnished the men was defective and out of repair. If the complaint can be sustained on either theory, and the alleged negligent act or omission be the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, he certainly has a right of action. If defendant agreed to transport the men to and from their work, it was bound to the exercise of reasonable care and prudence in the performance of the agreement. McDonough v. Lanpher, 55 Minn. 501, 57 N. W. 152. The court sustained the complaint in both respects.

1. The principle of law requiring a person engaged in a complicated or complex business to establish rules and regulations for its conduct is clearly and plainly stated in Wood, Mast. & S. 794, as follows: "If a master is engaged in a complex business, that requires definite regulations for the safety and protection of his employees, a failure to adopt proper rules, as well as laxity in their enforcement, is negligence per se." And by Shearman & Redfield, in their work on Negligence (vol. 1, § 202), as follows: "A master who employs servants in a dangerous and complicated business is personally bound to prescribe rules sufficient for its orderly and safe management." There is nothing complicated in or about the operation of a hand car, and, although the complaint alleges that it was necessary that rules be adopted by defendant, there are no allegations that the ordinary operation of such car is at all complicated or difficult to understand or comprehend; nor are there any special facts alleged showing any necessity for such rules. In addition to the absence of such allegations of facts showing the necessity for rules, the complaint further alleges and shows that the accident in question was the result of the careless and negligent conduct of plaintiff's coemployees. Although the allegations are that the employees operating the car following the one on which plaintiff was riding were negligent and careless in the operation of the same, a fair construction of the complaint shows that their conduct was wilful and intentional as well. They deliberately ran down the car on which plaintiff was riding. I do not understand that the rule of law requiring the adoption of regulations for the conduct of a complicated business is intended to protect workmen from their own negligence. Such regulations and rules are required solely for the purpose of enabling the employees to understand and comprehend the operation and management of instrumentalities and services of a complex nature which may result in injury to them if not understood, and not to guard or protect them from their own negligent misconduct, nor shield them from dangers and risks which are apparent and obvious to a person of ordinary intelligence. Morgan v. Hudson River Ore & I. Co. 133 N. Y. 666, 31 N. E. 234; Voss v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 50, 41 Atl. 224; Berrigan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 131 N. Y. 582, 30 N. E. 57. The complaint clearly takes the case without the rule, by alleging that the injury to plaintiff was caused by the negligence of his coemployees.

2. The other ground on which plaintiff seeks to recover is that the hand car furnished by defendant to plaintiff and his co-laborers was defective and out of repair, and it is claimed that this defect was the proximate cause of the accident. The defect consists in the fact that one of the handles on the end of the car had prior to that time been broken off, and was in that condition when delivered to the employees for the purposes stated. The handles are made use of solely in lifting the cars on and off the track. They are not employed in the operation of the car. A car might be used in the ordinary and usual manner until worn out, and no accident or injury of any kind ever result from the absence of the handles. The position of the court in its attempt to connect the absence of the handles with the accident is unsound. It is said that it might become necessary to hastily remove the car from the track; that the absence of the handle might cause delay in doing so, and result in some injury; and that, if the injury might be caused or occasioned under such circumstances, the accident in question is one that might reasonably have been anticipated, and one for which it is liable in damages. It is very far from clear just how the mere absence of this handle could, in any essential degree, delay the men in removing the car from the track. But conceding that it might, it does not follow that the company was bound to know and to anticipate that it might come in collision with another car, and force the car collided with off the track in the manner set out in the complaint. The rule of proximate cause is stated very clearly in Christianson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Minn. 94, 69 N. W. 640, as follows: "If a person had no reasonable ground to anticipate that a particular act would or might result in any injury to anybody, then, of course, the act would not be negligent at all; but, if the act itself is negligent, then the person guilty of it is equally liable for all its natural and proximate consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not." It cannot be said, in reason and good sense, that permitting the hand car in question to remain without a handle was an act of negligence. The handle had no connection with the ordinary operation of the car. All four handles might have been absent, and the management of the car or its operation in no way interfered with. The court in that case further says: "Otherwise expressed, the law is that if the act is one which the party ought, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have anticipated was liable to result in injury to others, then he is liable for any injury proximately resulting from it, although he could not have anticipated the particular injury which did happen. The consequences which follow in unbroken sequence, without an intervening efficient cause, from the original negligent act, are natural and proximate; and for such consequences the original wrongdoer is responsible, even though he could not have foreseen the particular results which did follow." But for the wilful, careless, and negligent conduct of the men in charge of the car following the one on which the plaintiff was riding, no accident to plaintiff's car would have happened at all. It was their wilful and intentional running down of plaintiff's car which was the direct and proximate cause of his injury. Conceding that the car was defective because of the absence of the handle, the negligent and careless conduct of plaintiff's coemployees in so running down his car, and thus causing the derailment, was an intervening, efficient cause of the accident, and the absence of the handle only a remote agency. The defendant was not bound to contemplate such a result. It appears to me, clearly, that plaintiff has no cause of action because of the alleged defective condition of the hand car. The case is very much, in so far as this branch of it is concerned, like that of Weisel v. Eastern R. Co. 79 Minn. 245, 82 N. W. 576. What is there said on this subject is applicable to the case at bar: "The defendant ought not to be required to anticipate that so unusual and peculiar a combination of circumstances would occur as to occasion so extraordinary and unexpected an accident from such a commonplace and ordinarily simple cause."

For these reasons, I dissent, and am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Lovely concurs therein.

STATE of Minnesota, Respt.,

v.

M. J. LARSON et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

"The bond to be executed by a person making application for a license to sell intoxicating liquors, in accordance with Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2026, is one of indemnity, given to protect the state, as well as such private parties as are authorized to maintain actions under the provisions of § 1992. The amount thereof, fixed by statute at $2,000, is a penalty, and not in the nature of liquidated damages, to be recovered as an entire sum in case any of the conditions of the bond are violated.

(Start, Ch. J., and Brown, J., dissent.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Renville County overruling a demurrer to a complaint filed to recover the penalty of a bond given to obtain a liquor license. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. J. Volstead, E. L. Winje, Robert Jamison, and Cobb & Wheelwright, for appellants:

This bond is to indemnify the state against damage sustained by the commission of one or more of the prohibited offenses; which damage necessarily consists in the failure by the offender to pay some fine or judgment for costs imposed upon him in a criminal prosecution. In other words, the measure of damages for its breach is the amount of any unpaid fine and costs.

13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 852, 853; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 270; Minneapolis v. Olson, 76 Minn. 1, 78 N. W. 877.

In nearly every case where it has been decided that the full amount specified in liquor bonds of this character becomes a debt as soon as there is a breach, and can be recovered as such, the court had under consideration a statute which in express terms so provided, and therefore permitted of no other construction.

Lightner v. Com. 31 Pa. 341.

Nor can it be said that the damages sustained by reason of a breach of the bond are not easily ascertainable.

State v. Estabrook, 29 Kan. 739; Jenkins v. Danville, 79 Ill. App. 339.

The infliction of a penalty of $2,000 for a single breach of this bond is out of all proportion to the gravity of the offense committed.

17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 335.

To impose a penalty of $2,100 for the commission of such an offense as is specified in this bond contravenes the letter and spirit of the Constitution, where it is prescribed that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor shall excessive fines be imposed, nor unusual punishment be inflicted."

Robison v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549, 37 N. W. 21.

Mr. W. A. McDowell, with Mr. A. V. Rieke, for respondent:

The penalty named in the bond may be recovered for a single breach, without reference to the actual damages sustained.

This is a civil action brought by the state against Martin J. Larson as principal, and the other defendants as sureties, upon a liquor bond given pursuant to § 2026, Gen. Stat. 1894. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled by the court below, and the case is here upon an appeal from the overruling order.

The complaint alleges the application of the principal for a license; the execution of the bond in the sum of $2,000; the issuance of a license; that on a day certain, in violation of the laws of the state and of the ordinances of the village, he sold certain malt liquors to one Kinsberg, who was then a minor person, under the age of twenty-one years; that he was duly arrested under a warrant issued out of a justice's court for the violation aforesaid, was arraigned in said court, and, in proceedings thereafter had, was duly convicted of the offense of which he was charged, was ordered to pay a fine of $25 and costs of prosecution, and in default thereof to be imprisoned in the common jail of Renville county for a term not exceeding thirty days, or until said fine and costs were paid; that he paid said fine and costs, and was duly discharged from custody. The question is, Was a cause of action stated upon this bond when it appeared that the offender had paid the fine and costs imposed upon him by the court as a penalty for a violation of the law which prohibits the sale of malt liquors to a person under the age of twenty-one years, there being no special damages alleged in the complaint? Or, stated in another form, the question is whether the sum of $2,000, the amount specified in the bond, shall be treated as a penalty, the amount recoverable to be measured by the actual damages; or is the amount to be treated as liquidated damages, the whole thereof to be recovered in a single action brought by the state, whenever the condition of the bond has been violated? It is a question of statutory construction, and must be decided by taking into consideration the entire statute regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, in our endeavor to ascertain the legislative intent. A majority of the court are of the opinion that the amount specified in the bond must be treated as a penalty, to be enforced to the amount of actual damages and no further, and that the whole sum of $2,000 cannot be considered as liquidated damages; the whole to be collected in case of any infraction of the law, technical or otherwise, intentional or unintentional. While the question is not without perplexity, we are somewhat influenced by the belief that, in the absence of any express provision, such an instrument, executed in compliance with a law which recognizes traffic in intoxicating liquors as a legitimate business, should not be rigidly construed when the result will inevitably be oppressive and unjust. The law is that the authority to impose penalties, and especially excessive penalties, must be strictly construed. Minneapolis v. Olson, 76 Minn. 1, 78 N. W. 877. The legislature may see fit, in the future, by express enactment and in positive language, to exact the pound of flesh; but for many years, at least since Shylock demanded strict compliance with the condition of his bond only to meet with disaster, such exactions have not met with favor in or out of judicial tribunals.

It is evident that the statutes of this state bearing upon intoxicating liquors are in a very complicated condition. This is undoubtedly the result of enactments at nearly every legislative session since we became 54 L. R. A.

a state, without regard to existing statutes, and oftentimes producing absolute conflict. As early as 1858 a bond was required from licensees, with conditions similar to those now found in § 2026, the amount thereof to be $1,000. In the year 1862 the amount of the bond was decreased to $500, the conditions being those that had theretofore prevailed. In 1887 the license fee was greatly increased, and also the amount of the bond, the latter being fixed at $2,000. The conditions to be contained therein were not materially altered. The law of 1858 provided for a revocation of licenses in case conditions of the bond were violated, and the further provision making the obligors liable for all damages done by persons intoxicated by liquors obtained from the principal was a feature of the law, and it still remains a part of § 1992. In 1872 the last clause now found in said section was added, whereby the sureties upon the bond were made "jointly and severally liable with the principal for the payment of said damages, to be recovered in a civil action." For more than twenty-eight years this clause, which gives a right of action upon the bond to a private person in case he sustains damages at the hands of an intoxicated person, has been in force. It is still in force unless it is abolished by this court, as it would be, practically, should we sustain the position of counsel for the state.

It is evident that the legislators who enacted these provisions as to the right of the injured persons to recover in civil actions on account of all damages done by intoxicated persons to them were of the opinion that the amount fixed in the bond was simply a penalty, to be recovered, as occasion might require, by different plaintiffs, and to the amount each might be injured. We believe it to be a rule of general application that the amount of a bond of this character—nothing but a contract—must be treated as a penalty, rather than as liquidated damages. In any event, when the intent of the parties appears, as it does here, to be doubtful and uncertain, no good reason exists why such an instrument should be rigidly and narrowly construed. Such a construction is not at all necessary for the enforcement of the laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors; for other and adequate remedies are provided.

It seems to us, aside from that section of the law hereinbefore quoted, and to which further reference will be made, that the legislature could not have intended that the entire amount of the bond should be recovered for a single offense on the part of the principal obligor. The bond may be violated, as may be the liquor laws of this state, unintentionally, and without a purpose to disregard the statute. Take the case now before us: The sale made by Larson was to a minor person. It was, under the law, made at the risk of the former; for it was incumbent upon him to know whether the purchaser was a minor or an adult. In this respect, the sale was at his peril. If he sold to a minor person in the belief, and having every reason to believe, that the latter was over the age of twenty-one years, his want of knowledge as to the real fact was no defense. Intent or knowledge is not an essential element in the commission of the offense. Every person violating the law in this particular way is declared guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be punished by a fine of not less than $25, nor more than $100, or be imprisoned in the county jail for not less than thirty nor more than ninety days. If the construction placed upon the bond by the counsel for the state is correct, the fine, including costs of prosecution, may be in excess of $100. In addition to this, the license, for which the violator must have paid $500 or $1,000, possibly more, depending upon the population and the ordinances in his municipality, is revoked without further action (§§ 1993, 2001), and this may occur on the very day on which he has paid for the license. The result might be that for an unintentional violation of the law, made a misdemeanor by statute, with a minimum fine of $25, and a maximum of $100 and costs, the offender would be compelled to pay over for a single offense, not knowingly committed, over $2,100, and lose the amount of his license fee ($1,000) in addition. In no case could he escape with a loss of less than $2,025, and $500 more, the amount of his license fee.

It may be argued that under our construction conviction of a violation, in a court of competent jurisdiction, must precede an action upon the bond, and for this reason such construction is radically wrong. Probably conviction before a civil action can be instituted will be necessary; but power to revoke the license, and to deprive the licensee of his occupation as well as the sum he has paid for such license, in no case less than $500, is with the municipal authorities, intervention by the courts not being required. § 2020. This, in itself, seems quite a severe penalty. We are not defending the saloon keeper who violates the law, nor are we upholding the business of selling intoxicating liquors, lawfully or unlawfully, when we say that such a result would be strikingly unjust, and smack strongly of persecution. While it may not violate the constitutional provisions forbidding the imposition of excessive fines, or the infliction of unusual punishments, this penalty would be exceedingly excessive, and of a character to shock our sense of justice and right. It would remind us of the days when trivial offenses were punished by absolute and wholesale confiscation of the offenders' estates. In practice, that would frequently be the result should the amount of the bond be declared liquidated damages. We cannot believe that the legislature intended any such drastic measure; for, had that been the design, the law would have so stated. This has been done in several states; it being expressly provided in some that judgment may be entered on such a bond against the principal and sureties for the full penalty thereof. In support of our views, we cite State v. Estabrook, 29 Kan. 739; Jenkins v. Danville, 79 Ill. App. 339. It is not to be understood that there are no cases to the contrary, for several have been referred to, notably Quintard v. Corcoran, 50 Conn. 34, in which two Rhode Island cases are cited as authority; the court saying that the question in issue was there decided in the same way. A glance at these cases (Tripp v. Norton, 10 R. I. 125; Providence v. Bligh, 10 R. I. 208) will show that no such question was presented or decided. We are also referred to some cases arising under the Federal revenue law. The courts in which revenue cases are litigated have always construed the conditions found in revenue bonds with great strictness and excessive severity, and we are not inclined to accept their rules on this subject. But, as before intimated, our conclusion is largely influenced by our sense of right and justice, and also by the provision found in the latter part of § 1992, and heretofore quoted, to the effect that the principal and his sureties shall be jointly and severally liable for the payment of damages caused by an intoxicated person, to be recovered in a civil action brought by the person injured. This clearly indicates that the amount of the bond must be declared a penalty, and must be recovered as such. If the construction contended for is to be given the bond, this provision of the statute is entirely without force or effect. It is rendered nugatory, for the amount of the bond is either a penalty, or it is liquidated damages. It cannot be both. The amount cannot be declared a penalty when a civil action is brought under § 1992, by a person injured, to recover damages done by an intoxicated person, and then held to be liquidated damages in an action brought upon a complaint drawn as was the one we have before us. It cannot be one kind of a bond, for one purpose, to-day, and another kind of a bond, for another purpose, to-morrow. The statute just referred to cannot be construed as authority for the collection of the whole amount named, by a private party, unless he has been injured in the full sum. That is, he is not authorized to enforce the obligation except to the amount of his damages. It may be suggested that an injured party might intervene in an action instituted by the state to recover the stipulated amount, but this presupposes that he is fully informed as to the facts upon which his action can be maintained, and, further, that he has knowledge of the pendency of the action brought by the state. He has a statutory right to proceed in a civil action to recover his damages, and should not be placed in a position where he must either enter into a race with the state to determine which of the two can first commence an action, or suffer a loss. Nor should he be compelled to keep watch upon all proceedings in the courts in order to protect himself by intervention when the state moves. It may be also suggested that the right to recover may be unavailing because other parties have forestalled, by similar actions, one who has the right. This suggestion would be equally as potent in any other case where the amount of a bond is in the nature of a penalty, and damages in excess thereof occur. But, in any event, we do not decide that this is not a continuing bond. It is impossible to harmonize this particular section of the statute with the contention of counsel for the state, and for this reason, if there be no other, we are compelled to hold that the purpose of the bond was to indemnify the state as well as private parties against all damages that may actually result from any breach thereof, and not to authorize a recovery of the full amount as liquidated damages. It follows that the complaint failed to state a cause of action.

Brown, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The court in this case has fallen into the error of construing the bond on which the action is founded on the rule of law applicable between individuals as to bonds given to secure the performance of some collateral agreement by the obligor. It is not such a bond. It is a bond given as the condition for the issuance of a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors pursuant to the statutes of the state, and as security for the observance of the liquor laws.

The act of August 12, 1858, found in Comp. Stat. 1849-58, is the first expression of the legislature of this state on the subject of the sale of intoxicating liquors. A prior act of the territorial legislature contained most of the features of the act of 1858, especially with reference to the bond, and the prosecution of an action thereon, in the event of a violation of any of its conditions. By the act of 1858, a bond is required as a condition precedent to the granting of a license to deal in such liquors,—a bond in the sum of $1,000 for a general dealer, and a bond of $500 for a license to deal in malt liquors only. The act prohibits certain sales, and provides fixed penalties for a violation of any of its provisions. There is no express declaration in that act, nor in any of the subsequent legislative enactments, as to whether the bond is to be treated as one to secure an observance of the liquor laws, or as security for the payment of such actual damages as the state may suffer by reason of a violation thereof. No statute has ever spoken directly on that subject, and whether a liquor dealer's bond be one or the other must be determined from a consideration of all the provisions of the statutes, the evident and apparent object to be subserved by its requirement, and the general rules of law applicable to such obligations.

It may be stated as a general rule of law, supported by an overwhelming weight of the authorities both in England and this country, that where a statute requires the execution of a bond to the state for a fixed and specific penalty, to be conditioned for a compliance with the laws of the state in the respects named therein, the effect is to constitute the bond a covenant for liquidated damages, or a penalty imposed by the sovereign power as a punishment for a violation of such law, unless a different intent appears. The rule is stated thus in 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 700: "The designation by statute of a specific sum as a penalty has the effect of constituting a bond given in compliance therewith, a covenant for liquidated damages, or a penalty imposed by the sovereign power, . . . unless a different intent appears." A distinction is made by all the authorities, where this question has been considered, between bonds executed by one individual to another to secure the performance of some collateral agreement, and a bond given, as in the case at bar, to the state, and conditioned for an observance of the law. United States v. Montell, Taney, 47, Fed. Cas. No. 15,798; Keating v. Sparrow, 1 Ball & B. 367; Benson v. Gibson, 3 Atk. 395; Peachy v. Somerset, 1 Strange, 447; Clark v. Barnard, 108 U. S. 436, 27 L. ed. 780, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 878; Murfree, Official Bonds, 452; People ex rel. Meakin v. Eckman, 63 Hun, 209, 18 N. Y. Supp. 654; Granger v. Hayden, 17 R. I. 179, 20 Atl. 833; Coggeshall v. Pollitt, 15 R. I. 168, 1 Atl. 413; Quintard v. Corcoran, 50 Conn. 34; Daniels v. Grayson College, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 562, 50 S. W. 205; Tripp v. Norton, 10 R. I. 125. The only case cited holding to the contrary is State v. Estabrook, 29 Kan. 739. The case of Jenkins v. Danville, 79 Ill. App. 339, is not in point; for the bond in that case was conditioned for the payment of all fines and costs which might be imposed against the obligor for a violation of the law. The obligor was there convicted of such violation, fined, he paid his fine, and the court very properly held that by the payment of his fine the express obligation of the bond was complied with, and double recovery could not be had. The bond involved in the case at bar is not so conditioned. Its conditions are that the obligor will not sell, or otherwise dispose of, any intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath day, nor on any general or special election day, and will not sell, barter, give away, or otherwise furnish or dispose of such liquor to any minor person, or to any pupil or student in any public school, nor to any habitual drunkard; "and, if the said obligor shall faithfully observe and perform all the terms and provisions of any and all ordinances of the village of Sacred Heart" relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, then the obligation shall be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect.

In the absence of some expression of the legislature to the contrary, the bond in question must be construed in harmony with this general rule of law. Our statutes will be searched in vain for any such expression. But, on the contrary, an intent to follow and apply the rule is clearly shown. It is found in two very prominent provisions of the act of 1858 (p. 341, § 7), that are entirely ignored by the majority opinion. One is the provision requiring county attorneys, sheriffs, constables, and justices of the peace having knowledge of any violation of the law with respect to the sale of intoxicating liquors to make complaint thereof, and prosecute the offender. The other provision is contained in the same section, and reads as follows: "It shall also be the duty of the district attorney to prosecute the bond given by such applicant, as is required by the second section of this act." These two provisions have been brought down from 1858, and the substance of them is now found in the General Statutes of 1894. Clearly, the legislature intended by that act an offending saloon keeper to be prosecuted criminally for a violation of the statutes, and, in addition thereto, that he should forfeit the penalty of the bond as further punishment. Every sheriff, constable, or county attorney having knowledge of such a violation is expressly required to prosecute the same criminally, and in addition thereto the county attorney is expressly required to bring a civil action on the bond for a breach of any of its conditions. This shows almost conclusively that the intention was to make the penalty of the bond a forfeiture, or liquidated damages for a breach of its conditions, in addition to the penalty provided for in the case of criminal conviction. Had the legislature intended the bond as security for the payment of damages, it would have required the prosecution of the suit thereon only in case of the failure of the saloon keeper or obligor to pay and discharge any fine imposed against him, and would not have made it the unconditional duty of the county attorney to prosecute the bond to judgment in addition to the criminal prosecution. So it must be conceded that the legislature, by the enactment of 1858, intended the penalty of the bond as a fixed and further punishment for a violation of the statutes. It is not for the courts to say whether a statute which is constitutional is fair or just, or whether the legislature intended "to exact the pound of flesh" referred to by the majority of the court. The suggestions in their opinion on this subject would be very pertinent for the consideration of the legislature, but are not germane to a judicial construction or interpretation of the statute. The question whether a given statute is fair or just is one exclusively for legislative cognizance. Courts have nothing to do with those questions, but are limited, in interpreting or construing statutes, to ascertaining the intention of the legislature, and have no right to declare a statute invalid on the assumption that it is unjust. To do so would be a flagrant and rank usurpation of power. It is conceded by the majority that the statute, construed as contended for by the respondent, is not unconstitutional as imposing a cruel and unusual punishment, yet they proceed to say that the punishment imposed thereby is unfair and unjust. On this subject, I quote from the case of People ex rel. Meakim v. Eckman, 63 Hun, 209, 18 N. Y. Supp. 654: "It is contended, further, that because a specific penalty is prescribed for the violation of the law of selling liquors to a minor, that a recovery cannot be had on the bond. Our answer is that the legislature, having the power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, could impose dual penalties for the same offense. When this statute fixes both the offense and the penalty, and declares it a misdemeanor for doing any act, such as selling liquor without a license, they are entirely independent of each other, and the conviction for the misdemeanor is no bar to an action for the penalty."

Such being the undoubted intention of the act of 1858, the provisions of which, so far as here pertinent, are a part of the statutes to-day, what amendments have been made since that time to indicate an intention on the part of the lawmaking power to change the law on this subject? The majority say the amendment of 1872 had such effect, but, as repeals or modifications of statutes by implication are not favored, the amendment of 1872 cannot possibly be so construed. It is true that the act of 1858 contained the provision that the saloon keeper should be liable for "damages done by persons intoxicated by liquors obtained from him," but the act did not provide that he should be so liable on his bond. There was no liability on the bond in this respect until the addition of a clause in 1872, which is as follows: "And the sureties on said bonds shall be jointly and severally liable with the principal for the payment of said damages, to be recovered in a civil action." Can this simple amendment have effect to change the whole scope and purpose of the statute? It seems to me clearly not. The mere fact that the legislature by this amendment relinquished the rights of the state under the bond in favor of injured parties can have no such operation as contended for by the majority. Suppose no person is injured at all; the bond is of no force or effect, and its execution and delivery mere idle ceremony. The suggestion that the state may sue thereon to recover damages suffered by it is begging the question. The state suffers no damage in a pecuniary sense from the violation of its laws. In the case of such violation, its peace is disturbed, its dignity offended, and its majesty outraged. It asks for no pecuniary recompense in liquidation of such violations, but demands the swift and certain punishment of the offender. The remarks of Chief Justice Taney on this subject are very pertinent, and I quote what he says in a case where the precise question was under consideration: "It certainly is not to be regarded as a bond with a collateral condition in which the jury are to assess the damages which the United States shall prove that they have sustained; for, according to that construction, the amount of damages would not depend upon the amount of the penalty prescribed in the section, which is graduated according to the size of the vessel, but would depend upon the discretion of different juries, and larger damages might be given where the penalty was only $400 than in a case where the penalty was $2,000. This obviously is not the intention of the law, and the United States are entitled to recover the whole sum for which the party is bound if any of the conditions are broken. Besides, how could the United States prove any particular amount of damages to have been sustained by them in a suit on this bond? . . . It would be difficult, I think, by any course of proof, or any process of reasoning, to show that the United States has sustained any particular amount of damages in a case of this description, or to adopt any rule by which the damages could be measured by a jury, or be liquidated by agreement between the parties. The sum for which the parties are to become bound is manifestly a penalty or forfeiture inflicted by the sovereign power for a breach of its laws. It is not a liquidated amount of damages due upon a contract, but a fixed and certain punishment for an offense." [United States v. Montell, Taney, 47, Fed. Cas. No. 15,798.]

No difficulty is to be apprehended from an application of the provision of 1872. If a saloon keeper becomes liable to an individual for an assault committed by a person by him made intoxicated, the injured party may proceed with his action on the bond to judgment. If no such cause of action accrues, the state may proceed, or it may proceed in any event, and the individual can make application to intervene, the same as is done in all cases where several rival claimants seek a particular fund to satisfy demands against the owner of the fund. The case of Minneapolis v. Olson, 76 Minn. 1, 78 N. W. 877, has no application to this case whatever.

In that case the court was construing a statute conferring authority upon municipal authorities to impose a penalty for a violation of the liquor laws. No such question is presented in this case. The penalty here involved is fixed by statute, and the legislature has not delegated the power to impose it to any inferior tribunal, as in the Olson Case. If the opinion of the court in this case is adhered to as the law of this state, the liquor dealer's bond, heretofore regarded as a forfeiture fixed and certain for a violation of the law, will amount to but very little. In order that the state may bring suit thereon, if their theory be correct, there must be a prosecution of the obligor, and a failure on his part to pay the fine imposed against him. If the court should see fit and proper to sentence him to imprisonment only, as punishment for his offense, the bond is a nullity, and the state has no remedy. If the court impose both a fine and imprisonment, the state can recover only the fine, and no proportion of the penalty for the imprisonment.

I am authorized to state that Chief Justice Start concurs in this dissent.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

BARBER ASPHALT PAVING COMPANY,
Respt.,
v.

Margaret FRENCH et al., Appts.

(158 Mo. 534.)

1. Assessments for paving, made, according to the provisions of a city charter, by apportioning the total cost of the work to the abutting lands according to frontage, do not constitute a taking of property for public use, or a violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amend., as a taking of property without due process of law.
2. The admission of incompetent evidence does not constitute reversible error when without the evidence the decision must have been the same.
3. A requirement of a guaranty to maintain and repair a street on which paving is done for five years thereafter is not ultra vires on the part of a city contracting for such pavement.

(November 13, 1900.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce a street-paving assessment. Affirmed.

Statement by Gantt, Ch. J.:

This suit was instituted in the circuit court of Jackson county, returnable to the October, 1899, term thereof, for the purpose of enforcing the lien of a tax bill issued by Kansas City in part payment of the cost of paving Forest avenue from Independence

NOTE.—The above case was affirmed in 181 U. S. 324, 45 L. ed. 879.

It is entirely clear that this decision substantially overrules that in Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, though it is not overruled by express declaration. The court repudiates the doctrine explicitly and most clearly laid down in the Norwood Case, to the effect that "the exaction from the owner of private property of the cost of a public improvement in substantial excess of the special benefits accruing to him is, to the extent of such excess, a taking, under the guise of taxation, of private property for public use without compensation," and holds in its latest decision that the apportionment of the entire cost of the improvement upon abutting lots according to their frontage is constitutional, though this is done without regard to the amount of benefits received by the property.

avenue to Twelfth street with an asphalt pavement. The petition is in the usual form. The defenses relied upon by the defendants, although stated in several different forms, may be resolved into two contentions: First, that the requirement of the ordinance and contract providing for the work, in respect to the guaranty thereof for five years, is ultra vires on the part of the city, and void; and, second, that the method of apportioning and charging the cost of the pavement violates the limitation of the Federal Constitution that no state shall deprive any person of his property without due process of law.

The work done consisted of paving with asphaltum the roadway of Forest avenue, in the said city, 36 feet in width, from Independence avenue to Twelfth street, a distance of $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile. Forest avenue is one of the oldest and best improved residence streets in Kansas City, and all of the lots abutting thereon front the street, and extend back therefrom uniformly, to the depth of an ordinary city lot, to an alley. The lots are all improved, and used for residence purposes, and all of the lots are substantially on the grade of the street as improved, and are similarly situated with respect to the asphalt pavement. The structure of the pavement along its entire extent is uniform in character and quality. There is no showing that there is any difference in the value of any of the lots abutting upon the improvement. The evidence of four witnesses was taken, each of whom testified that each and every lot fronting on that part of the street improved was specially benefited to an amount exceeding the cost of the pavement, and that each of the several lots abutting upon the improvement shared the total benefit sustained by all such lots in the proportion of the frontage of each lot thereon to the total frontage on the improvement of all such lots. This paving procedure was inaugurated conformably to the requirements of the Kansas City charter, by the adoption of a resolution by the common council of this city declaring the work of paving the street to a stated extent, and with a pavement of a defined character, to be necessary, which resolution was first recommended by the board of public works of the city. This resolution was thereupon published for ten days in the newspaper doing the city printing. Thereafter the resident owners of the city, owning a majority of front feet of lands belonging to such residents and fronting on that part of the street to be improved, had the right, within thirty days after the first day of the publication of the resolution, to file a remonstrance with the city clerk against the proposed improvement, and thereby to deplete the common council of the power to make the improvement; and such property owners had the right, by filing within the same period a petition so to do, to have such street improved with a different kind of material or in a different manner from that specified in such resolution. In this proceeding neither such a remonstrance nor petition was filed, and the common council, upon the recommendation of the board of public works, enacted an ordinance numbered 5,891, requiring the construction of the pavement. The charter requires that a contract for such work shall be let to the lowest and best bidder. Thereupon bids for the work were duly advertised for, and, the plaintiff being the lowest and best bidder therefor, a contract was, on the 31st day of July, 1894, entered into between Kansas City and the plaintiff for the construction of said pavement. The contract expressly provides that the work shall be paid for by the issuance of special tax bills, according to the provisions of the Kansas City charter, and that the city shall not, in any event, be liable for or on account of the work. The cost of the pavement was apportioned and charged against the lots fronting thereon according to the method prescribed by the charter, which is that the total cost of the work shall be apportioned and charged against the lands abutting thereon according to the frontage of the several lots or tracts of lands abutting upon the improvement. The charge against each tract of land is evidenced by a tax bill. The tax bill representing the assessment against each lot is, by the charter, made a lien upon the tract of land against which it is issued, and is prima facie evidence of the validity of the charge represented by it. Such lien can be enforced only by suit in a court of competent jurisdiction against the owners of the land charged. No personal judgment is authorized to be rendered against the owner of the land. The right is expressly conferred on the owner of reducing the amount of the recovery by pleading and proving any mistake or error in the amount of the bill, or that the work was not done in a good and workmanlike manner. The judgment was for the plaintiff for the amount due on the bill and for the enforcement of his lien, from which defendants, having unsuccessfully moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, have appealed.

Messrs. Gage, Ladd, & Small, for appellants:

Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, decides explicitly that laws like that under consideration are unconstitutional, and that all assessments made in pursuance of such laws are void.

Loeb v. Columbia Twp. 91 Fed. 37; Fay v. Springfield, 94 Fed. 409; Charles v. Marion, 98 Fed. 166; Lyon v. Tonawanda, 98 Fed. 361; Hutcheson v. Storrie, 92 Tex. 685, 45 L. R. A. 289, 51 S. W. 848; Cowley v. Spokane, 99 Fed. 840.

In all the states whose laws have been considered, some rights and privileges were reserved for individuals, which, it was claimed with greater or less show of reason, constituted "due process of law;" but here the effort has been to exclude the possibility of any claim on the part of the property owner to any right or privilege whatever.

This court and the appellate court, in construing this law, have only given to it its plain, unmistakable meaning.

Moberly v. Hogan, 131 Mo. 19, 32 S. W. 1014; McQuiddy v. Smith, 67 Mo. App. 205; Clapton v. Taylor, 49 Mo. App. 117; Crane v. French, 50 Mo. App. 367.

The front-foot rule is not now "due process of law."

It is not every act, legislative in form, that is law. Law is something more than will exerted as an act of power. It must be, not a special rule for a particular person or a particular case, but, in the language of Mr. Webster in his familiar definition, "the general law, a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial," so "that every citizen holds his life, liberty, property, and immunities under protection of the general rules which govern society," and thus excluding bills of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, acts of confiscation, partial and arbitrary exertions of power under the forms of legislation, etc.

The law of the land or due process of law, as this expression is used in the 14th Amendment, means the common law and the statute law existing in the state at the time of the adoption of this Amendment, or as subsequently and constitutionally modified by the state.

The front-foot rule of assessing the cost of street pavements is to be commended because the amount of work and the cost of the improvement in front of each foot of property is the same. Every property owner, or every person who contemplates owning property, may know in advance approximately what burden the abutting land will be called upon to pay for such improvements, and can take that fact into consideration in determining its value or the character of its use.

The tax which each individual is bound to pay ought to be certain, and not arbitrary. Smith, Wealth of Nations, Vol. 2, book 5, chap. 1, part II. p. 352.

Lands in a city are valuable in direct proportion to their accessibility, and in proportion to the number of people passing in front of them. The laying of a street pavement increases the value of abutting property at least to the extent of the cost of the work.

The workings of the whole law are to be considered in determining its effects.

The front-foot rule seems, at first blush, to be perfectly arbitrary, and likely to operate in some cases with great injustice, but it cannot be denied that in the case of some improvements frontage is a very reasonable measure of benefits,—much more than value could be,—and perhaps approaching equality as nearly as any other estimate of benefits made by the judgment of men.

Gantt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, the method adopted in the charter and ordinance of Kansas City of charging the cost of paving Forest avenue against the adjoining lots according to their frontage had been repeatedly authorized by the legislature of Missouri, and such laws had received the sanction of this court in many decisions. St. Louis ex rel. Seibert v. Allen, 53 Mo. 44; St. Joseph v. Anthony, 30 Mo. 538; Neenan v. Smith, 50 Mo. 528; Kiley v. Cranor, 51 Mo. 541; Rutherford v. Hamilton, 97 Mo. 543, 11

S. W. 249, Moberly v. Hogan, 131 Mo. 19, 32 S. W. 1014; Farrar v. St. Louis, 80 Mo. 379. In the last-mentioned case, Judge Norton for the court said: "The liability of lots fronting on a street, the paving of which is authorized to be charged with the cost of the work according to their frontage, having been thus so repeatedly asserted, the question is no longer an open one in this state, and we are relieved from the necessity of examining authorities cited by counsel for plaintiff condemning what is familiarly known as the 'front-foot rule.'"

Learned counsel for defendant concede such was the state of the decided law of this state, and that the portion of the Kansas City charter known as the ninth article of the charter, which authorizes the cost of a pavement to be assessed against the lots fronting on the improvement according to their respective frontage, was framed after this court had fully considered and construed similar laws, and sustained them against the charge of unconstitutionality, and the assessment now challenged was made under the construction given by this court. They say: "The question we present is whether under the decision in Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, the provision of the Kansas City charter under which the tax bill sued on was issued is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore null and void. We do not and cannot ask this court to reconsider or recast any of its former decisions on this subject. We simply present this controlling decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and ask that it be applied in this case." If the facts of this case bring it within the case in judgment in Norwood v. Baker, this court is bound to follow that decision, and will do so, whatever views we may hold to the contrary.

In applying the principle of stare decisis and controlling authority, we will be safe in following that doctrine as announced by the Supreme Court of the United States, whose judgment on the question at bar will be final. In Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 399, 5 L. ed. 290, Chief Justice Marshall said: "The counsel for the defendant in error urge, in opposition to this rule of construction, some dicta of the court in the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60. It is a maxim, not to be disregarded, that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit, when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its full extent. Other principles, which may serve to illustrate it, are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated." Further on he says, in reference to language used in Marbury v. Madison: 54 L. R. A.

"Having such cases only in its view, the court lays down a principle, which is generally correct, in terms much broader than the decision, and not only much broader than the reasoning with which that decision is supported, but in some instances contradictory to its principles;" and he concludes this point with the announcement that "the general expressions in the case of Marbury v. Madison must be understood with the limitations which are given to them in this opinion." In the recent case of Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 45, 42 L. ed. 943, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521, the same court says: "It is trite to say that general principles announced by courts which are perfectly sound expressions of the law, under the facts of a particular case, may be wholly inapplicable in another and different case, and there is scarcely any department of the law in which it is easier to collect one body of decisions and contrast them with another in apparent conflict than that which deals with the taxing and police powers."

However familiar the facts in the Norwood-Baker Case may be, owing to the great interest excited by its promulgation, it will not be amiss to recall its salient features, for the purpose of determining its controlling effect in the case at bar. Mrs. Ellen R. Baker owned a tract of land in the village of Norwood, which intercepted Ivanhoe avenue. This avenue was 50 feet wide, and had been laid out to the north and south lines of her tract. To make Ivanhoe avenue a continuous street, it was necessary to extend it through the Baker tract, and acquire a strip thereof 50 feet wide and 300 feet long. For this purpose a condemnation proceeding was instituted. The Constitution of Ohio provides that, where private property is condemned for public use, "compensation therefor shall first be made in money, and such compensation shall be assessed by a jury, without deduction for benefits to any property of the owner." Cities and villages in Ohio, as in Missouri, are by statute given power to lay off, establish, open, widen, narrow, straighten, extend, keep in order and repair, and light streets, alleys, public grounds and buildings, wharves, landing places, bridges, and market-places within the corporation, and to appropriate private property for the use of the corporation; and each city and village may appropriate, enter upon, and hold real estate within its corporate limits for the following purposes, but no more shall be taken or appropriated than is reasonably necessary for the purpose to which it is to be applied: "For opening, widening, straightening and extending streets, alleys, and avenues; also for obtaining gravel or other material for the improvement of the same, and for this purpose the right to appropriate shall not be limited to lands lying within the limits of the corporation." 1 Ohio Rev. Stat. 1890, § 1692, subds. 18, 33, and Id. title Cities and Villages, pp. 429, 430, § 2232. It is further provided by the statutes of Ohio (1890) that, where private property is taken for opening and widening streets, alleys, or other public highways, the costs and expenses of the appropriation may be assessed in one of three ways—First, by the council generally upon the public; second, upon abutting, adjacent, or contiguous lots, in proportion to the benefits which may result from the improvement, or according to the value of the property assessed; third, “by the front foot of the property bounding and abutting upon the improvement as the council by ordinance, setting forth specially the lots and lands to be assessed, may determine before the improvement is made.” Id. § 2264. The council of the village of Norwood passed an ordinance which provided for the institution of condemnation proceedings in the probate court for the ascertainment of the compensation to be paid to Mrs. Baker for the desired strip, and also provided that the compensation paid her, and all costs of the condemnation proceeding, and all other costs, and the interest on the bonds issued, if any, to pay her for her land, should be assessed as a benefit to her upon her land abutting on the strip so taken. It thus appears that the village was invoking at one and the same time the extraordinary power of eminent domain and exercising its power of assessment to pay for the land thus taken. In the condemnation proceeding proper the jury assessed her compensation at $2,000, and that sum was paid her, and thereupon the village council assessed her with the $2,000 and all the costs of the condemnation, amounting to $218.58, as benefits to her abutting property. The result was that the village acquired her property for nothing, and charged her $218.58 for having deprived her of it. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court. He said: “The particular question presented for consideration involves the validity of an ordinance of that village assessing upon the appellee’s land abutting on each side of the new street an amount covering, not simply a sum equal to that paid for the land taken for the street, but, in addition, the costs and expenses connected with the condemnation proceedings.” The lower court adjudged that the assessment was in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and such was the theory of the bill for injunction. Inter alia, Judge Harlan says: “It has been adjudged that the due process of law prescribed by that [14th] Amendment requires compensation to be made . . . to the owner when private property is taken . . . for public use.” Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581; Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn, 166 U. S. 685, 41 L. ed. 1165, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 718. “The taking of the plaintiff’s land for the street was under the power of eminent domain. . . . But the assessment of the abutting property . . . was an exercise of the power of taxation.” “Except for the provision of the Constitution of Ohio above quoted, the state could have authorized benefits to be deducted from the actual value of the land taken, without violating the constitutional injunction that compensation be made for private property taken for public use; for the benefits received could be properly regarded as compensation pro tanto for the property appropriated to public use.” But, asks the learned justice, does the exclusion of benefits from the estimate of compensation to be made for the property actually taken for public use authorize the public to charge upon the abutting property the sum paid for it, together with the entire costs incurred in the condemnation proceedings, irrespective of the question whether the property was benefited by the opening of the street? The learned justice then concedes that it is the settled law of the Supreme Court of the United States that “abutting owners may be subjected to special assessments to meet the expenses of opening public highways in front of their property,—such assessments . . . resting upon the ground that special burdens may be imposed for special or peculiar benefits accruing from public improvements;” citing Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Decatur, 147 U. S. 190, 37 L. ed. 132, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 293; Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548, 42 L. ed. 270, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 966; and the cases there cited. He adds that, “according to the weight of judicial authority, the legislature has a large discretion in defining the territory to be deemed specially benefited by a public improvement, and which may be subjected to special assessment to meet the cost of such improvements.” He proceeds then to show that the power of the legislature is not unlimited, and that there is a point beyond which the legislative department may not go in exerting its power of taxation consistently with the property rights of the citizen. He concludes: “In our judgment, the exaction from the owner of private property of the cost of a public improvement in substantial excess of the special benefits accruing to him is, to the extent of such excess, a taking, under the guise of taxation, of private property for public use without compensation.” The learned justice, speaking for the majority of the court, expressly disclaimed that his opinion was in conflict with Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 45, 42 L. ed. 943, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521, or Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 346, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921. From a careful reading of the case, we conclude that the supreme court decided three propositions: First, that “due process of law,” as used in the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, requires compensation to be made to the owner of the land condemned for public use; second, that the exaction from the owner of abutting property of the cost of a public improvement in substantial excess of the special benefits received by him is, to the extent of such excess, a taking, under the guise of taxation, of private property for public use without compensation; third, that in that case the special assessment upon the abutting property of Mrs. Baker of the entire cost of opening the street, including not only the full amount paid her for the strip condemned, but the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings, was a taking of her property for public use without compensation; in a word, that, while nominally it was the exercise of the taxing power, it was nothing less than confiscation.

Notwithstanding the fact that the discussion took a wide range, and much that was said affords ground for the contention of learned counsel that all statutes and ordinances which assess abutting owners with the cost of paving a street according to the front-foot rule, as the charter and ordinance of Kansas City do in the case at bar, are null and void, we are of opinion that it was not the intention of the majority of the court to so hold. We think that Norwood v. Baker must be read with a view to the particular facts in judgment in that case, and that it was not the intention of the Supreme Court of the United States to overturn the long line of its own decisions which are in harmony with so many of the decisions of the courts of last resort in the several states of the Union, and upon the faith of which vast property rights have accrued. Indeed, as we understand the opinion, the court expressly declined to shake the authority of Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 45, 42 L. ed. 943, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521, in which that court sustained an assessment per front foot upon property abutting upon a street improvement. In that opinion each of the justices who concurred in the majority opinion in Norwood v. Baker concurred. In the Parsons Case the Supreme Court adopted the language of Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations (4th ed., vol. 2, § 752), as follows: "The courts are very generally agreed that the authority to require the property specially benefited to bear the expense of local improvements is a branch of the taxing power or included within it. . . . Whether the expense of making such improvements shall be paid out of the general treasury or be assessed upon the abutting property or other property specially benefited, and; if in the latter mode, whether the assessment shall be upon all property found to be benefited or alone upon the abutters, according to frontage or according to the area of their lots, is, according to the present weight of authority, considered to be a question of legislative expediency." And the court expressly approved the doctrine of Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921, which case originated in New York. The court of appeals of New York in an opinion by Judge Finch held that assessment of abutting property is an exercise of the power of taxation, and is vested in the legislature, which determines the amount to be levied, and fixes the tax district; and its decision is final. The Supreme Court of the United States, in its opinion in the same case, said: "The legislature, in the exercise of its power of taxation, has the right to direct the whole or a part of the expense of a public improvement, such as the laying out, grading, or repairing of a street, to be assessed upon the owners of lands benefited thereby, and the determination of the territorial district which should be taxed for a local improvement is within the province of legislative discretion." In Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S. 304, 42 L. ed. 1047, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617, the same court said: "Neither can it be doubted that if the state Constitution does not prohibit, the legislature, speaking generally, may create a new taxing district, determine what territory shall belong to such district, and what property shall be considered as benefited by a proposed improvement." To the same effect, see Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238. In Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548, 42 L. ed. 270, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 966, the court said: "But it is for the legislature, and not for the judiciary, to determine whether the expense of a public improvement should be borne by the whole state or by the district or neighborhood immediately benefited." "The legislature, in the exercise of the right of taxation, has the authority to direct the whole or such part as it may prescribe of the expense of a public improvement, such as the establishing, the widening, the grading, or the repair of a street, to be assessed upon the owners of lands benefited thereby." "The rule of apportionment among the parcels of land benefited also rests within the discretion of the legislature, and may be directed to be in proportion to the position, the frontage, the area, or the market value of the lands, or in proportion to the benefits as estimated by commissioners." Some stress is laid upon the distinction between the power of the legislature in the exercise of the taxing power and that of municipalities upon which that power is conferred. But few principles are better settled in the courts of this country than this: That, where legislative powers are delegated to a municipal corporation, its discretion within the legitimate sphere of its authority is proportionately as wide as is the like discretion possessed by the legislature of the state, "and as free from outside interference, and that discretion is not subject to judicial revision or reversal." Morse v. Westport, 136 Mo. 286, 37 S. W. 934. It is true that in many jurisdictions—certainly in this state—it is true that municipal acts, whether in the form of ordinances or resolutions, may be impeached for fraud at the instance of persons injured thereby (1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 311; Glasgow v. St. Louis, 107 Mo. 203, 17 S. W. 743); whereas courts will not inquire into the motives of the legislature. That the legislature may delegate this power to open, improve, and pave streets to municipal corporations is no longer an open question. That the charter of Kansas City fully and expressly conferred this power upon that city will not be questioned. That charter has all the dignity and force of a legislative enactment. In the case at bar there was not the slightest intimation that the ordinance was procured by fraud, or amounted to arbitrary confiscation, whereas in the Norwood Case the ordinance was arbitrary and oppressive, and could only result in depriving Mrs. Baker of her land for a public use without compensation.

Under the scheme there devised, although Mrs. Baker might have been allowed every process of law to recover the value of her land taken, and a hearing as to how the value of the land taken should be apportioned over the benefit district, she could never, unless the district was enlarged, have recovered a cent for her land that was taken, and all additional efforts would simply have increased the costs which she was adjudged to pay; and thus the case properly fell within the rule announced by Mr. Justice Harlan in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581, that "the mere form of the proceeding instituted against the owner, even if he be admitted to defend, cannot convert the process into due process of law if the necessary result be to deprive him of his property without compensation." But in taxing the citizen with his proportionate share of the cost of a pavement abutting on his lot, there is no taking of property for public use.

Now, is there anything which smacks of arbitrary or fraudulent conduct? This method of taxation has passed under the scrutiny of the courts of this country, and has received their approval. Judge Cooley, in his work on Taxation (p. 644), says: "Such a measure of apportionment seems at first blush to be perfectly arbitrary, and likely to operate in some cases with great injustice; but it cannot be denied that in the case of some improvements frontage is a very reasonable measure of benefits,—much more than value could be,—and perhaps approaching equality as nearly as any other estimate of benefits made by the judgment of men." Judge Elliott, in his book on Roads and Streets (p. 396), says: "The system which leads to the least mischievous and unjust consequences is that which takes into account the entire line of the way improved and apportions the expense according to the frontage; for it takes into consideration the benefit to each property owner that accrues from the improvement of the entire line of the way, and does not impose upon one lot owner an unjust portion of the burden." Judge Sharpswood, speaking for the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Hammitt v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146, 3 Am. Rep. 615, says: "Perhaps no fairer rule can be adopted than the proportion of feet front, though there must be some inequalities if the lots differ in situation and depth." Such has been the holding of this court throughout its history. A rule so universally adopted and sustained can hardly be called arbitrary, or so unjust as to warrant a court to strike down the discretion of the municipality which adopts it.

It is, however, insisted that the Norwood-Baker Case does condemn this front-foot rule because it affords no opportunity for a hearing. Still conceding, as we do, that there are expressions to this effect in that opinion, it seems so clear to us that the opinion was not predicated upon the want of notice, and that no amount of notice could have availed to secure justice to Mrs. Baker under the scheme devised; that we do not believe that the supreme court intended to lay down the law that a state statute imposing taxes must necessarily and in all cases give notice and a hearing to the taxpayer before it can be held valid. We think the decisions of that court are overwhelmingly to the contrary, and we discern no purpose in this opinion to overrule and set aside all of its prior utterances on this subject. Thus, in Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 45, 42 L. ed. 943, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521, the court unanimously said: "In Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663, the distinction between a tax or assessment imposed by a direct exercise of the legislative power calling for no inquiry into the weight of evidence, nor for anything in the nature of judicial examination, and a tax or assessment imposed upon property according to its value, to be ascertained by assessors upon evidence, was pointed out, and it was held that in the former case no notice to the owner is required, but that in the latter case the officers in estimating the value act judicially, and notice and an opportunity to be heard are necessary. In giving the opinion of the court it was said by Mr. Justice Field (page 709, 111 U. S., page 572, 28 L. ed., and page 668, 4 Sup. Ct.): 'Of the different kinds of taxes which the state may impose there is a vast number of which, from their nature, no notice can be given to the taxpayer, nor would notice be of any possible advantage to him; such as poll taxes, license taxes, . . . and generally specific taxes on things or persons or occupations. In such cases the legislature, in authorizing the tax, fixes its amount, and that is the end of the matter. If the tax be not paid, the property of the delinquent may be sold, and he be thus deprived of his property. Yet there can be no question that the proceeding is due process of law, as there is no inquiry into the weight of evidence or other element of a judicial nature, and nothing could be changed by hearing the taxpayer. No right of his is therefore invaded.' The court further quote Judge Cooley on Taxation with approval to the effect 'that the whole cost [of a local improvement] in other cases is levied on lands in the immediate vicinity of the work.' 'In a constitutional point of view, either of these methods is admissible, and one may be sometimes just and another at other times.' 'The question is legislative, and like all legislative questions may be decided erroneously.' The court thus approves Judge Dillon's text (2 Mun. Corp. § 752), wherein the learned author says: 'Whether the assessment shall be upon all property found to be benefited or alone upon the abutters according to frontage or according to the area of their lots, is, according to the present weight of authority, considered to be a question of legislative expediency;' and in Norwood v. Baker, Parsons v. District of Columbia is expressly approved by Mr. Justice Harlan on the ground that it was done under an act of Congress establishing a comprehensive system for the District. From the reasoning of the learned justice it is hard to escape the conclusion that he regarded the fact that the entire cost of the land taken and all the costs of the condemnation were assessed upon Mrs. Baker's land as peculiar to that case, and that a different rule would govern if the assessment per front foot had been levied under a general or comprehensive system for betterments, as was the case in Parsons v. District of Columbia, and which clearly exists under the charter and ordinance of Kansas City, which provide a comprehensive system for the paving of all the streets of said city, and an assessment per front foot upon all abutting property to pay therefor. It seems indisputable that, if no inquiry into benefits was required in the Parsons Case, and that act was constitutional, neither can the charter and ordinance of Kansas City, which also provide a comprehensive system of improvement, be held unconstitutional. In neither case is there any inquiry as to benefits, nor is the tax levied according to actual benefit, but both alike rest upon the conclusive presumption, indulged by Congress in the one case and the charter in the other, that such an improvement is a benefit to the abutting property. Not only is this true, but the Supreme Court of the United States is solemnly committed to the doctrine that, if the assessment actually exceeds the cost of the work, it would not vitiate or annul the assessment. Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S., loc. cit. 56, 57, 42 L. ed. 947, 948, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525, 526; Leominster v. Conant, 139 Mass. 384, 2 N. E. 690; Hyde Park v. Spenoer, 118 Ill. 446, 8 N. E. 846.

Whether there is really a distinction between the Parsons Case and the Norwood-Baker Case if the fact of the taking of Mrs. Baker's land without compensation be dissociated from the latter, we will not now discuss, but accepting the whole of the Norwood Case, its approval of the Parsons Case, as well as the statement that the front-foot rule excluded an inquiry into benefits, we are of opinion that the Supreme Court of the United States will not condemn the assessment in the case at bar, because it falls clearly within the doctrine of the Parsons Case, and the construction placed on that case in the Norwood Case, and because no court has more emphatically determined that an assessment by the front-foot rule is an exercise of the taxing power, and is a legislative function, with which the courts have no power to interfere, and will not do so. Certainly it is true that until the decision in the Norwood-Baker Case the decisions of the supreme court hold that the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit assessments on real estate in excess of special benefits, or by methods other than according to special benefits. In the case of Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616, the estate of John Davidson was assessed about $50,000 for draining certain swamp lands in the state of Louisiana. The assessment was levied according to the superficial area or square feet of land within the drainage district; that is, each square foot was taxed as much as every other square foot in the district. No inquiry was had into benefits, and the assessment was not according to benefits. It was even agreed that no drainage was done on Davidson's land, and that a part of his land needed no drainage, having already been drained. The question was squarely raised and presented whether the 14th Amendment prohibited such an assessment. Justice Miller wrote the opinion, in which all the justices concurred, and held that the Supreme Court of the United States had no jurisdiction of the case, because the 14th Amendment was not violated; that that class of cases did not fall within the provisions of the Amendment. In the course of his opinion the learned judge says: "It is also said that part of the property of plaintiff which was assessed is not benefited by the improvement. This is a matter of detail, with which this court cannot interfere if it were clearly so; but it is hard to fix a limit within these two parishes where property would not be benefited by the removal of the swamps and marshes which are within their bounds." At that time it is clear that the whole court held that the fact that an assessment was for an improvement which in fact was no benefit to the property owner did not bring the case within the 14th Amendment, and it would be hard to conceive of a harder case. Subsequently, in Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921, Mr. Justice Gray said: "In Davidson v. New Orleans it was held that, if the work was one which the state had the authority to do, and to pay for by assessments on the property benefited, objections that the sum raised was exorbitant, and that part of the property assessed was not benefited, presented no question under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution upon which this court could review the decision of the state court." And in Walston v. Nevin, 128 U. S. 578, 32 L. ed. 544, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Chief Justice Fuller said, in reference to the Davidson Case: "And the conclusion was reached that neither the corporate agency by which the work is done, the excessive price which the statute allows therefor, nor the relative importance of the work to the value of the land assessed, nor the fact that the assessment is made before the work is done, nor that the assessment is unequal as regards the benefits conferred, nor that personal judgments are rendered for the amount assessed, are matters in which the state authorities are controlled by the Federal Constitution. So the determination of the taxing district and the manner of the apportionment are all within the legislative power. Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921; Stanley v. Albany County Supers. 121 U. S. 535, 30 L. ed. 1000, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1234; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Hager v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663; United States v. Memphis, 97 U. S. 284, 24 L. ed. 937; Laramie County Comrs. v. Albany County Comrs. 92 U. S. 307, 23 L. ed. 552. And whenever the law operates alike on all persons and property similarly situated, equal protection cannot be said to be denied." Wurts v. Hoagland, 114 U. S. 606, 29 L. ed. 229, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1086; Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 90 U. S. 521, 24 L. ed. 734. In Walston v. Nevin the assessment for the construction of a street was apportioned upon abutting land according to the number of square feet. No inquiry could have been made as to benefits any more than in the Norwood Case, and yet the court ruled it fell within the Davidson Case, and it had no jurisdiction. Finally, in Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 104 U. S. 112, 41 L. ed. 369, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56, an ad valorem assessment upon all the land within the district was held not contrary to the 14th Amendment. The point was specifically made that the assessment was not made in accordance with and in proportion to the benefits conferred by the improvement, and land which could not be benefited was placed in a district to be taxed to pay for the improvements which would benefit others. The importance of the case is suggested by the great array of eminent counsel on both sides. Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion. Among other things, he said: "As was said by Mr. Justice Miller in Davidson v. New Orleans, where the objection was made that part of the property was not in fact benefited, 'this is a matter of detail, with which this court cannot interfere if it were clearly so; but it is hard to fix a limit within these two parishes where property would not be benefited by the removal of the swamps and marshes which are within their bounds.' To the same effect: Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921; Lent v. Tillson, 140 U. S. 316-333, 35 L. ed. 419-427, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 825. In regard to the matters thus far discussed, we see no valid objection to the act in question." Again, he says: "The fourth objection, and also the objection above alluded to as the final one, may be discussed together, as they practically cover the same principle. It is insisted that the basis of the assessment upon the lands benefited for the cost of the construction of the works is not in accordance with and in proportion to the benefits conferred by the improvement, and therefore there is a violation of the constitutional amendment referred to, and a taking of the property of the citizen without due process of law. Although there is a marked distinction between an assessment for a local improvement and the levy of a general tax, yet the former is still the exercise of the same power as the latter, both having their source in the sovereign power of taxation." And again: "We do not discover, and our attention has not been called to, any case in this court where such an assessment has been held to violate any provision of the Federal Constitution. If it do not, this court can grant no relief." 54 L. R. A.

It is in view of this unbroken chain of authority, this unanimous declaration of the Supreme Court, that the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution does not prohibit assessments on real estate for local improvements in excess of special benefits, or by methods other than according to the amount of the benefit, and the failure of that court to criticize or overrule any of said decisions, that we say that in a case like the one at bar, involving only an assessment, or no question of taking private property for public use without compensation, there is no Federal question, and that the Norwood-Baker Case does not apply to such a case, and does not require that we should overrule the long line of cases decided by this court which sustain the front-foot rule, and that until that court in a case like this shall reverse its former long line of decisions we must adhere to our own construction of our Constitution and laws. Of course, if the Supreme Court shall in a case like this hold that the 14th Amendment does apply, and that the assessment by the front-foot rule under the Kansas City charter is void, we shall conform to its judgment as the final arbiter under the Constitution.

As the assessment was made in strict compliance with the charter and ordinance, we do not think the testimony of the four witnesses to the effect that the benefits to the lots exceeded the cost of the improvement could cure the vice, if any, in the charter and the ordinance. Plaintiff must stand or fall by the charter provision. The admission of the evidence, however, did not constitute reversible error, as we hold the charter and the ordinance were sufficient without the evidence, and would have been had it been to the contrary.

2. The other objection remains. It is urged that the requirement of the ordinance and contract providing for maintaining and repairing the street on which the paving was done for five years is ultra vires on the part of the city, and void; that the power of the city to contract for repairs is limited to two years. Speaking for myself, I think the contention of the defendant is sound, but this court has ruled otherwise in Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Wooster, 147 Mo. 467, 48 L. R. A. 279, 48 S. W. 939, and Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Ullman, 137 Mo. 543, 38 S. W. 458, and no good purpose will be subserved by repeating the grounds upon which I based my dissent in those cases. The question must be considered settled by the majority opinions in those cases.

It follows that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be and is affirmed.

1. One cannot defeat liability on a judgment entered on a note authorizing an attorney to confess judgment, which he signed without reading, on the ground that he did not know that it contained such authority, in the absence of any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment in procuring his signature.
2. A judgment against a nonresident, entered on a note containing a power of attorney to confess judgment, which is valid in the state where entered, is entitled to full faith and credit in other states, so as to support an action to enforce the judgment in such other states.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit court for Barton County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of a judgment which had been rendered against defendant in the state of Ohio. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. White & McCommon, for appellant:

The judgment rendered in Ohio was a regular, valid judgment in that state.

The courts of Missouri will give to the Ohio judgment the same force and effect it would have in Ohio, as ascertained by the laws of Ohio.

The court in Ohio obtained jurisdiction by the warrant of attorney to render a personal judgment against defendant.

The judgment against defendant, being valid in Ohio, is valid here.

The validity of the Ohio judgment is not affected by the fact that such judgments are not authorized here.

Messrs. Thurman, Wray, & Timmonds, for respondent:

Respondent signed this supposed note under the impression that it was simply a written evidence of his debt to appellant. He had a right to rely on that fact under the circumstances. Without an agreement permitting it, it is clear that the judgment is an absolute nullity.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Williams v. Monroe, 125 Mo. 574, 28 S. W. 853.

The judgment, if rendered in the state of Missouri, could not be upheld. Conceding that the agreement in the note had been entered into with full knowledge of its force and effect, such course of procedure is against the policy of our law.

Burr v. Mathers, 51 Mo. App. 470.

Before a defendant can be deprived of his day in court, his waiver of this important right must appear by clear and cogent testimony.

Respondent had a perfect right to rely on the fact that his brother had filled out a note, instead of a power of attorney to confess judgment; and if he did not know of the deception, the court properly instructed the jury that he was not bound by the contract.

When a party to a contract inserts terms not agreed upon, and the other party signs it without knowledge of the deception, relying on the fact that the contract has been drawn as agreed upon, such contract is void.

On rehearing.

Plaintiff abandoned his right, if any he had, under the power of attorney, when he brought suit in Missouri to secure judgment on the debt.

This judgment without actual notice to defendant is not a "judicial proceeding" of another state within the meaning of § 1, art. 4, of the Federal Constitution.

D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 Fow. 165, 13 L. ed. 648; Latimer v. Union P. R. Co. East Div. 43 Mo. 105, 97 Am. Dec. 378; Overstreet v. Shannon, 1 Mo. 529; Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 670, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92.

A judgment, although warranted by the laws of a sister state, where the defendant is not served with process and does not in fact enter his appearance, is not "records and judicial proceedings" within the meaning of § 1, art. 4, of the Federal Constitution.

Overstreet v. Shannon, 1 Mo. 529; Salles v. Hays, 3 Mo. 116; Smith v. Ross, 7 Mo. 464; Gillett v. Camp, 23 Mo. 375; Miles v. Jones, 28 Mo. 87; Foot v. Newell, 29 Mo. 400; Latimer v. Union P. R. Co. East Div. 43 Mo. 105; Sevier v. Roddie, 51 Mo. 580; State use of Gilbreath v. Bunce, 65 Mo. 349.

The weight of the authority is against the validity of such a judgment outside of the territorial limits of the sovereignty where rendered, and not within the meaning of the Federal Constitution and statutes giving to the "records and judicial proceedings" of other states "full faith and credit."

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following opinion was heretofore rendered in this case by division No. 1 of this court:

"Action upon a foreign judgment for $7,004. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The parties are brothers, and both formerly lived in Ohio. The defendant was in debt to the plaintiff, and on the 10th of November, 1881, was about to remove to Missouri. The plaintiff demanded a settlement, and the defendant, as he says, because he would have had trouble if he had not done so, gave the plaintiff his note for $4,000, payable at one year, with 6 per cent interest, in settlement of the debt. The note contained a cognovit authorizing any attorney at law to appear in any court of the United States, waive process, enter appearance, and confess judgment against defendant for the amount due on the note, including interest and costs, and to release all errors. On the 14th of October, 1891, the plaintiff instituted suit against the defendant in the court of common pleas of Stark county, Ohio, upon the note. Pursuant to the terms of the note, W. J. Piero, an attorney of that court, entered the defendant's appearance, waived process, and confessed judgment for $7,004, the principal and interest due on the note, released all errors, and waived all rights of appeal. Thereafter the plaintiff instituted this suit in the Barton county circuit court on the foreign judgment. The answer of the defendant is a general denial, with special pleas: (1) That the Ohio court had no jurisdiction, because defendant was, and had been for over ten years, a resident of Barton county, Missouri, and was not summoned and did not appear in the Ohio court, and never authorized Piero or anyone else to appear for him, and that at the time the suit was begun in Ohio the debt was barred by limitation in Missouri; (2) that the parties are brothers, and the defendant, being, in debt to the plaintiff, was about to remove to Missouri, and plaintiff asked defendant to sign a note for the balance due plaintiff, saying he only wanted a settlement and would never enforce the note against defendant; that defendant did not in fact owe the plaintiff as much as $4,000; that he signed the note, understanding that it was only a promissory note, and not knowing that it contained a provision authorizing a confession of judgment, and never having agreed to grant such authority to anyone; that the plaintiff falsely and fraudulently represented to him that it was only a promissory note, and concealed from him the fact that it contained a cognovit; and that, relying on the statements of the plaintiff, he signed the note without reading it or examining it. The trial developed the facts to be that notes of this character are usually used in Ohio; that the defendant had been largely engaged in dealing in cattle while he lived in Ohio, and had executed many such notes, and that several judgments had been rendered against him there upon similar notes, under the cognovit therein contained; 'that he had procured many loans from the banks upon similar notes, and that the banks would not make loans upon any other kind of paper; that he had given similar notes to other persons before leaving Ohio; that there were no representations made to him about the character of this note when he signed it, and no attempt made to conceal its character from him; that he owed his brother some amount,—the brother says $5,000, and he says it was not so much,—and that his brother offered to settle it if he would give him this note for $4,000; and that he did so because 'I expect I would have had to sign the note or got into trouble.' The court refused all the instructions asked by the plaintiff, and on its own motion instructed the jury as follows: 'You are instructed that your verdict will be for the plaintiff for the full amount of the judgment sued on, with interest on the same from October 14, 1891, to date, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, unless you further believe, from the preponderance or greater weight of the evidence, that the defendant, at the time he signed the note upon which the judgment sued on is based, had no knowledge that the said note contained a power of attorney to confess judgment and had no intention to sign such a note, in which case your verdict will be for the defendant.' The jury found for the defendant, judgment was entered upon the verdict, and after proper steps the plaintiff appealed.

"1. There was no fraud, misrepresentation, trick, or concealment in the procurement of the note. It may be true the defendant did not read it before he signed it; but he was sui juris, had full opportunity to read it, and deliberately signed it. The law presumes he knew its contents, and he cannot be permitted now to take advantage of his own fault or negligence. O'Bryan v. Kinney, 74 Mo. 125; Snider v. Adams Exp. Co. 63 Mo. 376; St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. v. Cleary, 77 Mo. 637, 46 Am. Rep. 13; Matteer v. Missouri P. R. Co. 105 Mo. 352, 16 S. W. 839; Kellerman v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 136 Mo. 177, 34 S. W. 41, 37 S. W. 828; 1 Wharton, Conv. § 196. The defendant relies on Wright v. McPike, 70 Mo. 175, approving what was said in Briggs v. Ewart, 51 Mo. 249, 11 Am. Rep. 445, as follows: 'It may be assumed as an axiom that no one can be made a party to a contract without his own consent. Although his signature may be put to the writing, and may have been written by himself, yet if he did not know what he was signing, but acted honestly under the belief that he was signing some other paper, and not the one he really signed, he ought not to be bound by such signature.' In McPike's Case this was quoted, and then it was said: 'Although that case has been overruled, the doctrine announced in the foregoing extract from the opinion was not disturbed by the court in the overruling decision. As between the original parties, if one has procured the signature of the other to a written agreement, whether by fraud or not, which does not contain the contract made by the parties, but a different one, he cannot be permitted to avail himself of that contract, but must stand by the one which was in fact entered into by both parties.' In Briggs v. Ewart, 51 Mo. 249, 11 Am. Rep. 445, it was held that such a defense could be made, even if the note was held by a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice before maturity. This case, as was also the case of Corby v. Weddle, 57 Mo. 452, which followed it, was expressly overruled in Shirts v. Overjohn, 60 Mo., loc. cit. 312. The doctrine further announced in McPike's Case, that, as between the original parties, such questions are open to inquiry in a suit at law upon the note, whether the note was made by fraud or not, is no longer the law in this state, as the cases cited above clearly show. Courts of equity set aside contracts procured by fraud, and reframe contracts where there has been a mutual mistake of the parties; but it is an invariable rule of law that, in the absence of fraud or mistake, parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary a written contract. The written contract is conclusively presumed to merge all prior negotiations, and to express the final agreement of the parties. To permit a party, when sued on a written contract, to admit that he signed it, but to deny that it expresses the agreement he made, or to allow him to admit that he signed it, but did not read it or know its stipulations, would absolutely destroy the value of all contracts and negotiable instruments. The reason underlying the rule is to give stability to written agreements, and to remove the temptation and possibility of perjury, which would be afforded if parol evidence was admissible. But, aside from these considerations, this is a suit upon a judgment, and not upon the note. The note is merged in the judgment, and the defenses that might have been available, if properly interposed in the suit on the note, are not open to review here. Even if there was fraud in the note constituting the cause of action, the judgment cannot be attacked. Only fraud in the very act of procuring the judgment can be interposed as a defense to the judgment, even in a direct attack in equity to set aside the judgment. Hamilton v. McLean, 139 Mo. 678, 41 S. W. 224; Bates v. Hamilton, 144 Mo. loc. cit. 11, 45 S. W. 641.

"2. Judgments upon notes containing such a cognovit are valid judgments in Ohio. Matheus v. Thompson, 3 Ohio, 272; Watson v. Paine, 25 Ohio St. 340; Clements v. Hull, 35 Ohio St. 141. Such judgments are also valid in other states. Hansen v. Schlesinger, 125 Ill. 230, 17 N. E. 718; Rooke v. Beldam, 119 Ill. 320, 10 N. E. 191; Holden v. Bull, 1 Penr. & W. 460; Ely v. Karmany, 23 Pa. 314; Stein v. Brunner, 42 La. Ann. 772, 7 So. 718; F. Mayer Boot & Shoe Co. v. Falk, 89 Wis. 216, 61 N. W. 562. The identical question here involved came before this court in Randolph v. Keiler, 21 Mo. 557, where the suit was upon a judgment rendered by the 'inferior court of common pleas, in and for the county of Sussex, state of New Jersey,' upon a note containing a cognovit in almost the exact terms with the note upon which the Ohio court entered judgment in this case. Practically the same defenses were made there that are made here. But it was held that such judgment was valid in New Jersey, even though neither of the parties were citizens of that state, or had ever been in that state, and, this being so, the judgment was entitled to 'full force and credit' in this state, under § 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States; and hence the New Jersey judgment was enforced here. Similar judgments are enforced in other jurisdictions, even though the defendant was a resident of another state than that in which the judgment sought to be enforced was rendered. Kitchen v. Bellefontaine Nat. Bank, 53 Kan. 242, 36 Pac. 344; Ritter v. Hoffman, 35 Kan. 215, 10 Pac. 576; Crafts v. Clark, 38 Iowa, 237; Nichols v. Farwell, 24 Neb. 180, 38 N. W. 820; Snyder v. Critchfield, 44 Neb. 66, 62 N. W. 306; Sipes v. Whitney, 30 Ohio St. 69. The question whether the note upon which the judgment sued on was barred by limitation in Missouri is not open to review here. The suit is upon the judgment, and that is not barred by limitation. It follows that the trial court erred in giving the instruction quoted, and also that neither the answer nor the evidence shows any defense to the suit. The trial court should have directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the judgment of that court is reversed, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded with in accordance herewith."

Upon motion the cause was transferred to court in banc, upon the dissent of Valliant, J. The case has again been fully argued and further briefed by counsel. In addition to what is said in the divisional opinion, it is proper to say that the cases of D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648, and Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, are not applicable to the case at bar,—the first, because there was no service of any kind upon the partner who lived in Louisiana, and therefore the personal judgment of the New York court against him was void; and the second, because the service was by publication, constructive, and therefore it would not support a personal judgment, while in the case at bar the defendant was in court by his own voluntary act when the judgment was rendered against him. Counsel for defendant, in a supplemental brief, has referred to the following cases as authority for the contention that the decision in this case and that in Randolph v. Keiler, 21 Mo. 557, are not in harmony with the rule and policy in this state: Overstreet v. Shannon, 1 Mo. 529; Sallee v. Hays, 3 Mo. 116; Smith v. Ross, 7 Mo. 464; Gillett v. Camp, 23 Mo. 375; Miles v. Jones, 28 Mo. 87; Foot v. Newell, 29 Mo. 400; Latimer v. Union P. R. Co. East Div. 43 Mo. 105, 97 Am. Dec. 378; Sevier v. Roddie, 51 Mo. 580; and State use of Gilbreath v. Bunce, 65 Mo. 340. A careful examination of these cases shows, however, that they have no application to the case at bar. Thus, in Overstreet v. Shannon, 1 Mo. 529, it appeared that the defendant had not been served in any manner in the foreign state. In Sallee v. Hays, 3 Mo. 116, the judgment was against the defendants, who were non-residents of the foreign state, without any service whatever, upon a covenant of their ancestor, and the decree charged the assets descended with the debt of the ancestor. It was alleged that such a decree was conclusive upon the parties in Kentucky. This court held that the judgment was not valid here, because the defendants had not been brought into court in any manner whatever. In Gillett v. Camp, 23 Mo. 375, and Latimer v. Union P. R. Co. East Div. 43 Mo. 105, 97 Am. Dec. 378, the judgment was based solely upon constructive service by publication. In Smith v. Ross, 7 Mo. 464, the action was upon a foreign judgment against Smith, who was served, and Haniman, as to whom the return of process was "not found." The judgment was held to be void as to Haniman, because he was never brought into court. In Miles v. Jones, 28 Mo. 87, the defendant was personally served; but the judgment was attacked and set aside because it was procured by fraud. In Foot v. Newell, 29 Mo. 400, it appeared that a judgment was rendered against the defendant in Indiana (it does not appear from the statement of facts whether the defendant was in court or not, but it seems to be assumed that he was; at any rate, that question was not involved in the case), and that the sheriff had levied upon the property, and that by virtue of a statute of that state the defendant replevied the property levied on, and obtained a stay of execution, according to the law of that state, by giving a bond to pay the judgment. The statute (Ind. act Feb. 4, 1831) provided: "And such bond, from the date of its execution, shall be taken as, and have the force and effect of, a judgment confessed in a court of record against the person or persons executing the same and against their estates, and execution may issue thereon, accordingly." The judgment was not paid, and the bond was sued on in this state as a judgment of the state of Indiana. It was held that such a bond had "no affinity" to a judgment, and was not such a judgment as is contemplated by the act of Congress: all of which is undoubtedly right, for such a bond is no more a judgment than is any contract or power of attorney authorizing a confession of a judgment. It is the act of the parties, and is not the judgment of a court. In Sevier v. Roddie, 51 Mo. 580, the action was upon a Tennessee judgment. It appeared that a third person had obtained a judgment against the defendant as principal and the plaintiffs as his sureties. The sureties paid the judgment, and under the laws of Tennessee obtained a summary judgment, without notice, against the principal, and the suit was upon this judgment. It was properly held that the judgment was not such a judgment as the act of Congress contemplated, because, the defendant not being in court, the proceeding was void. In State use of Gilbreath v. Bunce, 65 Mo. 349, it appeared that under the laws of Arkansas the plaintiff, a minor, had been relieved of the disability of infancy, "so far as to authorize him to demand, sue for, and receive all moneys belonging to him in the state of Missouri, in the hands of his curator," etc. Thereupon he sued the defendant, the curator of his estate in Missouri, upon his bond as such curator, to recover the estate in his hands. It was held that the minor could not maintain the suit, as under the laws of Missouri a minor can only appear by guardian, and that the legislature of Arkansas could not pass a law which would have the effect of giving a non-resident minor of this state a different status in the courts of this state from that of a resident minor in this state, when seeking the aid of the courts of this state. This decision is right, but it is not perceived how it applies to the case at bar, nor how the act of Congress has any bearing on it; for the action was not for the enforcement of a judgment of a foreign state, but was simply an attempt to make the minor of age when he came into the Missouri courts, contrary to the laws of this state. It did not remove his disabilities absolutely, or at all in Arkansas, but only "so far as to authorize him to demand, sue for, and recover all moneys belonging to him in the state of Missouri, in the hands of his curator," etc. This was simply a bungling attempt by the courts of Arkansas to control judicial proceedings in Missouri, and is without precedent in law that we are aware of.

The defendant strenuously contends that the case of Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 670, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, is "on all fours" with the case at bar. In that case it appeared: "B., a citizen of Maryland, having executed a bond containing a warrant authorizing any attorney of any court of record in the state of New York, or any other state, to confess judgment for the penalty, and judgment having been entered against him in Pennsylvania by a prothonotary, without service of process or appearance in person or by attorney, under a local law permitting that to be done, held; (1) That in a suit upon this judgment in Maryland the courts of Maryland were not bound to hold the judgment as obligatory, either on the ground of comity or of duty, contrary to the laws and policy of their own state; (2) B. could not properly be presumptively held to knowledge and acceptance of particular laws of Pennsylvania, or of all the states other than his own, allowing that to be done which was not authorized by the terms of the instrument he had executed." It was pointed out (1) that a judgment of a sister state was required to be observed in another state only when the defendant was served with process, or voluntarily entered his appearance, "or that he had in some manner authorized the proceeding;" (2) that an instrument authorizing a confession of judgment must be strictly followed, and its terms could not be enlarged by reading into it the laws of another state, of which he is not charged with knowledge, and hence, if the power to confess judgment was conferred upon any attorney of any court of record, its terms could not be enlarged so as to authorize a prothonotary to confess judgment, even if the laws of the state where the judgment was rendered expressly permitted a prothonotary to act whenever any attorney was authorized to do so. This case is "on all fours" with the case at bar, and is ample support for the decision herein, so far as it holds that, where the defendant has "authorized the proceeding," he is bound by the judgment, and the courts of other states must give force and effect to the judgment of the sister state whenever the authority has been strictly pursued, as is the case here; but it is unlike the case at bar in this: In that case the authority for the proceeding, conferred by the act of the defendant, was not strictly pursued; while here it was done. That judgment was held void in a sister state because a prothonotary does not come within the class of "attorneys of courts of record," and the act of such prothonotary was not, therefore, authorized by the defendant, and the law of the state could not enlarge the authority granted by the defendant. That decision is also valuable as showing plainly the principle upon which D'Arcy v. Ketohun, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648, and Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S.

714, 24 L. ed. 565, both of which are referred to in that case, rested, to wit, that in neither case had the defendant been served with process, or voluntarily appeared, or in any manner authorized the proceeding. It also accentuates the proposition that, if the judgment is rendered against a party who is in court in any one of the three ways specified, it is valid, not only in the state where it is rendered, but, under the act of Congress, in all sister states.

We subscribe and adhere to all the cases cited and herein reviewed, but the rules there announced are not contravened by anything that is decided in the case at bar. On the contrary, those were all cases where the party sought to be charged had not been brought into court by personal service, and had not voluntarily entered his appearance, and had not authorized the proceeding against him, while in the case at bar the defendant had expressly authorized the exact proceeding that was had against him in Ohio.

For these reasons the opinion heretofore rendered in division No. 1 is adopted as the opinion of the court in banc, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded with in accordance herewith.

Burgess, Ch. J., and Sherwood, Brace, and Gantt, JJ., concur.

Valliant, J., dissenting:

The Constitution of the United States ordains that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state." Article 4, § 1. But that clause of the Constitution, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, does not mean that all judgments in other states must be given the same effect which they may have by law in the state where rendered. It is absolutely essential, in order to give to a judgment in personam effect outside of the state in which it was rendered, that the court which rendered it should have had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. In D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648, a judgment rendered in New York was sued on in Louisiana. A statute of New York provided that, where joint debtors were sued and process was served on one, judgment, if plaintiff prevailed, might go against all; and the New York courts had held such judgments valid. In that case a partner in a New York firm lived in New Orleans, the firm was sued in New York, and the partner there served with process, and judgment was rendered against both. When the New Orleans man was sued on the judgment in Louisiana, the trial court held that, the judgment being valid in New York, where rendered, full faith and credit must be given to it everywhere, and rendered judgment accordingly. But the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment. The theory, I presume, on which the New York statute proceeded, was that it extended the implied agreement which exists among partners to make each the agent for all in firm matters to making each the agent for all to accept service of a writ. A statutory provision of that kind might be obligatory in the state of its enactment, and a court might on such service render a judgment against a nonresident that would be valid in the state where rendered; but, if so, it would have no extraterritorial effect. A statute of Oregon was to the effect that if personal service of process could not be had on a man, and he had property within the state, publication might be had, and on that notice the court could proceed to hear and render a judgment against him; the statute not requiring first the seizure by attachment of the property. In considering a case under that statute, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "... Attempts have been made to enforce such judgments in states other than those in which they were rendered, under the provision of the Constitution requiring that 'full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state;' and the act of Congress providing for the mode of authenticating such acts. . . . In the earlier cases it was supposed that the act gave to all judgments the same effect in other states which they had by law in the state where rendered, but this view was afterwards qualified, so as to make the act applicable only when the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and not to preclude an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was rendered or the right of the state itself to exercise authority over the person or the subject-matter." Further down in the same opinion it is said: "To prevent any misapplication of the views expressed in this opinion, it is proper to observe that we do not mean to assert, by anything we have said, that a state may not authorize proceedings to determine the status of one of its citizens, towards a non-resident, which would be binding within the state, though made without service of process or personal notice to the nonresident. The jurisdiction which every state possesses to determine the civil status and capacities of all its inhabitants involves authority to prescribe the conditions on which proceedings affecting them may be commenced and carried on within its territory." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, loc. cit. 729, 734, 24 L. ed. 565, 571, 573. Thus it is demonstrated by the highest expounder of the Constitution of the United States that a judgment may be valid in the state where it is rendered, yet not required by the Federal law to be accorded full faith and credit by another state. If the court in the sister state did not have actual service of process, or if the defendant did not in reality enter his appearance, the United States Constitution does not force us to recognize a judgment rendered on constructive service or on a fictitious entry of appearance.

The question in the case at bar is, Did the court in Ohio have jurisdiction of the person of the defendant when it rendered judgment against him? He was at the time a resident of Missouri, and was not in Ohio while the suit was pending; but some years before, when he was in Ohio, he executed the note sued on, and included in it what purported to be an authorization to any attorney at law to appear in any court in the United States, waive process, enter appearance, and confess judgment on the note against him. Under that authorization someone, said to be an attorney at law, did essay to enter the defendant's appearance, waive process, and confess judgment. That character of proceeding is said to be valid in Ohio, and I will assume that it is, and that the judgment is valid in that state. Suppose there had been no such authorization in the note, and an attorney at law, without any authority from defendant whatever, had entered his appearance and suffered the judgment to go. That would be a valid judgment in the state where rendered, to the extent, at least, that it could not be avoided collaterally. But the decisions above cited are authority for saying that, if that judgment should be sued on here, the defendant may avoid it by a plea showing that the court had no jurisdiction of his person. Now, the supposed case differs from the case at bar only in this: that in that case there was no semblance of authority to the pragmatical attorney, while here there is claimed to be authority. But, if what is here claimed as authority is no authority, then there is no difference between the cases. That so-called authorization would certainly not be recognized as valid under the laws of this state, not because we do not recognize the right of a man to appoint an attorney in the regular way to enter his appearance in a suit in court, even for the purpose of suffering judgment to go against him, but because it is against the policy of our law to permit a man, when entering into an obligation, to bargain away his right to be heard in court, should a question ever arise between him and his adversary in relation to it. A man who has signed a paper of that kind, if it is valid, is completely at the mercy of the holder, whatever the merits of the case may be, because the holder may go to any forum in the United States, and select any attorney whom he chooses, and have judgment entered against the maker, who does not know that he is being sued; and this judgment creditor comes to the state in which the judgment debtor resides, and asks the courts of such state to say that "full faith and credit" must be given to the judgment of that sister state. But it is said that this contract was good in the state where it was made, and is therefore valid everywhere. That is not a rule of universal application. In the case last cited the Supreme Court of the United States said: "The several states are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others; and so it is laid down by jurists as an elementary principle that the laws of one state have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity." That comity never admits the validity of an act done in another state by authority of the law there, if it contravenes the policy of the law here. In Missouri a man's right to be heard in court is inalienable, and a contract like the one in question is not only not authorized, but contrary to our policy. The pretended appearance that is entered under such authority is not real, but fictitious. We are not forced to recognize it, and would do violence to our judicial policy if we did so. In an early case (Randolph v. Keiler, 21 Mo. 557) this court seems to have felt constrained to give "full faith and credit" to a judgment rendered in New Jersey on such an obligation. But the court was, even then, divided; Judge Scott rendering a dissenting opinion. The Constitution of the United States, however, in this particular, has had much enlightened interpretation since then, and, as said by the United States Supreme Court in the Pennoyer Case, above cited, the earlier decisions have been qualified. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the judgment of the circuit court was for the right party, and should be affirmed.

Robinson, J., concurs in the foregoing views.

W. A. CLARK, Appt.,
v.
A. G. CAMPBELL, Respt.
(.....Utah.....)

Under a writing entitled "Escrow," instructing a depositary to deliver stock deposited with the writing to a third person in case he pays therefor on or before a certain date, no title passes to the vendee until payment is made, so as to entitle him to dividends on the stock declared between the times of deposit and payment.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount of a dividend

NOTE.—As to right to dividends on transfer of corporate stock, see Rose v. Barclay (Pa.) 45 L. R. A. 392, and note.

As to right to stock dividends as between owner of capital and income, see Spooner v. Phillips (Conn.) 16 L. R. A. 461, and note; 54 L. R. A.

which had been paid to one whose contract to convey the stock was alleged to have included the right to the dividend. Affirmed.

Statement by Hart, District Judge:

Action to recover $19,000, the amount of a dividend upon certain mining stock. Under the instructions of the court so to do, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and, after motion for new trial, duly made and overruled, plaintiff appeals. The facts are that, in pursuance of negotiations between the defendant and one L. C. Trent, agent of plaintiff, on October 29, 1898, defendant signed the following instrument in writing, and deposited the same, together with the mining stock herein mentioned, with Wells, Fargo, & Co., bankers, Salt Lake City, to wit:

ESCROW.

To Wells, Fargo & Co., Bankers, Salt Lake City:—

I inclose 95,112 shares of the capital stock of the Ophir Hill Mining Company, of Utah, represented by certificates numbered 138, 102, 69, 115, and 113. I also inclose 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the Ophir Hill Mining & Concentrating Company, represented by certificates numbered 1, 4, 15, 16, 3, and 2. All said certificates are indorsed in blank, except the certificates in favor of W. B. Stanley, whose indorsement I will secure. If L. C. Trent, or his agent, shall pay to my credit at your bank the sum of $75,000 on or before Nov. 24th, 1898, then and thereupon you shall deliver to him all the inclosed certificates of stock. If, however, said Trent, or his agent, shall fail to pay to my credit at your bank said sum of $75,000 on or before Nov. 24th, 1898, then, and upon such failure, you shall return to me all the inclosed shares and certificates. The time limited for the payment of said $75,000, as aforesaid, is expressly made material to, and of the essence of, the option given by me to said Trent to purchase said shares for said sum, and his option terminates and ceases absolutely at the end of the time limited above for the payment of said $75,000. In case of payment the buyer is to pay for revenue stamps, and you are authorized to cancel them for me. A. G. Campbell.

Dated October 29th, 1898.

This writing, together with the certificates of stock, remained as deposited until November 24, 1898, when the plaintiff, by his agent, paid to Wells, Fargo, & Co. the sum of $75,000. Before the payment was thus made and the stock received, the directors of the Ophir Hill Mining & Concentrating Company declared a dividend, on November 22, 1898, in the total sum of $19,000, and on that day was paid to the defendant. This amount was on deposit with T. R. Jones & Co., bankers, to the credit of said mining company, on October 29, 1898, and remained on deposit until after the dividend was declared. Plaintiff did not know, on November 24, 1898, that the dividend had been declared, and, while he knew on October 29th that there was some money of the mining company on deposit with T. R. Jones & Co., did not know the amount thereof.

An escrow is "where one doth make and seal a deed, and deliver it unto a stranger until certain conditions be performed, and then to be delivered to him to whom the deed is made, to take effect as his deed."

There can be no question but that the agreement in controversy was an agreement in escrow.

The manner of the delivery of a deed or stock in escrow is not essential, so that a delivery is upon a condition and to a stranger to it.

When the stock in question was deposited in Wells, Fargo, & Company's bank by Campbell in escrow under the agreement, Campbell lost all dominion and control of the same, and he could never again exercise any control over it if Clark paid the money within the time named, and, if it was never paid, then not until the expiration of the time named.

An agreement in escrow needs no consideration other than the fact that the depository is the agent of both parties, that he is made the custodian of the same, and that dominion over the property is waived during the life of the same by the parties to the agreement.

The stock placed in escrow represented the corpus of the corporation, viz.: all the property belonging to it, of every shape, style and description, including the money then on deposit at T. R. Jones's bank to its credit.

The money on hand was a part and parcel of the stock placed in escrow on October 29, 1898.

The courts uniformly apply the doctrine of relation wherever it is necessary in order to make the deed, bond, or stock represent the same thing it represented when placed in escrow.

Campbell gave to Trent an option to take the stock in question within a certain time at a certain price.

There was no agreement whatever on the part of Trent to take the stock at that or any other time, or to do anything whatever; that being the case, Campbell had the right to withdraw the offer at any time before it was accepted, because, until it was accepted, there was no agreement between the parties binding on either of them.

Hopper v. Sage, 112 N. Y. 530, 20 N. E. 350; 2 Thomp. Corp. §§ 2172-2176; Bright v. Lord, 51 Ind. 272, 19 Am. Rep. 732.

The purchaser of stock does not take, except by express agreement, any dividend declared prior to the purchase.

Bright v. Lord, 51 Ind. 272, 19 Am. Rep. 732; Rose v. Barclay, 191 Pa. 594, 45 L. R. A. 392, 43 Atl. 385.

Hart, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The main question is, Who is entitled to the dividends declared and paid, in view of the facts of this case? It is insisted on behalf of plaintiff, Clark, that the so-called "escrow" was a binding agreement upon the defendant, Campbell, before the acceptance of the same by Clark; and that, when the latter did accept the terms of the offer, and made payment on November 24th, and the stock was delivered to him, the transaction related back to the delivery of the so-called "escrow" to the depository on October 29th, and the title should be held to pass as of that date, and thus entitle Clark to the dividends declared subsequently to that date. As there was no withdrawal, or attempted withdrawal, by Campbell, of the offer made in the so-called "escrow" before the same was accepted by Clark, it is not very material to inquire how far the "escrow" was binding upon Campbell prior to the acceptance of the terms by Clark and the payment of the amount required. It may be noted, however, for whatever bearing the same may have in view of subsequent developments, that the instrument deposited was not signed by, nor on behalf of, Clark, and he was not bound to do anything. No money consideration appears to have been given for the writing, nor does there appear to have been any independent contract between the parties as to said "escrow" 54 L. R. A.

either binding Campbell to keep the offer to sell open for the time named, or binding Clark to buy the said stock at any time, or at all. Doubtless, bills or notes or stocks, as well as real estate, may be the subject of an escrow agreement. As to the necessity for an actual contract, 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 313, says: "Not only are sufficient parties, a proper subject-matter, and a consideration required, but also an actual contract by the parties. In other words, the grantor must have sold and the grantee must have purchased the land; for a proposal to sell or a proposal to buy, although it may be stated in writing, is not sufficient. An actual contract of sale on one side and purchase on the other is just as requisite as the execution of the instrument by the grantor to make it an escrow." Campbell v. Thomas, 42 Wis. 437, 24 Am. Rep. 427; Fitch v. Bunch, 30 Cal. 208; Hoig v. Adrian College, 83 Ill. 267; Stanton v. Miller, 58 N. Y. 197. In the Wisconsin case above cited the court says: "But we have not discovered a single case in which it has been held that one who has deposited a deed of land with a third person with directions to deliver it to the grantee on the happening of a given event, but who has made no valid executory contract to convey the land, may not revoke the directions to the depository, and recall the deed, at any time before the conditions of the deposit have been complied with, provided those conditions are such that the title does not pass at once to the grantee upon delivery of the deed to the depository." If title to the mining stock did not pass to Clark until November 24, 1898, then, according to the well-established rule, Campbell is entitled to the dividend, as being the owner of the stock on the day the dividend was declared. The doctrine is quite fully stated in the case of Wheeler v. Northwestern Sleigh Co. 39 Fed. 347, as follows: "Stockholders are, as to the property of the corporation, quasi partners, holding per my et per tout. The earnings of the corporation are part of the corporate property, held by the same tenure; and, until separated from the general mass, the interest of the stockholders therein passes with the transfer of the stock; and this irrespective of the time during which earnings have accrued. By the declaration of a dividend, however, the earnings, to the extent declared, are separated from the general mass of property, and appropriated to the then stockholders, who become creditors of the corporation, for the amount of the dividend. The relationship of the stockholder to the corporation, as to the amount of the dividend, is thus changed from one of partnership ownership to that of creditor. He therefore stands to the corporation in a dual relation,—with respect to his stock, as partner and part owner of the corporate property; with respect to the dividend, as creditor upon a par with other creditors of the corporation. The severance of the earnings from the general mass of corporate property, and the promise to pay, arising from the declaration of the dividend, works this change. The earnings represented by the dividend, although the fruit of the general property of the company, are no longer represented by the stock, but become a debt of the company to the individual who, at the time of the declaration of the dividend, was the owner of the stock. That the dividend is payable at a future date can work no distinction in the right. The debt exists from the time of the declaration of the dividend, although payment is postponed for the convenience of the company. The right became fixed and absolute by the declaration. This right could, of course, be transferred with the stock by special agreement, but not otherwise. The dividend would not pass as an incident of the stock." Among other authorities sustaining the general rule that dividends belong to the owner of the stock at the time the same are declared, are the following: 2 Thomp. Corp. §§ 2172-2176; Dow v. Gould & C. Silver Min. Co. 31 Cal. 630, 648; Jones v. Terre Haute & R. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 196; Boardman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 157; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 541; Jermain v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 483; Re Kernochan, 104 N. Y. 618, 11 N. E. 149; Bright v. Lord, 51 Ind. 272, 19 Am. Rep. 732; Hopper v. Sage, 112 N. Y. 532, 20 N. E. 350.

The essential inquiry is, When did the title to the stock pass to Clark? Was it on October 29th, when the option and stock were deposited, or was it on November 24th, the date of the acceptance, payment, and delivery? Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the writing deposited was an escrow agreement, binding upon Campbell before acceptance by Clark, still it by no means follows that upon delivery to Clark of the stock on November 24th the sale related back and took effect as of August 29th. We are aware of the rule, in certain cases of escrow contracts, to permit the deed to take effect by relation as of the time of the first delivery. The rule is thus stated in Campbell v. Thomas, 42 Wis. 437, 24 Am. Rep. 427: "By all of the authorities, a deed so deposited with a third person to be delivered to the grantee on the happening of some event in the future, which may or may not happen, does not pass title to the land described in it to the grantee until such event occurs, and then only from that time, or perhaps from the actual delivery of the deed to the grantee after the event has occurred. There may be exceptional cases, as where a man delivers his deed in escrow, and dies before the conditions of the deposit are fulfilled. In such cases it has been said that from necessity, after the conditions are fulfilled, the deed must take effect by relation as of the time of the first delivery." Prutsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, 11 Am. Rep. 592; Taft v. Taft, 59 Mich. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 291, 26 N. W. 426. But the facts of the case at bar do not bring it within any of the exceptional cases permitting title to pass as of the first delivery. This case is also distinguishable from cases where there was an absolute agreement of sale and purchase, so as to be a sale in præsenti. The cases of Currie v. White, 45 N. Y. 822, Johnson v. Underhill, 52 N. Y. 203, and Phinney v. Murray, 83 Ga. 747, 6 L. R. A. 426, 10 S. E. 358, are all clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. In so far as the case of Harris v. Stevens, 7 N. H. 454, supports plaintiff's claim to the dividends in question, the same is against the great weight of authority. Under the undisputed evidence in this case, Campbell is entitled to the dividends as a matter of law, and the trial court did not err in so instructing the jury. There was no agreement between the parties as to who should have any dividend declared before the acceptance of the offer to sell, and therefore there was nothing in this connection that should have been submitted to the jury. It was not the case of an attempted, imperfect, or ambiguous agreement as to the right to dividends on the stock sold, and there was nothing to submit to the jury in that connection. It was purely a question of law to award the funds sued for under the undisputed evidence. While there is some complaint that plaintiff was misled, in that he believed that he was buying the bank funds represented by the dividends declared and paid, it must be noted that this is not an action to rescind the contract on the ground of mistake or fraud. This disposes of many of the errors assigned, and not particularly mentioned above.

There being no reversible error in the trial of the case, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed, at appellant's cost.

Baskin and Bartch, JJ., concur.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

Robert MORFORD, Plff. in Err.,
v.

TERRITORY of Oklahoma.

(10 Okla. 741.)

- *1. Perjury cannot be assigned upon the alleged false testimony of a witness, given in the course of a trial, where the court has no jurisdiction of the offense charged or of the defendant. But if the proceedings are merely erroneous or voidable, even if there be such irregularities or defects as would require a reversal of the cause on appeal, false testimony given in the course of such trial, if material, does constitute perjury.
- *2. Where an office exists under the law, and a person is elected to fill such office, and duly qualifies and enters upon the discharge of his official duties, he is a de facto officer, and his acts are valid, notwithstanding the fact that he may not possess all the necessary qualifications as prescribed by the statute to fill such office.

3. The official acts of a defacto officer are recognized as valid on the high ground of public policy, and for the protection of those having official business to transact; and the acts of such de facto officer cannot be collaterally attacked.

(February 8, 1901.)

ERROR to the District Court for Payne County to review a judgment convicting defendant of perjury. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Keaton & Kearful, for plaintiff in error:

Perjury cannot be predicated upon the alleged false testimony of the plaintiff in error, because the proceedings in the case

*Headnotes by HAINER, J.

NOTE.—Perjury as affected by invalidity of proceeding in which testimony is taken.

Scope.

This note is confined to cases in which the perjury is charged to have been committed in a judicial proceeding of a class recognized by law, and of such a nature that perjury may, concededly, be predicated of a false oath therein, in the absence of any jurisdictional or other defect. Therefore, cases in which the oath was nonjudicial, or in which the proceeding was one on which perjury could not be assigned under any circumstances, are excluded.

Jurisdictional defects, generally.

It is established by numerous cases and beyond question that perjury cannot be predicated of a false oath in a proceeding before a court which had no jurisdiction to inquire into the matter which was the subject of that proceeding. Collins v. State, 78 Ala. 433; Buell v. State, 45 Ark. 336; People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 50 Pac. 20; United States v. Jackson, 9 Mackey, 424; Pankey v. People, 2 Ill. 80; Maynard v. People, 135 Ill. 416, 25 N. E. 740; Kerfoot v. Com. 89 Ky. 174, 12 S. W. 189; Flower v. Swift, 8 Mart. N. S. 449; State v. Dreifus, 38 La. Ann. 877; State v. Wymberly, 40 La. Ann. 460, 4 So. 161; State v. Furlong, 26 Me. 69; State v. Plummer, 50 Me. 217; Com. v. Bugbee, 4 Gray, 206; Com. v. Brady, 7 Gray, 320; State v. Gregory, 6 N. C. (2 Murph.) 69; *State v. C. 827, 19 S. E. 149; State v. Jenkins, 116 N. C. 972, 20 S. E. 1021; Steinton v. State, 6 Yerg. 531; State v. Stillman, 7 Coldw. 341; Butler v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 483, 38 S. W. 787; State v. McCone, 59 Vt. 117, 7 Atl. 406; Paine's Case, 1 Bulst. 107, Noy, 114, Yelv. 111; Rex v. Aylett, 1 T. R. 68; Wyld v. Cookman, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 492; Reg. v. Bacon, 22 L. T. N. S. 627, 11 Cox, C. C. 540.

In the following cases the question was as to the sufficiency of the averments in the indictment for perjury with respect to the jurisdiction of the court before which the proceeding in which the perjury is charged to have been committed was held, but in each of them it is assumed that the court must have had jurisdiction in order to sustain the charge of perjury. Maynard v. People, 135 Ill. 416, 25 N. E. 740; State v. Thibodaux, 49 La. Ann. 15, 21 So. 127; State v. Newton, 1 G. Greene, 160, 48 Am. Dec. 367; State v. Schlessinger, 33 La. Ann. 564; State v. Grover, 38 La. Ann. 567; People v. Phelps, 5 Wend. 10; Com. v. White, 8 Pick. 453.

In Reg. v. Hughes, 7 Cox, C. C. 286, Dears. & B. C. C. 188, and Reg. v. Senior, 9 Cox, C. C. 469, Leigh & C. C. C. 401, 33 L. J. M. C. N. S. 125, 10 Jur. N. S. 547, 10 L. T. N. S. 428, 12 Week. Rep. 749, it was held that the court did have jurisdiction, but it was assumed that, without such jurisdiction, the charge of perjury could not have been sustained.

And, so, Horn v. Foster, 19 Ark. 354, and Montgomery v. State, 10 Ohio, 220, imply the necessity of jurisdiction by stating the rule that perjury may be predicated of the false testimony of an incompetent witness, with the qualification: provided, the court or justice had jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Pendency of proceedings.

An indictment for perjury committed before magistrates, which merely states that the defendant, to subject a certain person to the punishment provided for persons guilty of felony and larceny, went before the magistrates and swore to a deposition (which is set out) is bad, because it fails to show that any charge of felony had been previously made, or that any judicial proceeding was pending before the magistrates. Reg. v. Pearson, 8 Car. & P. 119.

In Reg. v. Bishop, Car. & M. 302, defendant was charged with committing perjury in an affidavit on an interpleader rule. It was held that the indictment for perjury was bad because the affidavit did not appear to have been made in a judicial proceeding.

Where perjury is predicated of answers made by defendant to certain interrogatories propounded to him on a writ of scire facias, unless the indictment alleges the entry or pendency of such writ in court, it will be invalid. State v. Hanson, 39 Me. 337.

In Com. v. Warden, 11 Met. 406, an indictment assigned perjury on an answer to a bill of discovery. There was no particular and precise averment that the court took jurisdiction or cognizance of the bill for the discovery, or by any judicial order required the defendant to answer thereto. The court, however, held wherein the testimony was given were null and void for want of jurisdiction.

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.

U. S. Const. art. 3, § 2.

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law.

Const. 6th Amend.

These constitutional provisions are applicable in full force to the territory of Oklahoma.

Thompson v. Utah, 170 U. S. 343, 42 L. ed. 1061, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 620; Collier v. Territory, 2 Okla. 444, 37 Pac. 819.

They require that, in the territory of Oklahoma, all criminal trials shall be conducted according to the practice at common law at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and in all cases where an offense was triable by a jury they require a trial by a common-law jury, and a common-law jury consists of twelve persons.

The offense of libel, with which the defendant Martin, in the case wherein the plaintiff in error testified, was charged, is a very grave public, indictable crime, and upon conviction is, and, at that time was, "punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not more than one year, or by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or both, at the discretion of the judge.

that, taking the whole indictment, it sufficiently appeared that the answer was made by the defendant as a party to the bill which had been filed against him.

Perjury may be assigned on an affidavit in support of the allegations in a bill for an injunction, though no motion was ever made for an injunction. Rex v. White, Moody & M. 271.

In Com. v. Knight, 12 Mass. 274, 7 Am. Dec. 72, it was held to be sufficient in an indictment for perjury to allege that the perjury was committed on the trial of an issue duly joined, without an express allegation that the cause of action was within the jurisdiction of the court.

Defects in organisation or constitution of tribunal.

The doctrine that want of jurisdiction will defeat a charge of perjury has been applied where the want of jurisdiction arose from some defect or invalidity in the organisation or constitution of the judicial tribunal before which the perjury is charged to have been committed; thus:

Perjury cannot be assigned on false testimony in a bastardy proceeding in a "justice's court" presided over by two justices of the peace, where the law confers the jurisdiction of such proceedings upon a temporary court consisting of one justice of the peace only. Renew v. State, 79 Ga. 162, 4 S. E. 19. In this case the judgment under the indictment for perjury was arrested because the indictment alleged that the false oath was taken and the false testimony given in a "justice's court" presided over by two named justices of the peace.

An indictment for perjury before a military court of inquiry is bad where it does not appear therefrom of what number of officers the court of inquiry consisted, or what was the respective rank of the officers, so as to enable the supreme court to discern whether the court of inquiry was constituted according to law. Conner v. Com. 2 Va. Cas. 80.

Perjury cannot be predicated of testimony upon an investigation before a committee of the general council of a city illegally appointed to investigate certain charges made against its members. Com. v. Hillenbrand, 96 Ky. 407, 29 S. W. 287. In this case there was no authority whatever for the appointment of the committee.

In State v. Plummer, 50 Me. 217, an indictment for perjury was held insufficient because it did not appear therefrom that the referees before whom the perjury was charged to have been committed had been appointed before the time of the alleged perjury.

perjury charged to have been committed in a criminal trial in a justice's court that the tribunal in which such trial was had should have been regularly and legally organized for the trial, and, as an incident of this, it must be shown that the justices were sworn to try the issue joined between the state and the defendant in that case. Curtley v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 59 S. W. 44.

Perjury may not be predicated of a criminal complaint made upon oath before a magistrate who was not authorized to administer the oath, because he had taken the oath of qualification before a person not authorized to administer it. State v. Hayward, 1 Nott & M'C. 546.

But perjury may be predicated of the false testimony of a witness who was sworn by a justice of the peace in a proceeding before arbitrators, notwithstanding that the arbitrators were not sworn, where the parties to the arbitration tacitly consented to go on without swearing them. Howard v. Sexton, 1 Denio, 440.

One guilty of false swearing in a proceeding presided over by a judge of the county court who had no authority to act in such a proceeding cannot be punished as for perjury. People v. Tracy, 9 Wend. 265.

It was held in State v. Williams, 61 Kan. 739, 60 Pac. 1050, that perjury might be predicated of false testimony in a proceeding before a de facto police judge. In this case there was a de jure office, and the functions thereof had been exercised by the de facto judge with the acquiescence of the public. And the defendant himself had acquiesced by appealing from his decision in the case in which the perjury was charged to have been committed. It was claimed, however, that such judge had resided out of the city, and was therefore disqualified to hold the office. For the reasons given in stating the scope of this note, the general question as to whether perjury may be assigned on a false oath before a de facto officer is not treated herein.

When the court had lost or exceeded its jurisdiction.

When a court once having jurisdiction has lost it, perjury cannot be predicated of the evidence given in the subsequent proceedings; thus:

In State v. Hall, 49 Me. 412, it was held that perjury could not be predicated of false testimony given on a trial before a justice of the peace after the justice, having on the return day defaulted the action, had, without authority, taken off the default and allowed the action to proceed. The decision is upon the ground that the justice had lost jurisdiction, and that the consent of the parties did not restore it.

People v. Smith, 9 Mich. 193; Wilson v. State, 16 Ark. 601; Brown v. State, 16 Ind. 496; State v. Carman, 63 Iowa, 130, 50 Am. Rep. 741, 18 N. W. 691; State v. Larrigan, 66 Iowa, 426, 23 N. Briggs*, 1 Curt. C. C. 311, Fed. Cas. No. 5,764; Saco v. Wentworth, 37 Me. 165, 58 Am. Dec. 786; Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 873, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580.

And the doctrine applies when the jurisdiction has been exceeded; thus:

Perjury cannot be predicated of false testimony given by others than the complainant on a preliminary examination before a justice of the peace under a bastardy act, where such act only authorized the justice to administer the oath to the complainant, but he, without authority, assumed jurisdiction to try the case on its merits and administer oaths and examine other witnesses. Hamm v. Wickline, 26 Ohio St. 81.

Defects in preliminary matters affecting the jurisdiction in the particular case.

That the jurisdiction of the court, which had general jurisdiction of the offense, had not properly attached to the particular case in which the perjury is charged to have been committed because the complaint in that case was not sworn to does not defeat the charge of perjury. Anderson v. State, 24 Tex. App. 705, 7 S. W. 40. The court distinguishes between a case where the court was without jurisdiction of the offense, the subject-matter of litigation, and a case where the jurisdiction had not attached. It conceded that, under the common law, perjury could not be assigned on false testimony in either of these cases, but held that that rule has been in effect abrogated, with respect to a case where the court had jurisdiction of the offense but not of the particular case, by the provision of the bill of rights that a person shall not be again put upon trial for the same offense after a verdict of not guilty in a court of competent jurisdiction. The argument is that the purpose of this provision was to protect one who had been acquitted after a trial by a court of competent jurisdiction though jurisdiction had not properly attached in the particular case; and that the prosecution in such a case, being sufficient to bar another prosecution, is also sufficient for the purpose of assigning perjury on false testimony therein.

In Wilson v. State, 27 Tex. App. 47, 10 S. W. 749, it was held that perjury could not be predicated of false testimony in a criminal proceeding where the information in that proceeding was not supported by the oath of a credible person as required by statute. The court says: "This oath is called a complaint. It is the basis and foundation upon which the information rests and is a necessary part of, and must be filed with, the information (Code 54 L. R. A.

Perjury cannot be predicated upon testimony given in the course of a proceeding which is coram non judice; and therefore, upon the record, the plaintiff in error could not have been, was not, and cannot be, lawfully convicted.

The probate court had no jurisdiction to try the case of Territory v. Martin upon a complaint, and without an information or indictment.

Collier v. Territory, 2 Okla. 444, 37 Pac. 819.

At the time of the trial of Territory v. Martin, the probate judge, who assumed to Crim. Proc. art. 36). Without a complaint an information would be wholly invalid,—would confer no jurisdiction upon the court, and would be worthless for any purpose. . . . It follows, then, that, in order to sustain an allegation of judicial proceedings by information, not only must such information be introduced in evidence, but the complaint upon which it is based or founded must be also introduced." Anderson v. State, 24 Tex. App. 706, 7 S. W. 40, is not alluded to with reference to this point, although it is cited on another point in the case. It is not apparent, however, why the theory on which that case was decided would not equally apply to this case.

The concession in Anderson v. State that at common law, in order to sustain a charge of perjury, the court must not only have had general jurisdiction, but jurisdiction must have attached in the particular case in which the perjury is charged to have been committed, is supported by the following cases:

Perjury cannot be predicated of a false oath where the officer or tribunal before whom it was taken had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the oath, notwithstanding that there may have been general authority to administer oaths in like cases if within the jurisdiction. People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 Pac. 342.

In Johnson v. State, 58 Ga. 397, perjury was assigned of testimony in a prosecution for larceny before a criminal court whose jurisdiction was limited to cases of larceny not amounting to a felony. The record in such proceeding was excluded from evidence, because the affidavit upon which the written accusation was required by statute to be founded did not affirmatively show that the larceny charged did not amount to a felony. The decision is upon the ground that the affidavit is the foundation of the jurisdiction.

Perjury cannot be assigned on sworn statements of a person subpoenaed before a justice of the peace to furnish testimony upon which to base a complaint for a violation of the liquor law, no complaint, oral or written, having been made to the justice at the time the statements were made. People v. Titmus, 102 Mich. 318, 60 N. W. 693.

In Reg. v. Scotton, 5 Q. B. 493, Dav. & M. 501, 1 New Sess. Cas. 27, 13 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 58, it was held to be a fatal objection to a prosecution for perjury assigned on testimony given in a criminal prosecution that the information in such prosecution was not based on a charge under oath. The decision is upon the ground that the oath in this case was a jurisdictional requisite. The statute required preside, did not possess the requisite qualifications.

The supervision of a judge possessing this statutory qualification was an absolutely essential component part of a jury trial as secured by the Constitution.

The jurisdiction of the probate court in cases of criminal libel (the crime of which Martin was convicted) is settled.

Martin v. Territory, 8 Okla. 41, 56 Pac. 712.

Hainer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Robert Morford, was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of perjury in the district court of Payne county, and sentenced to serve a term of five years at hard labor in the territorial penitentiary, at Lansing, Kansas. The perjury of which the defendant was convicted was assigned upon certain alleged false testimony given in the case of the territory against William G. Martin, who was tried and convicted upon the charge of criminal libel in the probate court of Payne county in November, 1897. There is no contention in the brief of counsel for appellant that any error was committed in the trial of the case at bar which would warrant a reversal of the cause, but the only contention is that in the case of the territory against Martin, who was tried and convicted of criminal libel in the probate court, and which judgment was subsequently affirmed by this court (8 Okla. 41, 56 Pac. 712), he was not tried for the charge to be deposed to under oath before any other proceedings should be had.

In Reg. v. Pearce, 3 Best & S. 531, 9 Cox, C. C. 258, 9 Jur. N. S. 647, 7 L. T. N. S. 597, 11 Week. Rep. 235, it was held that perjury could not be assigned on an examination under a judgment summons taken out by a married woman in her own name, without making her husband a party, on a judgment recovered before her marriage, notwithstanding that before the giving of the evidence on which perjury is assigned the court amended the summons by striking out the name of the plaintiff and substituting therefor the names of the husband and wife. The decision is upon the ground that the amendment was made without jurisdiction, and that the defendant therefore was sworn in a cause which had no existence.

It will be observed that in the English cases next cited it was held that perjury might be predicated of false evidence in cases that were apparently subject to defects in the preliminary proceedings very much like the defect in the proceeding involved in Anderson v. State, 24 Tex. App. 705, 7 S. W. 40. These cases, however, do not contradict the concession made in that case, but, on the contrary, support it. In that case the defect was held to be one that prevented the jurisdiction from attaching in the particular case; but in the English cases, it will be observed, the defects were not deemed to prevent the jurisdiction from attaching in the particular case.

In Reg. v. Berry, Bell, C. C. 46, 8 Cox, C. C. 121, 28 L. J. M. C. N. S. 86, 5 Jur. N. S. 320, it was held that the fact that the summons in a bastardy proceeding alleged that the defendant had paid money for the maintenance of the child within twelve months after its birth, instead of alleging that she had given proof of this fact, did not prevent perjury from being assigned on testimony given in the proceedings, where the putative father appeared according to the exigency of the summons, and made no objection to the proceedings, but went to trial upon the merits. The decision is upon the ground that the father had waived any irregularity that there might be in the process, and that when he had thus committed himself to the jurisdiction of the court, the court had jurisdiction to hear and decide the suit. This was said to be the case, even conceding that, if he had not appeared, the court could not lawfully have proceeded to hear evidence of paternity, or that, if he had appeared and objected to the issuing of the summons, the objection ought to have prevailed.

Reg. v. Simmonds, 8 Cox, C. C. 190 applies the doctrine of Reg. v. Berry to a case where the bastardy summons was regular on its face, and alleged that proof had been given of payment of money by the father within twelve months after the birth of the child for its maintenance, though in fact no such proof had been made before the summoning justice. Cockburn, Ch. J., says that Reg. v. Berry shows that such proof is not a matter of substance essential to found the jurisdiction of the justices, but a matter of process only, which may be waived by the defendant if he chooses.

Perjury may be assigned on the testimony in a criminal trial before justices, notwithstanding that the warrant upon which the defendant in such trial was arrested was illegal having been issued without a written oath or information. Queen v. Hughes, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 614, 48 L. J. M. C. N. S. 151, 40 L. T. N. S. 685. This was a decision in the court for Crown cases reserved. Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., Denman, J., Pollock and Huddleston, BB., Field, Lindley, Manisty, Hawkins, and Lopes, JJ., concurred in affirming the conviction in the perjury case. The opinion of Hawkins, J., in which Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., Pollock, B., and Lindley, J., concurred, puts the decision upon the ground that while the defendant in the original proceeding was illegally brought before the court, the court, nevertheless, had jurisdiction. It says that there is a marked distinction between the jurisdiction to take cognizance of an offense and the jurisdiction to issue a particular process to compel the accused to answer it. Reg. v. Scotton, 5 Q. B. 498, Dav. & M. 501, 1 New Sess. Cas. 27, 13 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 58, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that there the statute required a charge to be deposed to on oath before any proceedings should be had or taken upon the information, thus making the deposition under oath a jurisdictional requirement.

Perjury may be assigned on false testimony at the hearing of an affiliation summons, notwithstanding that there was no written deposition of the woman stating the paternity of the child as required by statute. Reg. v. Fletcher, L. R. 1 C. C. 820, 12 Cox, C. C. 77, 40 L. J. M. C. N. S. 123, 24 L. T. N. S. 742, 19 Week. Rep. 781. The decision is upon the ground that the magistrate had jurisdiction to hear the summons, the defendant in the affiliation proceeding having waived the want of a deposition by failing to make any objection in that proceeding.

In Reg. v. Millard, Dears. C. C. 166, 6 Cox, C. C. 150, 22 L. J. M. C. N. S. 108, 17 Jur. 400, it was held that where a magistrate was, by one section of a statute, given jurisdiction to convict summarily in cases of malicious dam-such offense according to law; that said trial of Martin was coram non judice, and therefore void, for the following reasons: (1) That the trial in the case of the territory against Martin in the probate court, wherein it is alleged in this case that the false testimony was given was had before a jury composed of only six persons; (2) that said trial was had upon a mere complaint of one other than the county attorney; (3) that the trial by jury was presided over by a probate judge who was not a lawyer, nor ever licensed to practise law.

In Martin v. Territory, 8 Okla. 41, 56 Pac. 712, this court held that the probate courts of this territory have jurisdiction of the offense of criminal libel. The probate court having jurisdiction of the defendant and of the offense of which he was convicted, any error occurring during the trial, no matter how irregular or erroneous it might have been, is no excuse or justification for the crime of perjury, for which Morford was indicted, tried, and convicted. It is true that the doctrine is well established that, where the court has no jurisdiction of the defendant or of the crime of which he is charged, any false testimony given in the course of such trial does not constitute perjury, but, on the other hand, if the trial was merely voidable, even if there be such defects as would require a reversal of the cause on appeal, false testimony given in the course of such trial, if material, constitutes perjury. Wharton, in his work on Criminal Law (§ 2225), announces the rule as follows: "A suit which is actually void and null from want of jurisdiction or other incurable defects is not one in which perjury can be committed. But if the proceedings are merely age to property, a subsequent section providing for an information on oath in such case did not make an information on oath essential to the jurisdiction of the magistrate to hear the case when the party charged appeared before him, and therefore perjury might be assigned on false testimony on a trial under such statute without an information or oath.

Where a party appears before a justice charged with an offense within his jurisdiction, the justice has jurisdiction to dispose of the case without a summons, or without any information in writing being laid before him, unless the statute creating the offense imposes the obligation of not hearing the case without these preliminaries. Reg. v. Shaw, 10 Cox, C. C. 86, Leigh & C. C. 579, 34 L. J. M. C. N. S. 169, 11 Jur. N. S. 415, 12 L. T. N. S. 470, 13 Week. Rep. 602.

In State v. Peters, 107 N. C. 876, 12 S. E. 74, it was held that the fact that the warrant in the prosecution in which the perjury is charged to have been committed was issued without a sworn complaint or affidavit did not defeat the charge of perjury. This was upon the ground that no written affidavit or complaint was required; that an appellate court could only look at the warrant, and could not look behind the warrant for objections lying in the defects or irregularities of the preliminary evidence; and that whatever might have been the effect, if there had been no oral complaint or oath, and such objection had been taken on the trial, such objection could not have availed when raised for the first time on appeal. A fortiori it could not be raised collaterally in a prosecution for perjury.

When want of jurisdiction arises from facts dehors the record.

A distinction is to be observed between want of jurisdiction to take cognizance of a case and want of jurisdiction to proceed to judgment therein. It frequently happens that want of jurisdiction in the latter sense arises from some matter deshors the record, which appears only after investigation. The court, therefore, may have had jurisdiction to make such investigation, although the facts as they ultimately appeared showed that it had no jurisdiction to proceed to judgment; and it follows that perjury may be predicated of false testimony during such investigation.

In Com. v. Weingartner, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 221, 27 S. W. 815, perjury was assigned on false swearing in a forcible detainer proceeding before a justice of the peace in and for a certain county. It was urged, in support of a 54 L. R. A.

demurrer to the indictment, that it should have shown the jurisdictional fact that the premises in dispute in the forcible detainer case were situated in such county, as otherwise the justice would have been without authority to administer the oath. The court said, however, that the officer was authorized to administer oaths generally, and that the subject-matter of the controversy was one concerning which the witness could generally be sworn, and that he might have been sworn by the justice touching any matter, however immaterial, connected with the proceeding, even to locating the premises, and if he had knowingly and wilfully sworn falsely, he was guilty without regard to whether or not the justice had jurisdiction to render a final judgment. The testimony as set out in the indictment did not relate to the location of the property.

In State v. Gates, 107 N. C. 832, 12 S. E. 319, supra, where it was held that perjury could not be predicated of false evidence on a motion to tax a prosecutor with costs in a criminal proceeding in which the grand jury had ignored the bill, because no power was conferred upon the court to tax a prosecutor with costs when the bill is ignored, the court said: "The test, according to the authorities, seems to be that if upon the state of facts alleged by the state or (in a civil action) by the plaintiff the court has jurisdiction, there is an issue if they are denied by the defendant, and any false swearing upon a matter material to such issue is perjury, although on the trial it might turn out that upon the truth of the facts as found there was not any case against the defendant, or none of which the court had jurisdiction. Here the contention of the state was that . . . [he, the prosecutor] had instituted a criminal action frivolously and maliciously, and that the grand jury had ignored the bill. Taking these facts to be all true, the court had no jurisdiction of the offense, and it was therefore immaterial in law whether the defendant swore falsely or not."

Perjury may be predicated of a false deposition made in Ohio to prove the residence of the complainant in a bill of divorce brought in another state, and to establish the cause of divorce, where the petition in the divorce suit alleged, as required by statute, the residence of the complainant in the county wherein the suit was brought, notwithstanding that, as a matter of fact, he was not a resident of the county or the state. Stewart v. State, 22 Ohio St. 477.

In Reg. v. Proud, L. R. 1 C. C. 71, 36 L. J. M. C. N. S. 62, 16 L. T. N. S. 364, 15 Week. Rep. 796, 10 Cox, C. C. 455, the defendant was indicted for perjury committed before a police voidable, even though there be such defects as require a reversal on error, false swearing in its conduct is perjury, if such false evidence could by any contingency be introduced as testimony."

The trial of Martin by a jury composed of only six persons, upon the charge of criminal libel, if error, was merely erroneous, and would not render the entire proceedings null and void for want of jurisdiction. And hence, we think, so far as the issues involved in this case are concerned, it is wholly immaterial whether or not Martin was tried by a jury of six persons or by a jury composed of twelve persons, as it is contended by the appellant. It would be a strange and novel doctrine to announce that perjury could not be predicated upon false testimony given in the course of a trial that was merely irregular, erroneous, or voidable, and magistrate upon a summons taken out by him as an apprentice against his master. It was urged that, as the summons was not taken out until after the relation of master and servant had ceased, the magistrate had no jurisdiction, and therefore perjury could not be assigned. The court held that the magistrate had jurisdiction to proceed in the case, but said that, whether he had jurisdiction to proceed or not, he clearly had jurisdiction to inquire whether the relation of master and apprentice existed, with a view to determining the dispute as to wages if such relation did exist.

So, while it was held in Reg. v. Ewington, Car. & M. 819, 2 Moody, C. C. 223, that perjury could not be predicated of evidence given upon an examination before commissioners in bankruptcy touching the estate of a person whom they had previously adjudicated to be a bankrupt, because the petitioning creditor's debt on which the fiat of bankruptcy issued was not of sufficient amount to support the proceeding, Lord Abinger, C. B., intimated that perjury might have been predicated of evidence in the preliminary proceeding to ascertain whether the debtor should be adjudged a bankrupt or not.

That a justice erroneously granted an attachment upon the oath of the creditor applying, which was not the "satisfactory proof" required by the statute authorizing attachments, does not prevent perjury from being assigned on the oath, especially where the attachment proceeding stands unreversed. Van Steenberg v. Korts, 10 Johns. 187. This decision is upon the ground that it was a question within the jurisdiction of the justice what was satisfactory proof, and that if he made a mistake in judging of the proof it was a case of error, and not of excess of jurisdiction.

Some cases have gone further, and held that where the court had general jurisdiction, which, however, might have been, but was not, defeated in the particular case by proof of extrinsic facts, perjury might be predicated generally of false evidence in such case, even if it did not relate to such facts; thus:

Where the court had general jurisdiction, and there are circumstances which, if they had been shown, would have made a particular case an exception to the general rule, a defendant convicted on a former trial, wherein he is charged to have committed perjury, cannot re-open the case in which he was tried, and show, as a matter of defense against the charge of perjury, the circumstances that would, if proved on the trial, have ousted the jurisdiction of the court. The oath cannot be deemed extrajudicial while the conviction and judgment of 54 L. R. A.

which could not affect the jurisdiction of the court in which the trial was had, although such errors might have occurred on the trial as to constitute reversible error on appeal.

The next proposition for which counsel contend this case should be reversed is that the trial of Martin in the probate court for the offense of criminal libel was had upon a mere complaint of one other than the county attorney. The record does not sustain counsel in this contention. It appears from the testimony of Robert Lowry, who was a witness in this cause, that an information was filed in the probate court, instead of a complaint; that such information was filed by the county attorney; and that said information was prepared by Mr. Lowry in connection with the county attorney. The record, also, in the case of the Territory against William G. Martin, 8 a court of general jurisdiction are still undisturbed, and upon the face of the record appear to be valid, not void. The question is whether the jurisdiction existed, not whether it might, by the introduction of extrinsic facts on the trial, have been defeated. State v. Ridley, 114 N. C. 827, 19 S. E. 149.

It may be said generally that where the jurisdiction of the court is voidable by matter dehors, but no defect of authority appears upon an inspection of the record of an indictment, trial, and conviction, such record cannot be collaterally impeached in a prosecution for perjury for taking a false oath in the course of the trial by showing that the jurisdiction might have been ousted, though it was not defeated. Ibid.

The pendency in one county of a suit in equity brought by a third person on a mechanic's lien for services, at the time of the commencement of an action in another county for a personal judgment for such services by the person who filed the mechanic's lien,—the plaintiff and the defendant in the latter action being codefendants in the former,—does not prevent the assigning of perjury on testimony in the latter action. State v. Clough, 111 Iowa, 714, 83 N. W. 727. The decision is upon the ground that, even conceding that the actions were such that a plea in abatement would lie against the last action, the court, having properly acquired jurisdiction of that action, would retain the same until some reason was shown why it should not longer do so. It was also held that the rule that the court acquiring jurisdiction of a particular case will retain the same to the exclusion of another court of concurrent jurisdiction was not applicable because the suits were not between the same parties seeking the same remedies.

Perjury may be predicted of false testimony on the trial of a third person for a crime other than that for which he was extradited from a foreign country. Cordway v. State, 25 Tex. App. 405, 8 S. W. 670. The decision is upon the ground that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the prosecution, though it did not originally have jurisdiction over the person of the accused to try him for an offense other than that for which he was extradited, but that the lack of jurisdiction over the person could be waived, at least so far as to uphold the prosecution as against collateral attack, and was waived when the defendant in that prosecution submitted to trial without objection.

In People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 Pac. 342, however a complaint for perjury which charged the making of a false oath to a crimina-

Okl. 41, 56 Pac. 712, shows that the information was filed by the county attorney, A. T. Neal, based upon a positive affidavit sworn to by one Samuel Dial.

And, lastly, counsel for appellant insist that this cause should be reversed for the reason that the trial in the libel suit of Martin was presided over by a probate judge who was not a lawyer, nor ever licensed to practise law. The record discloses that the presiding judge was duly elected, qualified, and acting as probate judge of Payne county at the time the alleged false testimony was given by the appellant; that the presiding judge had served for more than two years as probate judge of said county, and had been re-elected and was serving his second term. It is true that the record shows that he was not a licensed lawyer, and did not possess the qualifications prescribed in § 2, chap. 18, Sess. Laws 1895, which reads as follows: "Sec. 2. That in addition to other qualifications required of a probate judge, he shall be a licensed lawyer in good standing, shall be of the age of twenty-five years or over, and shall have practised his profession for at least three years next preceding his election." But, notwithstanding the fact that the probate judge was not a licensed attorney at the time he was elected, there is no question that at the time said cause was tried in the probate court he was a de facto probate judge of said county, and had full power and authority to try said cause and administer oaths to witnesses. The acts of a de facto officer are as valid and effective, when they concern the public or rights of third persons, as though they were officers de jure. Where an office exists under the law, and a person is elected to fill al complaint before a city recorder charging one with a misdemeanor in disturbing a religious meeting was held bad because it did not show that the alleged misdemeanor was one which the recorder had jurisdiction to inquire into, since it was not alleged that the same was committed within the city. There was no general averment in this case that the city recorder had jurisdiction of the misdemeanor.

And in Com. v. Pickering, 8 Gratt. 628, 56 Am. Dec. 158, it was held that an indictment for perjury committed before a grand jury must show that the testimony related to an offense committed within the county to which the jurisdiction of the grand jury extended.

And in Reg. v. Willis, 12 Cox, C. C. 164, where perjury was assigned on testimony at a petty sessions on hearing of an information against the keeper of a beerhouse for knowingly permitting drunkenness on her premises contrary to the tenor of her license, the court held that, as the license of the beerhouse keeper was not produced, the charge of perjury would not lie. Cleasby (after consulting Mr. Justice Byles) said: "I am of the opinion that it is not sufficient to show a general jurisdiction in the justices to inquire into such a charge as is laid in the information, but they must have jurisdiction in the particular case. If there was no license there could be no offense, and therefore no jurisdiction."

Defects not affecting jurisdiction, generally.

It is well established that defects, errors, or irregularities in the proceedings in which perjury is charged to have been committed, though sufficiently serious to require a reversal, do not defeat a charge of perjury, unless they were jurisdictional; thus:

The reversal of a judgment of conviction in the case in which the perjury is charged to have been committed does not constitute a defense to the charge of perjury. Reg. v. Meek, 3 Car. & P. 513.

Perjury may be assigned on an oath taken in a proceeding which was erroneous but not void, at least while the proceeding stands un-reversed. State v. Moller, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 263.

Where perjury is assigned on false swearing in the course of a judicial proceeding it is essential that the court in such proceeding shall have had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and power to administer an oath to the witness; but it is not necessary that all proceedings in the trial should be strictly regular. State v. Hall, 7 Blackf. 25.

If the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit in which the alleged perjury was committed and the oath was required by law, irregularities in the proceedings will not prevent perjury. Smith v. State, 81 Tex. Crim. Rep. 815, 20 S. W. 707.

Perjury charged to have been committed on a nonjudicial oath cannot be maintained if the person who administered it had no lawful authority; but perjury alleged to have been committed on a judicial oath can be maintained unless the court was without jurisdiction of the cause. State v. Dreflus, 38 La. Ann. 877.

It is not a legitimate defense for a party charged with perjury to show that the court committed error in its proceedings, provided the court had jurisdiction. State v. Lavalley, 9 Mo. 824. In this case perjury was assigned on false testimony on an examination before the circuit court as to the sufficiency of the security on an appeal from a justice's judgment. The court held that the circuit court had power to hold such an examination, but held that, if it had not, that fact would not have avoided the charge of perjury since the circuit court had jurisdiction over the case by virtue of the appeal to it.

When courts have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, all irregularities may be waived, and such irregularities will afford no defense to a charge of perjury. Re Smith, 110 Mich. 435, 68 N. W. 228. In this case it was held that it was no defense to a charge of perjury that the testimony of which it was predicated was given before the circuit judge under oath administered by him in a county adjoining that in which the action was pending but in the same judicial circuit, the parties in the case having stipulated, with the consent of the judge, that the testimony should be so taken.

Though a tribunal must have jurisdiction of the cause or proceeding before perjury can be committed therein, yet where the defect renders the proceeding voidable only, and not absolutely void, and such proceeding is amendable, or where the defect has been waived by the parties, there perjury may be committed. Maynard v. People, 135 Ill. 416, 25 N. E. 740. In this case perjury was assigned on testimony in a bastardy proceeding. The court conceded that the complaint in the bastardy proceeding did not show probable cause, and was insufficient to justify the issuance of a warrant, but held that the defendant, having elected to waive his right to quash the process or dismiss the complaint, and having gone to a hearing upon the merits and introduced testimony, perjury might be assigned on false testimony given by him, though perhaps his conduct would not such office, and duly qualifies and enters upon the discharge of his official duties, he is a de facto officer, and his acts are valid, notwithstanding the fact that he may not possess all the requisite qualifications as prescribed by the statute to fill such office. In Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 20, 25 L. ed. 314, the Supreme Court of the United States, in discussing this subject, said: "An officer de facto is not a mere usurper, nor yet within the sanction of law, but one who colore officii claims and assumes to exercise official authority, is reputed to have it, and the community acquiesces accordingly. Wilcox v. Smith, 5 Wend. 231, 21 Am. Dec. 213; Den ex dem. Gilliam v. Reddick, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 368; Brown v. Lunt, 37 Me. 423. Judicial as well as ministerial officers may be in this position. Freeman, Judgm. § 148. The acts of such officers are held to be valid because the public good requires it. The principle wrongs no one. A different rule would be a source of serious and lasting evils." In Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425, 30 L. ed. 178, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1121, Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court upon this subject, said: "Where an office exists under the law, it matters not how the appointment of the incumbent was made, so far as the validity of his acts are concerned. It is enough that he is clothed with the insignia of the office, and exercises its powers and functions. As said by Mr. Justice Manning, of the supreme court of Michigan, in Carleton v. People, 10 Mich. 250, 259: 'Where there is no office there can be no officer de facto, for the reason that there can be none de jure. The county offices existed, by virtue of the Constitution, the moment the new county was organized. No act of legislation was necessary for that purpose. And all that is required, when there is an office, to make an officer de facto, is that the individual claiming the office is in possession of it, performing its duties, and claiming to be such officer under color have estopped him from taking advantage of the defect in the bastardy proceeding itself.

In Henry v. Hamilton, 7 Blackf. 508, it was held that, even if an affidavit upon which a prosecution before a justice was based was too vague to require, or even to authorize, the justice to act upon it, it did not follow that, after he did act upon it, and after the accused person appeared and answered to the charge without objection, the proceedings were coram non iudice, so that perjury could not be assigned on false testimony therein. This statement, however, is qualified by the assumption that the affidavit charged in general terms an offense of which the justice had jurisdiction.

In Weston v. Lumley, 83 Ind. 486, the court, after expressing some doubt on the question, held that a county board of commissioners, which was a court of inferior and limited jurisdiction, acquired such jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a statutory proceeding to have a highway ascertained, described, and entered of record, as to make it legal perjury for a witness to swear falsely therein, although the petition did not show the existence of the circumstances which, under the statute, were necessary to enable the commissioners to have the road ascertained, described, and entered of record as prayed for by the petition. The court said that if the proceedings had taken place in a court of general jurisdiction there would have been no question of its jurisdiction, notwithstanding the defect in the petition.

In People v. McCaffrey, 75 Mich. 115, 42 N. W. 681, perjury was assigned upon an oath to a bill for divorce. It was held that the charge might be sustained, notwithstanding that the residence of one of the parties to the bill for divorce was essential to granting the relief sought therein, and that there was no such averment in the bill. The decision is upon the ground that the omission of such an averment was not a jurisdictional defect, and might be cured by amendment.

State v. Rowell, 72 Vt. 28, 47 Atl. 111, held that it was not a bar to an indictment for perjury charged to have been committed in a previous prosecution for perjury that the indictment upon which such prosecution was founded was quashed subsequently to the finding of the indictment in question for insufficiency in failing to allege that the writing to which the defendant was charged, in that case, to have sworn falsely, was one that the law required to be verified by oath. The decision is upon the ground that, notwithstanding the insufficiency of the former indictment, the trial court had power to hear and determine the cause, and, therefore, had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The court said that the case was not different in principle from one in which there is a mistrial by reason of error in the admission or rejection of evidence, or in instructions to the jury, or where judgment is arrested by reason of a defect in the declaration, in which cases it could not be seriously contended that false testimony did not constitute perjury.

Perjury may be committed upon the trial of a criminal proceeding in a police court although the complaint would be bad upon demurrer, or upon motion in arrest of judgment. State v. Brown, 68 N. H. 200, 38 Atl. 781.

Matters especially affecting sanction under which testimony is given.

Perjury cannot be predicated of false testimony in a statutory arbitration given under an oath administered by a notary public where the statute requires it to be administered by a judge or justice of the peace. State v. Jackson, 36 Ohio St. 281.

Perjury cannot be predicated of false testimony given under the sanction of an oath administered by arbitrators, appointed by the court, who had no authority to administer an oath. State v. McCroskey, 3 McCord, L. 308.

One of the primary elements requisite to constitute the offense of perjury is that the violated oath shall appear to have been administered by competent authority. The officer before whom the oath is taken must not only have jurisdiction in the proceeding, but the oath must be alleged and shown to have been administered by one having authority to administer it. And it is not sufficient that the officer may have had general power to administer oaths, but it must appear that he possessed authority to administer the oath in the particular proceeding involved. People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 50 Pac. 20. In this case the indictment for perjury was held to be demurrable because it appeared therefrom that the oath in the proceeding before the magistrate in which the perjury is alleged to have been committed was administered by an unauthorized deputy county clerk.

In State v. Dreifus, 38 La. Ann. 877, and of an election or appointment, as the case may be. It is not necessary his election or appointment should be valid, for that would make him an officer de jure. The official acts of such persons are recognized as valid on grounds of public policy, and for the protection of those having official business to transact." In a very recent case, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, in discussing this subject in Ex parte Ward, 173 U. S. 452, 43 L. ed. 765, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459, announced the following rule: "Where a court has jurisdiction of an offense and of the accused, and the proceedings are otherwise regular, a conviction is lawful, although the judge holding the court may be only an officer de facto; and the validity of the title of such judge to the office, or his right to exercise the judicial functions, cannot be determined on a writ of habeas corpus." The learned judge also declared in this case that "the title of a person acting with color of authority, even if he be not a good officer in point of law, cannot be collaterally attacked." Conceding that the probate judge who tried Martin for criminal libel and administered the oath to the appellant when the alleged false testimony was given, and upon which the perjury was assigned, was only a de facto officer, his acts while exercising the duties and functions of a probate court were valid; and his acts could only be attacked in a direct proceeding, and not in a collateral manner, as attempted in this case.

We have examined the record, and can perceive no error committed in the trial of this cause which could in any manner affect the substantial rights of the plaintiff in error.

The judgment of the District Court is therefore affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Barford, Ch. J., who presided in the court below, not sitting.

Stephens v. State, 1 Swan, 157, it was held that the fact that the oath was administered in the presence of the court by an incompetent person did not defeat a charge of perjury, but these decisions were upon the ground that the oath was in legal effect administered by the court itself.

In People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 50 Pac. 20, supra, it was held that the circumstances disclosed in the case would not admit of the position that the deputy who administered the oath was merely acting as the mouthpiece of the judge.

Perjury cannot be predicated of so much of the disclosure of a trustee as was not reduced to writing as required by statute. State v. Trask, 42 Vt. 152.

In Queen v. Lloyd, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 213, 56 L. J. M. C. N. S. 119, 56 L. T. N. S. 750, 35 Week. Rep. 653, 52 J. P. 86, 16 Cox, C. C. 235, it was held that perjury could not be assigned on an examination of a witness in a bankruptcy proceeding under § 27 of the bankruptcy act of 1883, which provides for an examination by "the court," where, though the oath was administered to the witness in court by the registrar, the examination took place in another room, in the absence of the registrar.

In State v. Moller, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 263, it was held that, the magistrate having jurisdiction of the matter in which the perjury is charged to have been committed, any irregularities in the mode of administering the oath could not oust the jurisdiction.

And in State v. Whisenhurst, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks) 458, it was held that the fact that one who had no conscientious scruples against being sworn by kissing the book, and who did not request that he be sworn with uplifted hand, was sworn in the latter manner, does not prevent perjury from being predicated of his testimony. This decision, however, is upon the ground that there was no error or irregularity in swearing the witness in that manner.

Matters relating to jury.

That the jury were not properly sworn in the case in which the perjury is charged to have been committed does not defeat the charge of perjury. Smith v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 815, 20 S. W. 707.

That the case in which perjury is charged to have been committed was tried by a jury of 54 L. R. A.

only six men does not defeat the charge of perjury. State v. Hall, 7 Blackf. 25. The decision is upon the ground that the irregularity was one which might be, and was, waived.

In United States v. Jackson, 9 Mackey, 424, it was held that perjury could not be assigned on the testimony given upon a trial before the police court of the District of Columbia on a charge of receiving stolen goods, where such trial was without a jury; but this decision was upon the ground that, under the statute defining the jurisdiction of such police court, it had no jurisdiction to try a charge of that character without a jury. The court says that this is a different question than the question whether one having the choice of being tried by a jury may waive a jury and submit to be tried by the court.

Summary.

The authorities thus reviewed seem to establish that want of jurisdiction to inquire into a matter at all is fatal to a charge of perjury, and this is true, at least at common law, even if the court had general jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but the jurisdiction had not attached in the particular case. In this connection, however, it is important to bear in mind that defects which in some cases, and under some circumstances, are deemed to deprive the court of jurisdiction of the particular proceeding, in other cases and under other circumstances are regarded as mere irregularities that may be waived. So, also, it is to be observed that, though the court may not, under the circumstances as developed in a particular case, have had jurisdiction to proceed to judgment, yet it may have had jurisdiction to take cognizance of the case in the first instance. So, also, a distinction has been made between a case where there was no jurisdiction and a case where the jurisdiction might have been, but was not, defeated by proof of extrinsic circumstances. Defects, errors, and irregularities not jurisdictional do not ordinarily defeat a charge of perjury. An exception, however, is to be made in case of serious defects directly affecting the sanction under which the alleged perjured evidence is given, unless such defects are to be regarded as jurisdictional and therefore as coming within the rule that jurisdictional defects will defeat a charge of perjury. CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

J. W. HYATT et al., Respts.

(132 Cal. 240.)

1. A railroad right of way is of such a public nature that title thereto cannot be acquired against the company by prescription or the running of the statute of limitations.
2. The name by which an action brought to establish title to a portion of a railroad right of way is designated is immaterial in determining the relief to be afforded, or whether the defense of prescription is available, where there is, under the statute, but one form of civil action, the character of which is determined by the substance of the complaint.

(March 16, 1901.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Placer County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of a portion of plaintiff's right of way. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John M. Fulweiler and Frederick B. Lake, for appellant:

By the act of Congress the grant of the right of way is a virtual dedication thereof to a public use as a public highway.

It necessarily involves a right of possession in the grantee, and is inconsistent with any adverse possession of any part of the land embraced within the grant.

Private persons cannot acquire by adverse possession title to highways, streets, squares, or other lands dedicated to such public uses.

Mr. William F. Herrin, with Messrs. William Singer, Jr., and C. B. Sessions, also for appellant:

There is no particular form necessary in the dedication of land to a public use. All that is requisite is the assent of the owner of the land, and the fact of its use for the public purpose intended by the appropriation.

Cal. Cont. art. 13, § 1, says: No property owned by the United States government, the state, or any municipal corporation within the state, is subject to taxation.

But the right of way belonging to the railroad is by § 10, art. 13, of the said Constitution made liable to taxation.

This is a declaration that the right of way belonging to a railroad company is not a "highway" in the sense that roads, streets, alleys, bridges, etc., are.

On petition for rehearing.

The congressional act of 1862, and that of 1864, amendatory thereof, contain two distinct grants. Since the grant of the odd sections is a grant in præsenti the legal title 54 L. R. A.

in fee vested in the railroad company eo instanti upon the filing of the map or plat of definite location in the local United States Land Office. But the grant of the right of way attached at no earlier date. It was fixed by the same act, i. e., the filing of the map of definite location.

Now § 2 of the act of 1862 granted the right of way where "it may pass over the public lands." But the odd sections, having been granted in præsenti to the railroad company, are not public lands. Hence no right of way is granted over these odd sections. The railroad company in selling these odd sections reserves a right of way 200 feet wide on either side of the center of its main track. Owning the title in fee to the entire odd sections granted by Congress, it holds the same as any other private owner would hold them; and limitation would run in favor of one claiming the same adversely, whether crossed by the "right of way" or not, except in so far as the use of the roadbed and right of way immediately adjoining it for railroad purposes by the railroad, possessio pedis, interfered with such adverse possession.

Calcasieu Lumber Co. v. Harris, 77 Tex. 18, 13 S. W. 453.

Messrs. Tuttle & Wright also for respondents.

Van Dyke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions involved in this appeal are:

- (1) Whether a railroad right of way is such a public use as to prevent the running of the statute of limitations, or the acquisition of an adverse title thereto by prescription.
- (2) In case of intrusion upon such right of way, is ejectment the proper remedy?

Respondent Hyatt entered upon and occupied, for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action, a portion of the right of way in Placer county granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company by act of Congress of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 480, chap. 120). The court finds that prior to 1867 the predecessor of the plaintiff constructed its line of railroad over said right of way, and plaintiff and its predecessor have ever since maintained its railroad over said right of way; that the defendant Hyatt has been in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession and occupancy of the property described in the complaint for more than five years previous to the commencement of the action, and has paid taxes thereon, and defendant Savage was the tenant of said Hyatt, but that plaintiff during said time has also paid all taxes levied and assessed upon said right of way. The court below held, as a conclusion of law from the facts found, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover possession of the premises in question, and from the judgment in favor of defendant the plaintiff appeals.

1. The questions involved are not new, but have been passed upon frequently in the courts of the United States, and in this state and other states. In San Francisco, A. & S. R. Co. v. Caldwell, 31 Cal. 371, this court says: "Whether the use of the property taken for the purposes of the railroad is a public use within the meaning of the Constitution, or the contrary, is involved in the question presented for consideration. But on this subject there is no room for controversy at this day, if respect is paid to the adjudications of the highest courts of the land. Railroads are esteemed as public highways, constructed for the advantage of the public,"—citing several authorities from other states. In Moran v. Ross, 79 Cal. 159, 21 Pac. 547, it is said: "Railways are a species of public highways, and as such have uniformly been held to be public improvements, to which the right of eminent domain attaches, although they may be constructed by private corporations or individuals, and operated for the emoluments to be derived therefrom by the operators,"—citing Mills, Em. Dom. § 14; Wood, Railway Law, § 226; and other cases. Southern P. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 279, 24 Pac. 1032, was an action like this, to recover possession of about 5 acres of land situated in Placer county, within and forming a part of the right of way granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company by the act of Congress referred to; citing from § 2 of that act, wherein the right of way is granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California for the construction of said railroad through the public lands, the plaintiff in that case, as in this, being the successor in interest of said grantee. The defendant in that case was the successor in interest of the party to whom a patent to the quarter section embracing the disputed premises was issued by the United States in December, 1880, and as such he claimed title in fee. The defendant had the land inclosed, and the plaintiff offered to allow him to maintain his inclosure, and use the land, on condition that he would accept a lease thereof, and pay a nominal rent, which he accepted; but at the expiration of the term of one year he refused to renew it, claiming the land as his own. After commenting upon some other cases, the court says: "Here there was a special grant of a right of way 200 feet in width on each side of the road. This grant is a conclusive legislative determination of the reasonable and necessary quantity of land to be dedicated to this public use, and it necessarily involves a right of possession in the grantee, and is inconsistent with any adverse possession of any part of the land embraced within the grant. It is true, the strip of land now actually occupied by the roadbed and telegraph line may be only a small part of the 400 feet granted, but this fact is of no consequence. The company may at some time want to use more land for side tracks or other purposes, and it is entitled to have the land clear and unobstructed whenever it shall have occasion to do so." In Olcott v. Fond du Lac County Supers. 16 Wall. 678, 21 L. ed. 382, the United States Supreme Court says: "That railroads, though constructed by private corporations and owned by them, are public highways, has been the doctrine of 54 L. R. A.

nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. Very early the question arose whether a state's right of eminent domain could be exercised by a private corporation created for the purpose of constructing a railroad. Clearly, it could not, unless taking land for such a purpose by such an agency is taking land for public use. The right of eminent domain nowhere justifies taking property for private use. Yet it is a doctrine universally accepted that a state legislature may authorize a private corporation to take land for the construction of such a road, making compensation to the owner. What else does this doctrine mean if not that building a railroad, though it be built by a private corporation, is an act done for a public use? And the reason why the use has always been held a public one is that such a road is a highway, whether made by the government itself or by the agency of corporate bodies, or even by individuals when they obtain their power to construct it from legislative grant. It would be useless to cite the numerous decisions to this effect which have been made in the state courts. . . . It is said that railroads are not public highways per se; that they are only declared such by the decisions of the courts; and that they have been declared public only with respect to the power of eminent domain. This is a mistake. In their very nature they are public highways. It needed no decision of courts to make them such. True, they must be used in their peculiar manner, and under certain restrictions, but they are facilities for passage and transportation afforded to the public, of which the public has a right to avail itself. As well might it be said a turnpike is a highway, only because declared such by judicial decision. A railroad built by a state no one claims would be anything else than a public highway, justifying taxation for its construction and maintenance, though it could be no more open to public use than is a road built and owned by a corporation; yet it is the purpose and the uses of a work which determine its character." In Venable v. Wabash Western R. Co. 112 Mo. 103, 18 L. R. A. 68, 20 S. W. 493, it was held that a conveyance to a railroad company of a right of way though the grantor's land is a dedication to the public. In the court opinion it is said: "There can be no doubt from the text-books and adjudications that, where a railroad is empowered, as in the present instance, to condemn land for a public use, it occupies in all respects the same footing as any other corporation or quasi corporation, municipal or otherwise, or governmental agency, when exercising similar authority, to obtain land for a market place, for a street, highway, jail, or courthouse." In St. Joseph & D. O. R. Co. v. Baldwin, 103 U. S. 426, 26 L. ed. 578, the court had under consideration the congressional railroad right of way grant above referred to. "The right of way for the whole distance of the proposed route was a very important part of the aid given. If the company could be compelled to purchase its way over any section that might be occupied in advance of its location, very serious obstacles would be often imposed to the progress of the road. For any loss of lands by settlement or reservation other lands are given, but for the loss of the right of way by these means no compensation is provided, nor could any be given by the substitution of another route. The uncertainty as to the ultimate location of the line of the road is recognized throughout the act, and where any qualification is intended in the operation of the grant of lands from this circumstance it is designated. Had a similar qualification upon the absolute grant of the right of way been intended, it can hardly be doubted that it would have been expressed. The fact that none is expressed is conclusive that none exists. . . . We are of opinion, therefore, that all persons acquiring any portion of the public lands, after the passage of the act in question, took the same subject to the right of way conferred by it for the proposed road." Jones on Easements lays down the rule that the prescriptive right to a passageway along the track or right of way of a railroad cannot be acquired by the public, or by individuals, while the railroad is constantly using a single track over such right of way. The construction and operation of one track on its location is an assertion of right to the entire width of its right of way. The presence of one track, constantly in use, is a definite badge of ownership, and the only practical assertion of title that can be made. If the public has used paths by the side of the railroad track for any length of time, the use must be considered as permissive, and not adverse; citing a long list of authorities from different states. Jones, Easements, p. 232, §§ 2, 81. Individuals may intrude upon or obstruct the public thoroughfare, but cannot acquire title by prescription to such lands. Orena v. Santa Barbara, 91 Cal. 631, 28 Pac. 268; Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265; Visalia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 435, 52 Am. Rep. 303, 4 Pac. 433; People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 450; San Francisco v. Bradbury, 92 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 803; Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 51, 16 L. R. A. 145, 28 Pac. 839.

2. Respondents counsel contend that, "if the appellant can maintain the present action [ejectment] at all, then the plea of the bar of the statute is good." And he cites in support of this contention Allen v. McKay & Co. 120 Cal. 332, 52 Pac. 828, wherein it is claimed the court held that, if the title to the lands in question was such as to found thereon an action to recover the possession of the same, such title may be lost by adverse possession. That was an action to recover possession of a tract of land in Humboldt county covered by the waters of Humboldt bay, and the court says: "If the land in controversy was not private property, plaintiffs had no title. If it was private property, there certainly could be an adverse occupancy of it for the statutory period." The difference between that and this is that the contest there was in reference to the ownership and possession of private property. Here, as already shown, the premises in question were granted for, and dedicated to, a public use. There is but one form of civil action in this state. The substance of the action determines its character. Being entitled to the possession of the premises in question as a part of the railroad right of way under the congressional grant for the purposes therein specified, and the defendants having intruded thereupon and withholding the same, the plaintiff has a right to recover the possession thereof by any appropriate action; and whether that action be called "ejectment," or by any other name, is quite immaterial. Central P. R. Co. v. Benity, 5 Sawy. 118, Fed. Cas. No. 2,551, was an action in ejectment by the railroad company against the defendant therein for a portion of the railroad right of way acquired under the grant in question. The court there says: "If the plaintiff is entitled to actual possession of the land for the purpose of effecting the object in view when the right of way was granted, it can recover such possession in some judicial proceeding. The mere form of the action has ceased to be of any importance in this court. There is now but one form for all common-law actions. . . . We think this complaint does state a good case. It may be admitted that for the obstruction of a mere easement the recovery of the possession of the land itself would not be the proper remedy. But, in order that the plaintiff in the case at bar may make such use of the land as the grantor intended it should under the grant of a right of way, it becomes necessary to take and keep an actual possession of the land." Southern P. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 279, 24 Pac. 1032, was also an action at law to recover possession of a portion of the railroad right of way in question. As already shown, the court held that that action was not only maintainable but that the statute of limitation did not run against the right of the plaintiff therein. Visalia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 435, 52 Am. Rep. 303, 4 Pac. 433, was also an action of ejectment, and the court in passing says: "An action of ejectment may be maintained by a municipal corporation for the recovery of the possession of a street wrongfully possessed by an individual, whether the corporation owns the fee or the adjoining proprietor retains it. In the latter case the right of the municipality to regulate the public use, and, for that purpose, to possess, use, and control the property, is treated by the courts as a legal, and not merely an equitable, right,"—citing authorities; and adding: "But it does not follow that such an action is barred by an adverse possession for a statutory period;" and referring to San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 589, 91 Am. Dec. 542, where it seems to have been held that ejectment would be barred, the court says: "But in that case it was found that the 'slip' had never been dedicated to the public use,"—referring, as against that case, to Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265, and People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 450. San Francisco v. Bradbury, 92 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 803, was ejectment to recover the possession of an engine lot reserved to the city under the Van Ness ordinance. See also the later case of San Francisco v. Grote, 120 Cal. 60, 41 L. R. A. 335, 52 Pac. 127.

For the reasons stated, the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: Garowette, J., Harrison, J.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

William ELY et al., Respts.

1. The statute of limitations runs against a right of action to recover possession of a portion of a railroad right of way in adverse possession of a third person.
2. A railroad company cannot set up the rights of the government to defeat a title acquired through adverse possession by a third person to a portion of its right of way.
3. A railroad company is estopped to assert title to a portion of its right of way upon which third persons have, with its knowledge, placed valuable improvements under a claim of title from the government, and in possession of which they have been for a period exceeding that designated by the statute of limitations for the recovery of real property, and the streets upon which were located with reference to others established by the railroad company

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of portions of plaintiff's right of way which were held adversely by defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. W. Bunn and James B. Kerr, with Messrs. Stephens & Bunn, for appellant:

The act of Congress conferred upon the company the right to locate its route, and granted a right of way over the public lands 400 feet wide,—200 feet on each side of the railroad.

Proof that the premises in controversy over which the road was constructed were public lands on July 2, 1864, established the title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company under the grant.

The estate which passed under this grant is more than a technical "right of way" or easement, and is a qualified fee with the incidents of possession and exclusive use and enjoyment of the whole strip granted.

Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Roberts, 152 U. S. 114, 38 L. ed. 377, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 496; New Mexico v. United States Trust Co. 172 U. S. 171, 43 L. ed. 407, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128.

The grant of right of way was conferred upon the Northern Pacific Railroad Company by Congress to enable it to perform the duties which it owed the public under its charter, and the company had no power to part with any portion of the right of way so granted and charged by the act of Congress with a public use.

East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe ex dem. Vischer, 114 U. S. 340, 29 L. ed. 136, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 869; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950; Northern P. R. Co. v. Smith, 171 U. The doctrine of estoppel does not apply where rights are claimed under an agreement with a corporation, which is ultra vires and at the same time against public policy.

Messrs. Samuel R. Stern and Frederick W. Dewart, for respondent Ely:

Government grants are construed against the grantee.

When the railroad was first built through Spokane the railroad company construed its grant as being only 200 feet in width.

The construction given to the contract by the parties themselves is naturally entitled to great weight, where parties later desire to change their claims.

Whether the interest of plaintiff is an easement, with the right to exclusive possession and use, or a fee qualified and limited to certain uses, each of these may be lost by adverse possession, unless there is something in plaintiff's condition by reason of which the statute of limitations would not apply.

The statute of limitations does not "presume a grant by the true owner."

3 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 134.

The government gave to respondent's predecessors all the rights and interests in the property which the government possessed.

They took the property subject to the right of way given by the previous grant.

Mr. F. T. Post, for respondents Brown et al.:

A railway company owes certain duties to the public, but it holds and uses its property for the profit of its stockholders. The cases holding that the statute of limitations affords no defense to actions for encroachment upon streets and roads are inapplicable. A railroad is not a public highway in the sense that it belongs to the people. Railroad officers are not governmental agents whose laches creates no bar.

If one occupies adversely for twenty years land owned by a railway company, the statute of limitations should raise the presumption of a grant, for the company holds its lands for private gain, as a private proprietor.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the Northern Pacific Railway Company, successor to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, to recover possession of certain portions of its right of way in the county of Spokane. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of a strip of land 400 feet wide, and that defendants had wrongfully entered thereon, and judgment was demanded for the removal of a cloud, for the quieting of title to the lands mentioned in the complaint, and for the possession of same. Separate answers were interposed by many of the defendants, separate trials had, and separate verdicts rendered. A single judgment, however, was rendered, determining all the issues in the case.

It may be conceded, we think, that the right of way which embraces the land in dispute was granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company by act of Congress in 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 365, chap. 217), and that to the title to the right of way thus granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company the Northern Pacific Railway Company has succeeded. It may also be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the Northern Pacific Railway Company has complied with all the terms and provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, and has constructed its railroad through the whole of the line of road between the points named in the granting act; that a map of definite location was filed October 4, 1880, prior to the acquiring of the title to the land in question by the defendants or their predecessors or grantors; and that said railroad has been continuously operated since its construction. The defendants, answering, claim title by patent from the United States government. The land was acquired under the pre-emption and homestead acts, respectively, and all the defendants or their grantors have been in quiet, peaceful, undisturbed, and undisputed possession of said land for more than ten years immediately prior to the commencement of this action, many of them for nearly twenty years. Valuable improvements have been made by the defendants, the said land consisting of town lots in the city of Spokane, and having been platted and laid out as additions to the city of Spokane by the defendants or their grantors after acquiring title to the same from the United States government. During all these years no claim whatever to these lands has been made by the appellant. It has stood by and seen improvements made thereon, and, in the case of defendant Brown, an agreement was entered into between him and Gen. Sprague, who was then the general superintendent of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, that they would plat their lots so that the streets of the addition which the railroad company was dedicating would correspond with and meet the streets which Brown was dedicating to the city of Spokane, and the agreement was carried out by arranging the streets in accordance therewith. These streets have been used by the public for from ten to eighteen years. The testimony shows that, in addition to the improvements which these defendants have made upon their lots, many thousands of dollars have been paid by them for assessments levied upon abutting land for the improvement of streets running through this right of way; that the appellant has never paid these assessments; that they have never been assessed to the appellant; and that no question has ever been raised by the appellant as to the right and obligation of the defendants to pay the same. While the record does not show that any of the lands owned by the defendants were deeded to them by the appellant, it does show that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company has deeded to other parties lots in the city of Spokane situated within the 400 feet of right of way, upon which valuable improvements have been made by its grantees.

The questions involved in this case are: (1) Adverse possession of respondents; (2) that the action was barred by the statute of limitations; (3) equitable estoppel by the laches and misconduct of appellant. The questions of fact were put in issue by the pleadings, were submitted to a jury, and found in favor of the several defendants, and the court upon said findings entered its decree declaring the title of said lands to be in the defendants. Under our statute, the right to commence an action of this kind is barred after ten years' possession on the part of the defendants, and it may be conceded that the bar is effectual in this case if the statute of limitations runs against the appellant. It is contended by the appellant that it does not, and there is considerable discussion on the proposition of whether the interest of the company in this right of way is merely an easement, or whether it is possessed of a fee-simple title. As we view the law, however, these questions are immaterial; for, if the statute runs in one instance, it would in the other. It is the contention of the appellant that the statute does not run against it, for the reason that the right of way is granted in the interest of the public, and that it would be against public policy to allow the company to alienate its right of way, thereby depriving it of the power to carry on the business in aid of which the franchise was granted, and that it must necessarily follow that, if the company could not alienate its lands, public policy would equally prevent an alienation through process of law; that the statute of limitations presupposes a grant by the true owner; and the appellant's predecessor having been the true owner, and the title to the land having been acquired by the defendants subsequent to the acquiring of title by the appellant, that no grant by the true owner had ever been made, and consequently that the statute of limitations did not apply. The statute of limitations, we think, is not based upon such a thought, but is purely and essentially a statute of repose, in the interest of the stability of titles and of good morals. One holding land adversely to the rights of another can be divested only by the action of the other, even with a better right, within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, and this is true, even though he may have originally entered under a void grant or sale. But his claim ripens into a perfect title, and becomes absolute, if such possession is not disturbed within the time prescribed. As is said by 3 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 164: "The operation of the statute takes away the title of the real owner, and transfers it, not in form, indeed, but in legal effect, to the adverse occupant. In other words, the statute of limitations gives a perfect title. The doctrine is stated thus strongly, because it seems to be the result of modern decisions, although it was once held that the effect of the statute was merely to take away the remedy, and did not bind the estate or transfer the title." That the statute of limitations is a statute of repose has been decided by all modern authority, including many decisions from this court. See Wickham v. Sprague, 18 Wash. 466, 61 Pac. 1055. There are no exceptions under our statute, and it must apply to the case at bar, unless the appellant's right to commence the action is guaranteed by some higher authority. The statute is as follows: Section 4796, 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes. "Actions can only be commenced within the periods herein prescribed after the cause of action shall have accrued. . . ." Section 4797: ". . . Within ten years, (1) actions for the recovery of real property, or for the recovery or the possession thereof; and no action shall be maintained for such recovery unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seized or possessed of the premises in question within ten years before the commencement of the action."

It will be observed that this case does not involve in any manner a construction of the act of Congress incorporating the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, or the granting to the company of its right of way. Neither is this an action against the company, as many of the actions are which are cited by the appellant. There is no attempt here to bind the company by an ultra vires agreement, but the attempt is on the part of the company to repudiate executed contracts and rights which have grown up through the laches, negligence, and direct agreements of the company. Neither is this an action where the court has attempted to determine how much of the right of way was necessary for the railway company to use in operating its road, but it was a determination of the fact of how much of the right of way the railroad company had abandoned, and how much of the right of way, according to its own determination, it did not need for the purpose of operating its road, and how much it could abandon without defeating the purpose for which the grant was made. Of the cases cited by appellant, the strongest one favoring its contention, and the only one, therefore, which it is necessary for us to notice, is Northern P. R. Co. v. Smith, 171 U. S. 260, 43 L. ed. 157, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 794; and it is claimed by the appellant that in this case the rule was clearly announced that the company could not abandon any portion of its right of way. There are some expressions used by the court in this case which give plausibility to appellant's contention, but there are so many different propositions involved in the case that it is hard to tell upon what exact proposition the case was decided. Great stress seems to have been placed by the court upon the defect in Smith's deed, and an examination of the cases cited by the court shows that the exact question raised in this case was not involved or considered seriously in that, although it was decided in that case that the court had no right to determine the question of how many feet had been used and occupied for railroad purposes by the company, and that it was entitled to the number of feet that were granted to it by the government. The concluding remark of the court is as follows: "The precise character of the business carried on by such tenants is not disclosed to us, but we are permitted to presume that it is consistent with the public duties and purposes of the railroad company, and, at any rate, a forfeiture for misuser could not be enforced in a private action,"—a proposition which certainly cannot be controverted. But in that case the company was in possession of the lands sought to be obtained by Smith, the allegation being that it had been, more than six years prior to the commencement of the action, in possession of the premises. So that no question of adverse possession and user or of the statute of limitations was involved, and we do not think that the Supreme Court of the United States, notwithstanding some expressions which are made in this case and which were not necessary for its determination, would, under the circumstances of this case, deprive these defendants of their homes and property where a title had been obtained through the government, and where, by consent, agreement, and acquiescence of the company, time and money had been expended in their improvement during all these years of quiet and undisputed possession. If the doctrine of estoppel can ever be invoked, it seems to us that it should be invoked in this case against the appellant. In any event, the question of protecting the rights of the government is not one which can be raised by the appellant. If the rights of the government are in any way involved or jeopardized by the possession of these lands by the defendants, the government may act in the premises unaided by the appellant, whose negligence and laches have been the cause of these investments by the defendants. The appellant should not be allowed to escape the consequences of its own wrongful acts, and reap a fraudulent benefit, by pleading the rights of the government. Indeed, our government is presumably founded upon equitable principles, not in theory alone, but in practice, and the citizen has a right to expect equitable treatment, even at the hands of the government; and it has been held that in good conscience the government is frequently estopped from asserting rights which would destroy the equitable rights of the citizen. In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Janesville Water Co. 92 Wis. 496, 32 L. R. A. 391, 66 N. W. 512, it was held that leave would not be granted to the state to institute an action to forfeit the franchises of a solvent, active corporation, carrying out the purposes of its creation in supplying the necessities of a large number of people, whose securities are held by innocent persons, in the absence of a clear, wilful misuse, abuse, or nonuse of its franchises. In that case the court quotes from Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Bala & B. M. Turnp. Co. 153 Pa. 47, 25 Atl. 1105, where the court held that, in case of delay accompanied by circumstances which would estop individuals, the state was equally estopped. There the circumstances showed that a corporation had been allowed to proceed and expend large sums of money when the facts relied upon in the application for leave to bring the action to forfeit the franchises were notorious. Held, that the delay, under the circumstances, created an estoppel so as to effectually prevent the institution of such proceedings. The court, in effect, said: If the complainant were a private individual, the court would not hesitate to say that his laches were a bar, and the same rule holds good notwithstanding the application is by the attorney general on behalf of the state. The question involved is not one under the statute of limitations, but one of laches, which may be imputed to the state as well as to an individual. While time does not run against the state, time, together with other elements, may make up a species of fraud, and estop even sovereignty from exercising its legal rights.—citing Willmott v. Barber, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 105; Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 2 Wils. Ch. 102; Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 1. The court, concluding, said: "The principles here maintained should be quite rigidly applied where, as in this case, the corporation has not merely been allowed, but has been compelled, by those chiefly interested and the real moving parties, to proceed at great expense, under the franchises sought to be annulled, for a considerable period of time, while the facts relied upon as grounds for forfeiture have been all well known."

This language might be appropriately applied to the facts in this case, and could as well be applied to the individual defendants here as to corporate defendants there; for these defendants have not only been allowed to possess these lots, but the title to them has been conveyed to them by the government of the United States after a compliance on their part with the requirements of the law in relation to pre-emption and homestead claims, and after, in addition to the expense and time necessarily involved in obtaining title under these acts from the government, the expenditure of many thousands of dollars in creating permanent improvements on these lands, and in paying many thousands of dollars' assessments for the improvement of streets, in addition to other taxes for the benefit of the government, with the knowledge and acquiescence, and in some cases the actual agreement, of the appellant. It is also held in Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Bala & B. M. Turnp. Co. 153 Pa. 47, 25 Atl. 1105, that where a turnpike company is allowed, without objection, to expend a large amount of money in extending its road, under authority of a decree of court, a commonwealth is estopped to question the regularity of the proceedings under which such authority was granted. There again the court said: "In England, from whence we derived the great body of common law, and most of our principles in equity, it is well settled that, while time will not run against the Crown, yet time, together with other elements, may make up a species of fraud, and estop even sovereignty from exercising its legal rights,"—citing Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 2 Wils. Ch. 102, where there was an attempt on behalf of the Crown to restrain a purpresture in the river Thames, and the court refused to entertain the bill because of the delay on the part of the attorney general in instituting the proceeding. Citing, also, Atty. Gen. v. Sheffield Gas-Consumers' Co. 3 De G., M. & G. 304. See also Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 631.

As showing that the rule that the company cannot alienate any part of its right of way is not to be literally construed, it has been decided that a railroad company to which Congress has granted a right of way across the public lands and sections of lands adjoining such right of way, in aid of the construction of its road, has power to dedicate to the public the right to cross its tracks and right of way. Northern P. R. Co. v. Spokane, 12 C. C. A. 246, 29 U. S. App. 81, 64 Fed. 506. On the proposition that, when a corporation has made contracts in violation of its powers, the validity of such contracts can be questioned only by the government, see Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621; 25 L. ed. 188. No case is cited by the appellant which holds that a railway company may not lose a part of its right of way by adverse possession, by abandonment or estoppel, and we do not think that any case can be found which advances those propositions, but many courts have held the reverse. In Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Stickle, 155 Ind. 312, 58 N. E. 192, it was held by the supreme court of Indiana that adverse possession, acquired in by the company for the statutory period, prevented a recovery, and we cannot do better than insert a portion of the opinion of the court in that case: "Appellant finally insists that land acquired by a railway company for right of way or station purposes cannot be taken from it by adverse possession, because a railroad is a public highway, and because the statute forbids interference with the company's exclusive use. A railway company owes certain duties to the public, but it holds and uses its property for the profit of its stockholders. The cases holding that the statute of limitations affords no defense to actions for encroachment upon streets and roads are inapplicable. A railroad is not a public highway in the sense that it belongs to the people. Railroad officers are not governmental agents whose laches creates no bar. It is true that, for reasons of public policy, a judgment creditor will not be permitted to destroy a railroad by cutting it into parcels on execution sales, if the company resists.

... If a company voluntarily disable itself to perform its duties to the public, its charter may be forfeited. But there is no reason why a railway company should not be permitted to dispose of land it does not need in fulfilling its public duties, or why, if it disposes of land it does need, it should not be compelled, if it wishes to avoid a forfeiture of its charter, to reacquire the land by purchase or condemnation. It is true that the statute entitles a railway company to take land in fee, and forbids interference with the company's exclusive use. But the right to the exclusive use (which is an incident to every unqualified ownership) must be asserted. If one occupies adversely for twenty years land owned by a railway company, the statute of limitations should raise the presumption of a grant; for the company holds its lands for private gain, as a private proprietor. The state confers the power of eminent domain to enable railway companies to perform efficiently their duties as common carriers. But it is not apparent why the state should be concerned in preventing investors in railway stocks from sustaining loss through the negligence of their agents,"—citing Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houghton, 126 Ill. 233, 1 L. R. A. 213, 18 N. E. 301; Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Connor, 154 Ill. 550, 30 N. E. 563; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Moore, 160 Ill. 9, 43 N. E. 364; Donahue v. Illinois C. R. Co. 165 Ill. 640, 46 N. E. 714; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wakefield, 173 Ill. 564, 50 N. E. 1002; Matthews v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 110 Mich. 170, 67 N. W. 1111; Bobbett v. South-Eastern R. Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 424; Norton v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 268; Erie & N. R. Co. v. Rousseau, 17 Ont. App. Rep. 483. In Matthews v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 110 Mich. 170, 67 N. W. 1111, it was held that, after a right to use land as part of its right of way had been granted to a railroad company, and such company fenced its right of way excluding such land, and thereafter the grantor conveyed the land to the plaintiff, who inclosed the same and used it for crops and pasturage, openly and continuously, without the assent of the company, for more than fifteen years, the plaintiff acquired title by adverse possession. To the same effect are numerous other cases. In fact, it seems to be the universal authority. The case of Northern Counties Invest. Trust v. Enyard (Wash.) 64 Pac. 516, cited in appellant's reply brief in support of the position that possession for more than the statutory time on a railroad right of way was not adverse, but permissive, shows, on examination, that the circumstances surrounding it were altogether different from the circumstances surrounding the case at bar. Under the circumstances of that case it was held that the occupancy of a portion of the right of way of the railroad company by the owner of a servient estate was not inconsistent with the easement, the occupation there being for the purposes of farming the land embraced in the right of way. We do not desire to extend the rule enunciated in that case. But, whether or not the facts in that case warranted the conclusion reached by the court, certainly the circumstances shown by the record in this case will not justify the conclusion reached in that, that the occupancy of the defendants, taken in connection with the improvements and the use to which the improvements were put, was not inconsistent with the appellant's right to use the same for railroad purposes. In consideration of all the circumstances surrounding this case, and of the underlying principles governing rights and remedies, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

Frank DORAN, Resp.,
v.

City of SEATTLE, Appt.

(.....Wash.....)

The statute of limitations does not begin to run against all actions for injuries to adjoining property, growing out of the negligent erection by a municipality of a bulkhead so as to constitute a continuing nuisance, at the time of its completion, but damages may be recovered for injuries which have accrued within the statutory period before the commencement of the action, although more than the statutory period has elapsed since the completion of the work.

(March 7, 1901.)

NOTE.—The question of the effect of the statute of limitations in case of a continuing nuisance is involved with that of the right to bring successive actions for successive injuries caused by such nuisances, as to which see also Aldworth v. Lynn (Mass.) 10 L. R. A. 210; Watts v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (W. Va.) 23 L. R. A. 674; and Kidley v. Seabold & R. Co. (N. C.) 32 L. R. A. 708.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property by the alleged negligent construction by defendant of a bulkhead. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. E. Humphrey and Edward Von Tobel, for appellant:

This is not the case of a nuisance. It is the case of a negligent improvement of a street. The improvement was in itself rightful and legal but the manner in which the improvement was made was wrongful.

The wrong in negligently grading the street is the basis of the action, for there are no facts alleged constituting a nuisance. It is not a nuisance to do what the law authorizes, but it may be a tort to do the authorized act in a negligent manner.

North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 314, 2 N. E. 821.

Messrs. John F. Dore, John W. Kelley, James F. McCafferty, and J. S. Mulvey, for respondent:

The injury was continuing, and the damage sustained within six months immediately prior to the giving notice to the defendant. This brings the case squarely within the law applicable to continuing trespasses and nuisances, and the construction of the statutes of limitation relating thereto.

Ulline v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 53 Am. Rep. 123, note, 4 N. E. 536; Nashville v. Comar, 88 Tenn. 415, 7 L. R. A. 465, 12 S. W. 1027; Prentiss v. Wood, 132 Mass. 486; Wells v. New Haven & N. Co. 151 Mass. 46, 23 N. E. 724.

Where a trespass is continuous, each continuance is a new trespass and an invasion of the plaintiff's right from day to day; and he may select his own time for bringing an action therefor.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Frank Doran, alleges that the defendant, the city of Seattle, negligently constructed a bulkhead in front of his premises, and on account of such negligence the bulkhead pressed against and injured his house. This suit was begun on the 24th day of January, 1898. The plaintiff's claim for damages was filed on the 13th day of September, 1897. On the trial, after the plaintiff had introduced his evidence, motion for nonsuit was made by defendant and denied by the court. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The question involved in this appeal is in relation to the statute of limitations, and that question is raised by the following instructions asked by the defendant: "The plaintiff can have but one cause of action for damages under the facts of this case, and in the one action the plaintiff is entitled to recover for all damages, if at all, sustained by him, both past and prospective. The cause of action, if any, accrued to the plaintiff at the time of the first damages—no matter how small they may have been—that he sustained; and unless a claim for past and prospective damages was presented to the city council and filed with the clerk of the defendant within six months after the time the cause of action accrued, and the action was commenced within two years after the first damages were sustained, there can be no recovery, and your verdict must be for the defendant." "The statute requires actions for damages such as are claimed in the complaint to be commenced within two years after the right of action has accrued. If you find that the damages accrued to plaintiff's property more than two years before the commencement of this action, no matter how small that damage may have been, then the whole claim is barred by the statute of limitations, and your verdict must be for the defendant. The law will not permit the plaintiff to split his cause of action, and to recover by piecemeal; but he must recover, if at all, for all damages, past and prospective, in one single action." These instructions the court refused to give, but instructed as follows: "If you believe, from a preponderance of the evidence in this case, that in building and maintaining the bulkhead in question the defendant has not used such care as ordinarily prudent city officials, having similar work in charge, generally exercise in erecting and maintaining entirely similar bulkheads, and that through such failure the house of plaintiff was, within six months immediately prior to the giving of this notice of claim of plaintiff to defendant, injured by the gradual sliding of said bulkhead, then your verdict will be for plaintiff in one such gross sum as will, in your opinion, from the evidence, just compensate plaintiff for such injury as so accrued within said six months immediately prior to the filing of said plaintiff's claim with defendant." It is insisted by the appellant that according to the instructions given by the court, the statute of limitations began to run from the time the injury ceased, and not from the time the right of action accrued; that the case was tried upon this theory, which was an erroneous one.

Passing the question of the legality of the statute in relation to the presentation of claims before the commencement of the action and within a certain time after the damages had occurred, we will proceed to the main question involved, which is decisive of the case, granting, for the sake of argument, that the filing of the claim was necessary. There are a few cases which support the theory of defendant that the statute of limitations begins to run from the inception of the injury. In Powers v. Council Bluffs, 45 Iowa, 652, 24 Am. Rep. 792, it was held that whenever a nuisance is of such a character that its continuance is necessarily an injury, and when it is of a permanent character, that will continue without change from any cause but human labor, then the damage is an original damage, and may be at once fully compensated. In Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177, the same doctrine was announced, although in that case it was held that if the act done was not necessarily injurious, or if it was contingent whether further injury would arise, the plaintiff could recover damages only to the date of his writ. In this connection it might be said that it would be difficult to tell in the case at bar whether the injury would continue, and, if so, to what extent. In Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. 107 Mass. 352, it was held that a judgment against a railroad corporation for damages, not limited to those actually suffered at the date of the writ, for locating and constructing their road on the bank of a river, so as to divert its course and cause it to wash away the plaintiff's land, is a bar to a like action by him against them for subsequent damages from the same cause. But it will be observed that in this case the decision was placed upon the ground that the damages in the other case had not been limited to those suffered at the date of the writ, and the rule contended for by the appellant cannot be said to have been adopted in Massachusetts, as, in the subsequent case of Prentiss v. Wood, 132 Mass. 486, it is held that an action for damages sustained within six years by the wrongful continuance of a dam is not barred by the statute of limitations, although the dam was erected without right more than six years before the date of the writ; the court in that case saying: "The ground taken by the defendants, that these suits are barred by the statute of limitations, cannot be maintained. A person who continues a nuisance is liable to successive suits, each continuance being a new nuisance; and therefore the plaintiff in these actions is entitled to recover for all damages accruing after the award above referred to, it being within six years of the date of his writs,"—citing Hodges v. Hodges, 5 Met. 205. The same doctrine was announced in Wells v. New Haven & N. Co. 151 Mass. 46, 23 N. E. 724, and the question of permanency, upon which some of the courts have distinguished the cases, was discussed as follows: "If the defendant's act was wrongful at the outset, as the jury have found, we see no way in which the continuance of its structure in its wrongful form could become rightful, as against the plaintiff, unless by release or grant, by prescription, or by the payment of damages. If originally wrongful, it has not become rightful merely by being built in an enduring manner." And the court noticed the decision in Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. 107 Mass. 352, and distinguished it from the case it was then deciding by saying: "The plaintiff [in that case] had brought a former action in which he expressly declared for prospective damages, and he was allowed by the court to recover them, apparently without any objection on this ground from the defendant; and if he had been allowed to hold his second verdict he would have got double damages, which clearly was not permissible. The decision of that case does not necessarily imply that an action must have been brought within six years, or, if it does, we cannot follow it."

The case upon which appellant largely relies is that of North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 314, 2 N. E. 821, and the opinion, having been written by Judge Elliott, who is recognized by the bar of this country as a learned author and jurist, demands particular attention. In that case it was squarely held that in an action for injury to real estate caused by the negligence of corporation officers in constructing a public work of a permanent character, as the grading of a street, all damages, past and prospective, can be recovered in one action; that they must be recovered in one suit; and that for fresh damages resulting from the original wrong a second action cannot be maintained. A very vigorous opinion is written in that case, but, with due deference to the eminent judge who wrote the opinion, we are inclined to think that both reason and authority concur in overruling the rule there announced. In Uline v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 53 Am. Rep. 123, note, 4 N. E. 536, where an elaborate and painstaking investigation of this question was indulged in, and the authorities collated, it was decided that where a railroad is unlawfully constructed in a street, in an action by an adjacent owner to recover damages, he is entitled to recover simply the damages thereafter sustained up to the commencement of the action, and that for any damages thereafter sustained other actions might be brought successively until the nuisance should be abated. In the discussion of this question Judge Earl, who wrote the opinion for the court, in noticing the case of North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 314, 2 N. E. 821, and after discriminating that case to a certain extent from the one in question, said: "But the case is also inferentially authority for the second ground of error upon which I have based my conclusion. . . . But I am of opinion that that decision is clearly unsound as to the precise question adjudged. What right was there to assume that the street would be left permanently in a negligent condition and then hold that the plaintiff could recover damages upon the theory that the carelessness would forever continue? A municipality or a railroad corporation under proper authority may erect an embankment in a street, and, if the work be carefully and skilfully done, it cannot be made liable for the consequential damages to adjacent property. But, if it be carelessly and unskilfully done, it can be made liable. It may cease to be careless, or remedy the effects of its carelessness, and it may apply the requisite skill to the embankment; and this it may do after its carelessness and unskilfulness, and the consequent damages, have been established by a recovery in an action. The moment an action has been commenced, shall the defendant in such a case be precluded from remedying its wrong? Shall it be so precluded after a recovery against it? Does it establish the right to continue to be a wrongdoer forever by the payment of the recovery against it? Shall it have no benefit by discontinuing the wrong and shall it not be left the option to discontinue it? And shall the plaintiff be obliged to anticipate his damages with prophetic ken, and foresee them long before—it may be many years before—they actually occur, and recover them all in his first action? I think it is quite absurd and illogical to assume that a wrong of any kind will forever be continued, and that the wrongdoer will not discontinue or remedy it, and that the convenient and just rule, sanctioned by all the authorities in this state and by the great weight of authority elsewhere, is to permit recoveries in such cases by successive actions until the wrong or nuisance shall be terminated or abated." And it may be added that, under the logic of the doctrine announced in the Indiana case, the wrongdoer might, by the payment of prospective damages, actually become permanently possessed of real property which, under the theory of the law, can only be taken by corporations under the provisions of the law in relation to eminent domain. In addition to this, the rule is inequitable, in that the damages in the first instance and before the statute of limitations expires may be so trifling that it would not justify litigation. It would be inequitable, and not in accordance with good morals, to estop a person from obtaining his rights or damages for injuries which might eventually become burdensome because he was not litigious enough to plunge into a lawsuit over a trifling matter.

It is said by the appellant that the cases cited above are not in point, for the reason that the wrongs committed were nuisances; but an examination of all the many cases on this subject shows that they are treated in all instances as nuisances when they are wrong, and that the construction of that which is originally legal and right, if wrongfully constructed and maintained, may become a nuisance. Under the title, Trespasses Resulting in Continuing Nuisances, it is said, in 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 17: "The rule here is a combination of the two rules just given. The institution of the wrong is treated as a trespass, while the continuance of it is treated as a nuisance. The damages for the original act of trespass are all to be recovered in the first action, but successive actions must be brought to recover for damages for the continuation of the wrongful conditions, and in these the damages are estimated only to the date of the bringing of each suit." In Aldworth v. Lynn, 153 Mass. 53, 10 L. R. A. 210, 26 N. E. 229, the rule of continuing damages was announced; the contention of the plaintiff in that case being that, if the damages resulted from a cause which was either permanent in its character or which was treated as permanent by the parties, it was proper that the entire damages should be assessed with reference to past and probable futures. The attorney in that case cited Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. 107 Mass. 352, and Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; and the court in its opinion said: "So far as there are intimations in the successive opinions in Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. which seem to make the case an authority for the plaintiff's contention in the case at bar we are not inclined to follow them." In Nashville v. Omar, 88 Tenn. 415, 7 L. R. A. 465, 12 S. W. 1027, it was held that damages for an alleged negligent construction of a sewer, in consequence of which plaintiff's premises are injured by discharge therefrom, must be limited to the actual damage sustained up to the time of bringing suit, and cannot include prospective damages on the ground that the defects are permanent, although human labor will be necessary to remedy the defects. In this case the same cases were cited, viz., Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. W. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177, and Powers v. Council Bluffs, 45 Iowa, 652, 24 Am. Rep. 792, to sustain the doctrine that all the damages must be included in one suit; and the court, in passing upon that question, after laying down the rule that damages could be assessed only up to the time of the writ, and after reviewing the arguments in the cases cited to sustain the opposite contention, among other things said: "This seems to us an artificial and arbitrary test. There are supposable nuisances which by the effect of time might at last abate themselves; but by far the greater number of trespasses, wrongs, and nuisances would continue indefinitely, without the expenditure of human labor to remove or abate them. It is a rule which does not recommend itself by either its reasonableness, its certainty of application, or its justice." And, after noticing the rule announced in Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; and Powers v. Council Bluffs, 45 Iowa, 652, 24 Am. Rep. 792, it continued: "Thus the application of the rule now contended for would require a plaintiff to foresee all the possible results, and to convince a jury of what he, with prophetic ken, is required to foresee, on penalty of subsequently having to quietly endure consequences which he could not reasonably have conjectured as likely to result from what at first seemed a trifling injury. The cases of North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 314, 2 N. E. 821, and Fowle v. New Haven & N. Co. 112 Mass. 334, 17 Am. Rep. 106, have been examined, and we find that they do measurably support the contention of defendant in error. None of these cases are satisfactory in their reasoning, and the decided weight of authority is opposed to them." See also Blunt v. McCormick, 3 Denio, 283; Greene v. New York C. & H. R.

R. Co. 65 How. Pr. 154; Powers v. Ware, 4 Pick. 106; McGuire v. Grant, 25 N. J. L. 350, 67 Am. Dec. 49; Schell v. Plumb, 55 N. Y. 592; Mahon v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 658.

The rule contended for by appellant, it seems to us, would work unnecessary hardship, is fraught with doubt and uncertainty in its application, and we are not inclined to adopt it.

The instructions of the court were without error, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Clara J. FLOYD et al., Appts.,
v.
NATIONAL LOAN & INVESTMENT COMPANY.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. So far as it conflicts with the provisions of § 30 of chap. 54 of the Code of 1890, the general law of comity, as affecting the rights of foreign corporations, has been repealed in this state.

2. By virtue of the 2d clause of said section, providing that "such corporation so complying shall have the same rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the same regulations, restrictions, and liabilities, that are conferred and imposed by this and the 52d and 53d chapters of this Code, and of chapter 20 of the Acts of 1885, on corporations chartered under the laws of this state," foreign corporations, upon complying with the conditions required by said section, have the same rights, powers, and privileges respecting their contracts and remedies, if not otherwise repugnant to the policy of the state, as domestic corporations of like character, whether, under the general law of comity, they would have had such rights, powers, and privileges or not, but they can exercise no greater powers in this state than its domestic corporations.

3. A foreign corporation coming into this state to transact business must conform to the law of this state, if there be any, regulating similar corporations organized under the laws of this state; and its contract, although in terms solvable in the foreign state in which such corporation has its domicile, must be such a contract as a similar domestic corporation is authorized to make, or the courts of this state cannot enforce, or permit the enforcement of, its performance.

4. A domestic building and loan association may fix a minimum premium to be deducted in advance or paid in periodical instalments, but in either case such premium must be a certain, definite sum, fixed and determined at the time of the making of the loan; and the contract of a foreign building association, made with a citizen of this state, secured by a deed of trust upon real estate situated in this state, and by its terms to be performed in the domiciliary state, must conform to this requirement; and, if it does not, such contract is not within the exemption from the operation of the usury laws given by our statute to domestic building and loan associations; and in such case only the principal of the loan, with legal interest thereon, together with such sums as have been necessarily expended in preserving the property, less the amounts paid into the association by the borrower as dues, interest, premium, and fines, to be treated in the settlements as partial payments, can be collected; and a sale under the deed of trust will be enjoined until the amount thus due is settled, unless the basis of settlement herein laid down be conceded by the association in proceeding to sell.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kanawha County in favor of defendant in a suit to enjoin defendant from selling complainants' property for noncompliance with their contract for the repayment of a loan made thereon. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Kennedy for appellants.

Messrs. Brown, Jackson, & Knight, for appellees:

It is eminently proper in this case that the laws of Michigan should prevail, as they are in no wise repugnant to the laws of this state; and all borrowers and shareholders of such associations should be placed on the same footing, and only required to settle with the association on the same basis.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 1st day of September, 1894, the plaintiffs, by their deed of trust, conveyed to the defendant, B. H. Oxley, trustee, certain real estate, situated in the city of Charleston, Kanawha county, in trust to secure to the National Loan & Investment Company of Detroit, Michigan, the payment of $2,500, according to the conditions of a certain bond bearing even date therewith, executed by the plaintiff to said company for the loan of said sum of $2,500 by it made to them, and to secure the repayment of any and all sums said company might pay for taxes, insurance, and maintaining the property in repair, in case of the failure of the plaintiffs to make such necessary payments, and to secure the strict performance of all the obligations incumbent upon the said Clara J. Floyd as a shareholder in, and borrower from, said company under its charter, by-laws, rules, and regulations then existing, or which might thereafter lawfully be made, altered, or amended. It is recited in this deed that said Clara J. Floyd is the owner of twenty-five shares of stock in said company, and has borrowed of it, pursuant to its by-laws, the money thereby secured, and by said deed she covenants and agrees to all things required of her to be done by the by-laws of said company as a shareholder and as a borrower, and to pay to said company the sum of $1.45 per share per month on her stock and loan, that being, as stated, stock, interest, and premium; also to pay all fines that should be legally assessed against her, such payments to be made until the stock owned by her should mature under said by-laws, and, when it shall have matured or reached the value of $100 per share, said stock to be surrendered and canceled, and thereupon the deed to be void and the property thereby granted to be released. Said deed provided that, in case of default, said trustee, upon the request of the company, should make sale of the property upon the following terms: "(a) For cash in a sum sufficient to pay (1) the costs of executing this trust, the same to include a commission to said trustee of 5 per centum upon the gross amount of said sale; and (2) the whole amount then due to said third party, according to the terms of this deed, the bond herein mentioned, and the by-laws and regulations of said company; (b) and the residue, if any there be, upon such terms as the said trustee or his successor may deem best." And it was further expressly agreed therein that in case said trustee should sell said premises as provided in said deed, by reason of the default of said parties of the first part in computing the amount due said party of the third part, said first parties should be considered and treated the same as a borrowing member of said company. It was also covenanted and agreed in said deed that all payments therein mentioned should be made at said company's office in the city of Detroit, Michigan, that being the place where the contract therein set forth and the bond therein referred to were made; that the bond and instrument given to secure the payments mentioned in the bond shall in all cases be construed as under and in accordance with the laws of the state of Michigan, and the articles of incorporation and by-laws of said association, any provision whatsoever in the laws of any other state to the contrary notwithstanding; and that any provision in the laws of any other state at variance with the laws of the state of Michigan, either on the subject of interest, premium, or any other matter, is expressly waived,—it being mutually intended by the parties thereto to make the contract in all things as a contract under and in accordance with the laws of the state of Michigan.

Upon her obligations thus contracted Mrs. Floyd made sixteen payments, of which the first was in September, 1894, and the last in December, 1896, amounting in all to $618.22 of which $120 was dues on stock, $220 interest on the loan, $240 premium, and $38.22 fines for failures to pay. She having ceased to make payments, the trustee advertised the property for sale for cash in a sum sufficient to pay the costs of executing the trust, including 5 per cent commission to the trustee upon the gross proceeds of the sale, and the whole amount due said company, $3,022.20, as of the 19th of July, 1897, and the residue to be paid in two equal instalments, of one and two years, and fixing August 21, 1897, as the day of sale. On the 17th day of August, 1897, the plaintiffs filed their bill of complaint in the cause in the circuit court of Kanawha county, setting forth substantially the foregoing facts, and alleging that said transaction was, in substance and in fact, a simple loan only, and was put in the form in which it was made under the requirement of the defendant company as a shift and device on its part to avoid the usury laws of the state; that the balance claimed to be due by the defendant on account of said loan is about $600 more than under the laws of this state it is entitled to on account of said loan, it being greatly in excess of the principal advanced, with 6 per cent per annum interest; that defendant company is entitled only to the balance due on account of said loan, computed upon the principal advanced, with 6 per cent interest, allowing as credits the monthly payments, upon the principle of partial payments; that by reason of the covenants and provisions of the deed of trust, for breaches of which authority could not be vested in the trustee to fix the damages, it could not be executed in pais, and, though in form a conveyance to a trustee, it is in fact and law nothing but a mortgage, and can be executed and enforced only by judicial decision in a court of equity; that the terms of sale specified in the trust deed and notice of sale are not such as the law requires in such case, and a sale thereunder would be improper, erroneous, and illegal, and greatly to the prejudice of the plaintiff's rights; that said company has no authority, under the laws of this state or the state of Michigan, to make the loan in the manner and form in which it was made, as thereinbefore alleged, the sole object for which said association was formed, and the only legal authority vested in it, being to afford its members a safe and comfortable investment for their savings, and aid them in the purchase and improvement of real estate, and the building and improving of homesteads; that less than nine persons having formed said company, the number required by the laws of this state, it was without authority to make said loan; and that the amount claimed by said company, computed under its by-laws, is greatly in excess of the amount that would be due, computed on the basis of 6 per cent interest, and treating the payments as partial payments, made on the debt in the usual way, and is therefore exorbitantly usurious. Copies of the deed of trust and by-laws of the company are filed with the bill as exhibit. The bill prays that the defendants be enjoined from making the sale, and that the court take jurisdiction of the matters in controversy between the parties, and make and enter such decrees and orders as justice and equity may require, and for general relief. The injunction was awarded as prayed for.

The defendant company appeared, and demurred to the bill, and answered it, admitting the loans and contracts of membership and security, and its attempt to enforce them, as alleged in the bill; averring their legality under the laws of Michigan and of this state; that it has complied with the requirements of the statute relating to foreign corporations, and that the contract is solvable in Michigan; denying that it is a shift or device to evade the usury laws of West Virginia, and also that the contract is illegal or usurious; that the amount due under it is uncertain, and there is necessity for resort to a court of equity for its enforcement. To this answer there is no replication, and no depositions or affidavits were taken and filed.

On the 15th day of April, 1899, the circuit court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill, and an appeal from, and supersedeas to, this decree were allowed.

The allegation that this contract between the parties was not a contract of membership in said association on the part of Mrs. Floyd, and a loan to her as such member in good faith, but, on the contrary, a mere shift and device to evade the usury laws of this state, is denied, and there is no replication to the answer, which must be taken as true; but, if there were a replication, there is no evidence to sustain the allegation. Upon the face of the papers, nothing appears from which such an interpretation can be reached. The corporate existence of the association is admitted, and it is only insisted and objected that it has attempted to make a contract that it has no power or authority to make under the laws of this state or the laws of Michigan. As to the terms of sale, they are exactly as stipulated in the deed of trust, except as to any surplus that may remain after paying the costs of executing the trust, expenses of sale, including an agreed commission, and the amount due the company, and as to this surplus it is covenanted that it shall be upon such terms as the trustee might deem best. In the exercise of this discretion, which the parties were authorized to vest in him, the trustee fixed the terms of sale, as to such surplus, in the notice. The agreement in the deed for 5 per cent commission to the trustee could not affect the validity of the loan or invalidate the notice. It does not go to the association nor enter into the loan, nor did it interfere with a prevention of the sale by payment of the debt. If illegal, the trustee could not withhold it on a settlement of his accounts. The allegation of uncertainty in the amount due is denied, not replied to, and no proof offered. As to the character of the instrument, it is clearly not a mortgage, but the ordinary deed of trust to secure the performance of a building and loan contract and loan, such as are common in this state. There is a denial of the allegation of uncertainty as to the amount due, accompanied by an averment of a statement having been rendered to which no exceptions were taken nor objections made. Besides that, no facts are alleged from which uncertainty appears. In none of these matters does any ground appear upon which the bill or the injunction can be sustained.

There is but one real question in the case, and that is whether this contract made by a Michigan building and loan association with a citizen of this state, to be performed in the other state, and secured by deed of trust upon real estate situated in this state, can be enforced here. It involves the question of the status in this state of a foreign building and loan association that has complied with the statutory conditions preliminary to its doing business here, and the nature of the contract it can make under such conditions; and this raises, as a preliminary inquiry, the question of the difference between the rights of individuals and corporations doing business beyond the limits of the state to which they belong. Except by the law of comity, no corporation created in one state has the power to do business in another. Its very life is the franchise granted by its parent state, and creation of its law, which has no extraterritorial force. It is not entitled, under the Constitution of the United States, to the privileges and immunities of citizens. "Now, a grant of corporate existence is a grant of special privileges to the corporators, enabling them to act for certain designated purposes as a single individual, and exempting them (unless otherwise specially provided) from individual liability. The corporation, being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. As said by this court in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274: 'It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty.' The recognition of its existence, even by other states, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those states,—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy." Mr. Justice Field in Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 180, 19 L. ed. 360. But this rule of comity exists and is enforced by the courts in every nation and every state of the Union, until destroyed by the lawmaking power. "In the silence of any positive rule affirming or denying or restraining the operation of foreign laws, courts of justice presume the tacit adoption of them by their own government, unless they are repugnant to its policy or prejudicial to its interest." Story. Conf. Laws, 35. "We think it well settled that by the law of comity among nations a corporation created by one sovereignty is permitted to make contracts in another, and to sue in its courts, and that the same law of comity prevails among the several sovereignties of this Union." Chief Justice Taney in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274. "In harmony with the general law of comity obtaining among the states composing the Union, the presumption should be indulged that a corporation of one state, not forbidden by the laws of its being, may exercise within any other state the general powers conferred by its own charter, unless it is prohibited from so doing either in the direct enactments of the latter state, or by its public policy, to be deduced from the general course of legislation, or from the settled adjudications of its highest court." Mr. Justice Harlan in American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 356, 25 L. ed. 890.

Any state, however, may forbid and prevent a foreign corporation from carrying on its business within its limits, and also from doing certain acts or making certain contracts within its jurisdiction. "Whenever a state sufficiently indicates that contracts which derive their validity from its comity are repugnant to its policy, or are considered as injurious to its interests, the presumption in favor of its adoption can no longer be made." Chief Justice Taney in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274. "Having no absolute right of recognition in other states, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows as a matter of course that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those states may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely, they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as, in their judgment, will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion." Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 180, 19 L. ed. 360. The only exceptions to this rule are in the cases of corporations engaged in foreign commerce, corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and corporations employed in the business of the government of the United States. The only limitation upon the power of a state to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits, or hiring offices for that purpose, or to exact conditions for allowing the corporation to do business or hire offices there, arises where the corporation is in the employ of the Federal government, or where its business is strictly commerce, interstate or foreign. Corporations are not citizens, within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution declaring that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. Article 4, § 2, cl. 1. A private corporation is included under the designation of "person" in the 14th Amendment to the Constitution (§ 1). The provisions in the 14th Amendment to the Constitution (§ 1), that "no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," do not prohibit a state from requiring for the admission within its limits of a corporation of another state such conditions as it chooses. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737. In reaching these conclusions the court says: "The equal protection of the laws which these bodies may claim is only such as is accorded to similar associations within the jurisdiction of the state. The plaintiff in error is not a corporation within the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. The office it hires is within such jurisdiction, and, on condition that it pays the required license tax, it can claim the same protection in the use of the office that any other corporation having a similar office may claim. It would then have the equal protection of the law so far as it had anything within the jurisdiction of the state, and the constitutional amendment requires nothing more. The state is not prohibited from discriminating in the privileges it may grant to foreign corporations as a condition of their doing business or hiring offices within its limits, provided, always, such discrimination does not interfere with any transaction by such corporations of interstate or foreign commerce. It is not every corporation, lawful in the state of its creation, that other states may be willing to admit within their jurisdiction, or consent that it have offices in them; such, for example, as a corporation for lotteries. And, even where the business of a foreign corporation is not unlawful in other states, the latter may wish to limit the number of such corporations, or to subject their business to such control as would be in accordance with the policy governing domestic corporations of a similar character." Under the law of comity which exists in every state until repealed, and which the courts must, as well as may, enforce, a foreign corporation has no authority to do any act in a state other than that of its being which is not permitted by the laws of such state to individuals generally. The law of comity merely enables a body of corporators chartered by one state to act in a corporate capacity in another state, subject to all the laws and regulations of the latter. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 964, citing numerous cases.

From these authorities it is plain that any foreign corporation may do business in this state unless prohibited by law, or its business be such as is repugnant to our laws or the public policy of the state, "to be deduced from the general course of legislation or from the settled adjudications of its highest court," and may do such acts in the state as are permitted by its laws to individuals generally, and no others. But such prohibition or repugnancy will not be implied from the mere silence of the state. "If the policy of a state or territory does not permit the business of the foreign corporation in its limits, or allow the corporation to acquire or hold real property, it must be expressed in some affirmative way; it cannot be inferred from the fact that its legislature has made no provision for the formation of similar corporations, or allows corporations to be formed only by general law." Concell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 59, 25 L. ed. 549.

The legislature of our state has not been silent on this subject. It has prescribed certain requirements, to be complied with as conditions precedent to the right of all foreign corporations to do business in the state, and inserted therewith the following clause: "Any corporation duly incorporated by the laws of any state or territory of the United States, or of the District of Columbia, or of any foreign country, may, unless it be otherwise expressly provided, hold property and transact business in this state, upon complying with the requirements of this section, and not otherwise." Section 30, chap. 54, Code. This is equivalent to saying that "no corporation duly incorporated by the laws of any state or territory of the United States, of the District of Columbia, or of any foreign country, unless it be otherwise expressly provided, shall hold property and transact business in this state without having first complied with the requirements of this section." In one sense, it is a prohibition against foreign corporations, and repeals the general law of comity; but it admits all foreign corporations, except those expressly forbidden, to the right to hold property and transact business in the state upon compliance with the requirements. There is no statute expressly prohibiting foreign building and loan associations from doing business in the state. They are not excluded, and such of them as comply with the statutory requirements are admitted. The bill alleges that the appellee here has not complied with them. This allegation is denied in the answer, accompanied with an averment that it has complied with them. To this there is no replication. The answer must, therefore, be taken as true.

This Michigan corporation being thus authorized to do business in this state, its courts would not, in the absence of any further legislation, restrain it from doing any act permitted by its laws to individuals generally, and could not refuse to compel, at its instance, the performance of any contract thus lawfully made with it; and if, under such circumstances, it made a contract with a citizen of this state, to be performed in the state of Michigan, and such contract were authorized by its charter and the laws of the state of its being, it would be enforceable here, although the rate of interest provided for and lawful in Michigan were higher than the legal rate here. But the legislature has given further expression to its will respecting foreign corporations, thus: "Such corporation so complying, shall have the same rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the same regulations, restrictions, and liabilities that are conferred and imposed by this and the 52d and 53d chapters of this Code, and by chapter 20 of the Acts of 1885, on corporations chartered under the laws of this state." Section 30, chap. 54, Code. Can there be any doubt that the effect of this provision is to permit foreign corporations to have the same rights, powers, and privileges that are conferred upon domestic corporations, and no greater or different rights, powers, and privileges? If that is not its meaning, what can be the legal effect of the clause, "subject to the same regulations, restrictions, and liabilities that are" imposed upon domestic corporations? Clearly, it must operate as a prohibition upon the exercise by a foreign corporation of any greater or different rights, powers, and privileges than are permitted to domestic corporations. Similar provisions occur in the statutes of several of the states, and in the Constitutions of some of them; but many states have no such provision. It occurs in the Illinois statute in this form: "Foreign corporations and the officers and agents thereof, doing business in this state, shall be subjected to all the liabilities, restrictions, and duties that are or may be imposed upon corporations of like character organized under the general laws of this state, and have no other or greater powers." [Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 1896, chap. 32, § 26, p. 985.]

In Stevens v. Pratt, 101 Ill. 206, the court, in construing the provision, held: "It is simply a law imposing regulations and restrictions, and its meaning is that, where the general laws of this state provide for the organization of corporations, foreign ones of like character, doing business in this state, shall exercise no greater or different powers, and shall be subject to the same liabilities, restrictions, and duties." Mr. Justice Scholfeld, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The manifest and only purpose was to produce uniformity in the powers, liabilities, duties, and restrictions of foreign and domestic corporations of like character, and bring them all under the influence of the same law." Our statute is equivalent to that of Illinois, and must have the same meaning. That being its effect, a foreign corporation can do no act, make no contract, and exercise no power in this state not permitted to like corporations organized under the laws of this state. The exercise by such corporation of any power not possessed by a similar domestic corporation would be repugnant to the public policy of the state, as expressed in this statutory provision, and for that reason would be restrained by the courts of this state. We only recognize and give effect to the corporate existence of the foreign company, not to all the powers which, by its charter and the laws under which it exists, it has and may exercise in the domiciliary state. It will be permitted to exercise here only such of its powers as are not repugnant to our laws and policy. Such is the effect given the Illinois statute by the courts of that state in determining the rights of foreign building and loan associations.

In Granite State Provident Assn. v. Lloyd, 145 Ill. 620, 34 N. E. 142, it is held: "Under § 26, chap. 32, Rev. Stat., where a foreign corporation of any kind comes into this state to transact business it must conform to the laws of this state, if it exists, regulating similar corporations organized under the general laws of this state. Foreign corporations doing business in this state are placed on an equality with domestic corporations to the extent that they shall exercise no greater or different powers, and are made subject to the same regulations and restrictions, and governed by the same rules of law, in these respects. . . . A foreign corporation, doing a homestead and loan business in this state, will be governed by the laws of this state as to the right of a stockholder to withdraw."

In Rhodes v. Missouri Sav. & L. Co. 173 Ill. 621, 42 L. R. A. 93, 50 N. E. 998, it is held that, "in order that a foreign building and loan association may enforce in our courts a contract which would be usurious unless within the exemption given by our statute to local building and loan associations, it must appear that the statute under which such foreign association was organized is identical with, or substantially like, our own statute." In the first of these cases, the Illinois courts compelled the foreign building and loan association to be governed by the statute of that state in respect to its settlement of the withdrawal value of its shares; in the other, the foreign association was denied the character, rights, and powers of a building and loan association, because it appeared from its by-laws that it was not organized and doing business in the method prescribed by the state laws for such associations. Its loan to the resident member was therefore treated as a simple ordinary loan in respect to its settlement, and it was only permitted to take the money advanced, with legal interest, after crediting the money paid into the association by the borrowing member.

In Freie v. No. 4 Fidelity Bldg. & Sav. Union, 166 Ill. 128, 46 N. E. 784, the court held: "A corporation created in another state may, upon the principle of comity, exercise within this state the powers conferred by its charter, if not inconsistent with the law or against the public policy of this state. A foreign building and loan association doing business in this state may contract for premiums and fines in addition to legal interest on money loaned on stock, when so authorized by the law of the state of its creation, without violating the usury statutes of this state." In the opinion in this last case it is said: "By the statute of Indiana, under which complainant was organized, it had power to enter into the contract in this case, and it was not contrary to the laws or policy of this state, which permit the organization of like corporations, with the same powers."

Relying principally upon these cases, the law is laid down as follows in § 8797, 7 Thomp. Corp.: "Where a building association undertakes to do business in a state other than that of its creation, whilst a contract made by it in the former state, sanctioned by the statute under which the society was organized, will not be deemed unlawful in the state in which it was made and is sought to be enforced, when it would not be so if made by an association of that state, yet such an association acts and does business in such state (even when duly licensed) subject to its laws and regulations as applied to its own domestic associations by virtue of its statutes and decisions, and will not be permitted to have or exercise any greater or different powers than, but to be held to the same liabilities, restrictions, and duties as, domestic ones. Under this view, moreover, it is deemed legitimate to test the character of a foreign corporation assuming to act as a building association by reference to the laws of the state in which it so assumes to act, and to deny it that character, if, by such comparison, its nature and powers are found to be different from, and in excess of, what the laws and policy of that state recognize as belonging to such associations; with the result that contracts permitted to such associations, but unlawful to others, will not be accepted as valid when set up by foreign associations not properly classable as building associations according to that criterion."

The same principle has been applied by other courts in other cases. In Cravens v. New York L. Ins. Co. 148 Mo. 583, 53 L. R. A. 305, 50 S. W. 519, it was held that, although a foreign corporation doing business in the domestic state may by contract, when no domestic statute prohibiting it intervenes, make the law of the state of its incorporation the applicatory law of the contract, yet where the laws of the domestic state prohibit foreign corporations from making certain kinds of contracts they can act only in accordance therewith. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 841, note. In Canada Southern R. Co. v. Gebhard, 109 U. S. 527, 27 L. ed. 1020, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 363, it was said: "A corporation of one country may be excluded from business in another country . . . but, if admitted, it must, in the absence of legislation equivalent to making it a corporation of the latter country, be taken, both by the government and those who deal with it as a creature of the law of its own country, and subject to all the legislative control and direction that may be properly exercised over it at the place of its creation." In that case the question was the validity of a release of a Canadian corporation from part of its bonded indebtedness by a proceeding in the nature of bankruptcy, under legislation of the Canadian Parliament, there being no limitation there upon the right to impair the obligation of contracts.

On the subject of the incorporation of building and loan associations, their methods of business, and their rights, powers, and privileges, this state is not without legislation, and it is insisted that, in seeking the enforcement of its contract with the appellants, the appellee is claiming a right and power not permitted to domestic associations, because it has departed from the requirements of the statute in the nature of the contract it has made. This alleged departure refers to the premium bid for the right of precedence in taking the loan. Section 26, chap. 54, Code, provides that "every such association shall have the power to provide by its by-laws for selling to the stockholders who shall bid the highest premium therefor, the money in the treasury, or in default of bidders at or above a minimum premium, may award to a member the value of any shares held by him less such minimum premium; the minimum premium and the mode of making the award to be fixed by the by-laws. Or such association may charge and receive the premium bid by the stockholder for the priority of right to such loans, in periodical instalments, but the by-laws of every association shall set forth whether the premium bid for the prior right to such loan shall be deducted therefrom in advance, or be paid in periodical instalments."

The by-laws of the appellee, under which the contract in the case at bar was made, provide that "the amount of premium bid shall be taken out of the amount borrowed, but it is expressly provided that after the 15th of September, A. D. 1891, borrowers competing for loans from this company shall bid as a premium a stated amount per share, payable monthly, on the last Saturday of each month; said stated amount per share per month to be paid each month during the existence of the shares of stock borrowed upon." There is a difference between a premium, the amount of which is ascertained and fixed at the time the loan is made, and then divided into instalments and paid periodically, and a premium of a certain sum, to be paid on each share each month for an indefinite and uncertain length of time. The former arrangement is plainly contemplated and required by our statute; the latter is provided for in the appellee's by-laws, and embodied in its contract with said appellant. When this monthly payment of premium will end depends upon the date of the maturity of stock, and is therefore uncertain. The difference between them is that the amount of premium under a contract authorized by the law is certain in amount, while in the contract here it is uncertain in amount, making a difference in liability on the borrower's part, and involving the exercise of a different power on the part of the association from what are permitted in such cases by the law of this state to domestic associations.

The stock of the association upon which this advance was made is its instalment stock of class B, and the payments on it are "to continue each month, until such shares shall have reached the par value of $100 each, as shown by the report of the auditing committee," and as long as the shares run the premium must be paid. The time to run being uncertain, the amount of premium to be paid is uncertain also.

The difference between the results under the two systems is said to be slight. In 7 Thomp. Corp. § 8779, it is said: "The essential nature and purpose of the premium are the same in both of these systems, and their practical operation substantially alike. In neither case is the premium paid; the borrower simply promises to pay it. . . . Except where the premium consists simply in an increased rate of interest, it is not contemplated that it shall be paid dollar for dollar by the borrower, in strict conformity with the letter of his undertaking. All he is bound to do is to pay the periodical amounts coming due upon his obligation, and to continue doing so until the shares of the society or series to which he belongs have reached maturity; then his debt and his premium bid are both discharged by relinquishing to the association his credit in the same. Unless the society is unfortunate, this period will be reached a considerable time before the borrower's payments, with interest, shall amount to the aggregate of what he received, with interest, together with what he promised to pay by way of premium. The period for ascertaining the amount of the premium actually paid by the borrower is the date of the maturity of the shares and distribution of the assets." However, the books say, and courts have held, that, where an association is authorized by statute to operate upon one of these systems respecting the premium, it cannot adopt the other without making the contract unlawful to the extent of the excess of the reservation above the legal rate of interest. Endlich, Bldg. Asso. §§ 407, 408; Mechanics' & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Asso. v. Wilcox, 24 Conn. 147; Mechanics' & W. Mut. Sav. Bank & Bldg. Asso. v. Meriden Agency Co. 24 Conn. 159; Birmingham v. Maryland Land & Permanent Homestead Asso. 45 Md. 541; Geiger v. Eighth German Bldg. Asso. 58 Md. 589; White v. Williams, 90 Md. 719, 45 Atl. 1001; Gray v. Baltimore Bldg. & L. Asso. (W. Va.) 37 S. E. 533. The care which the legislature has taken to state explicitly the plan upon which such associations may operate, and the means it has adopted to compel adherence to it, indicate that the lawmaking power of the state deems it important. The law relating to the subject of building associations is contained in four sections of the chapter, followed by these words: "Every such association shall adopt by-laws, which shall embrace all the provisions of the four preceding sections, and such further provisions for its government, and the management of its business not inconsistent with these sections as it may deem proper." [W. Va. Code 1891, chap. 54, § 29, p. 521.] No departure from the method of doing business thus prescribed is allowed. There can be no question as to the legislative intent to compel absolute adherence and obedience to its plan for conducting the operation of these societies. Further evidence of this is found in the radical change effected in the law by chapter 58, Acts 1883, by which the present law came into existence. Prior thereto the provision relating to premiums was: "Every such corporation is authorized to levy, assess, and collect from its members such sums of money, by stated dues, fines, interest on loans advanced, and premiums bid by members for the right of precedence in taking loans, as the corporation by its laws shall provide." [W. Va. Code 1868, chap. 54, § 27, p. 411.] And this change came immediately after the decisions of this court in Pfeister v. Wheeling Bldg. Asso. 19 W. Va. 676; McGannon v. Central Bldg. Asso. No. 2, 19 W. Va. 726; Parker v. United States Bldg. Land & L. Asso. 19 W. Va. 744; Parker v. United States Bldg. Land & L. Asso. 19 W. Va. 769; and Haigh v. United States Bldg. Land & L. Asso. 19 W. Va. 793,—by which the building association statutes of the state were construed and applied to the transactions of said societies.

Measured by the standard of our statute, this association is found, by the method of its operations and the nature of its contracts, not to have the character of a building association, and cannot, therefore, be permitted to enforce its contract as a building association contract. It is contravened as such by the policy of the state, and is therefore not within the law exempting such associations from the usury laws, unless there is some other principle or ground upon which it may be permitted to collect the money for which it has contracted.

Counsel for the appellee insist this contract is made and to be performed in the state of Michigan, and is valid by the laws of that state, and that, therefore, the lex loci contractus controls it. This position would be unassailable if the appellee were a natural person, insisting upon the right to enforce a contract solvable in the state of Michigan, and carrying the legal rate of interest of that state. But it is not. It is a building association, a corporation, clothed with special privileges, among which is exemption from the usury laws of its own state. The general law of comity, under which, it is contended, it might have carried such special powers and privileges into, and exercised them in, this state, in the absence of any public policy on the part of this state to which their exercise here would have been repugnant, has been expressly repealed. But the law of comity only permits corporations to do in a foreign state such acts as individuals are permitted to do, and it may well be doubted whether a corporation exempted from the usury laws of its own state could carry that exemption into, and assert it in, the courts of another state,—a thing that is permitted to no individual in any country, and may be deemed, therefore, to be against public policy everywhere.

The cases of Klinck v. Price, 4 W. Va. 4, 6 Am. Rep. 268; Pugh v. Cameron, 11 W. Va. 523; Wilson v. Lasier, 11 Gratt. 477; Findlay v. Hall, 12 Ohio St. 610; Shipman v. Bailey, 20 W. Va. 140; John A. Tolman Co. v. Reed, 115 Mich. 71, 72 N. W. 1104; Sawyer v. Dickson, 66 Ark. 77, 48 S. W. 903; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. 383, 6 L. ed. 343,—cited by counsel for appellee,—are all cases of contracts payable to natural persons, solvable in foreign states, and conformable to the general laws of those states respecting the matter of interest. In none of them was a special rate of interest permitted by the foreign state, only to a certain class of corporations, whose existence need not be recognized beyond its own territorial limits, recognized or enforced.

Two cases are cited, however, in which the position taken here by the appellee is upheld (Building & L. Asso. v. Logan, 14 C. C. A. 133, 30 U. S. App. 163, 66 Fed. 827, and Bennett v. Eastern Bldg. & L. Asso. 177 Pa. 233, 34 L. R. A. 595, 35 Atl. 684); but in neither of these cases was the fact that the building associations were setting up and claiming, under the law of comity, an exemption from the general laws of their own respective states, and not the laws themselves, special privileges permitted to them by their states, but denied to natural persons. Other cases of the same class might have been cited. National Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Ashworth, 91 Va. 706, 22 S. E. 521; Ware v. Bankers' Loan & Invest. Co. 95 Va. 680, 29 S. E. 744; Baltimore Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Titlow, 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 518; Equitable Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Hoffman, 50 S. C. 303, 27 S. E. 692; Turner v. Interstate Bldg. & L. Asso. 51 S. C. 33, 27 S. E. 947; and Pollock v. Carolina Interstate Bldg. & L. Asso. 51 S. C. 420, 29 S. E. 77.

In support of the position taken here, Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 964, is recited. The law there is stated thus: "A corporation has no implied authority to do any act in a foreign state which is not permitted by the laws of the latter to individuals generally. The law of comity merely enables a body of corporators chartered by one state to act in a corporate capacity in another state, subject to all the laws and regulations of the latter." Again (§ 967, same work), it is said: "It is the charter alone which is recognized by the law of comity, and not the general legislation of the state in which the corporation was formed. The word 'charter' is here used to signify the agreement between the shareholders of the corporation, whether this agreement be contained in a special act of the legislature, or in articles of association, or in either of these, taken in connection with certain general laws of the state." In Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 495-505, we find this: "It is, of course, implied that the contract must be one which the foreign corporation is permitted by its charter to make, and it must also be one which would be valid if made at the same place by a natural person, not a resident of that state." See also McGregor v. Erie R. Co. 35 N. J. L. 115; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 539, 10 L. ed. 274; Stetson v. New Orleans City Bank, 2 Ohio St. 174; Lewis v. Bank of Kentucky, 12 Ohio, 132, 40 Am. Dec. 469.

Would the courts of any state permit an individual of another state to enforce a contract in violation of the usury laws of his own state? Comity recognizes only the general laws of the foreign state, not the local exemptions from, or exceptions to, such laws.

But there is another reason why these authorities cannot be accepted here. It does not appear in any of these cases that, in the states in which they were decided, the legislatures have placed foreign corporations under the same regulations, restrictions, and liabilities, and conferred upon them only the same rights, powers, and privileges, that are imposed and conferred upon corporations existing under their own laws. There are either no declarations in those states of public policy forbidding the exercise there by foreign corporations of powers greater than, or different from, the powers permitted to their corporations, as in this state and in Illinois, or the courts have failed to pass upon the very important question whether they shall be applied or not applied. Nor does it appear from these cases that in all instances the building and loan contract involved was in conflict with the domestic law governing such contracts. A contract by such an association of another state, not in conflict with our own building association statute, would be enforced here, not by virtue of the general law of comity, but because our law makes the status of such a foreign association the same as that of our own association.

tions, and gives them the same rights, powers, and privileges and remedies in respect to their contracts, although for many purposes they remain foreign corporations. If the powers they assume to exercise are the same as, or within and not beyond, those permitted to our own associations, they are enforceable; otherwise, they are not.

Another contention against the position taken in this opinion is that the premium reserved in this contract is certain, in a legal sense; that under the Michigan law the stock has a fixed maximum limit for its maturity, viz., such period as will permit the stock dues to equal the face of the shares, but liable to be shortened by application of dividends; and therefore, upon the principle that that is certain which can be made certain, our statute is not violated. In other words, if the monthly dues are 50 cents per share, and the share $100, the stock must mature in sixteen and two thirds years, without any accumulation of profits, and the period required for maturity will be less than that, according to the amount of the earnings over expenses and losses. Our statute requires no precedent fixtures or certainty as to the stock dues, and in that respect it is like the Michigan statute. But as to the premium it must be so fixed in advance that the borrower can know exactly how many dollars he is to pay on account of premium, and how much of his money is to go into profits or losses of the company, and not become a direct credit upon his loan. He is entitled to credit upon his loan for every dollar he pays in as dues. He will receive credit on his loan for but an infinitesimal part of what he pays in as premium, and, if the concern's losses equal its profits, he receives none of it. That there is no such certainty in this contract is indisputable. That our statute requires such certainty is undeniable, whether in its operation it produces it in all cases or not.

While this contract cannot be enforced according to its terms, it is not so unenforceable because of its want of equity between the borrower and the investor, which is perhaps no greater than might occur in an association conforming to our statute, as we set no limit upon the ratio between dues and premium, from which this inequitable result flows, nor because, under the contract, the amount now due from the appellant is far beyond the amount she borrowed,—an inevitable result in every building association contract in which default continues for a long time; nor because of any improper motives on the appellant's part, or of the agents of the association in entering into it, for there is not a scintilla of evidence of that in the nature of the contract or elsewhere in the record; but simply because it is such a contract as is clearly repugnant to the public policy of the state, plainly written in its legislation, and therefore prohibited as to all building associations.

But the appellant has received $2,500 from this association, and secured the performance of her said contract by a deed of trust upon her real estate, and she comes into court to have the lien released, offering to pay the principal of the debt, with legal interest thereon, subject to credit for the money she had already paid in. This, together with any sums paid out by the appellee upon taxes, insurance, or other expenses necessary to preserve the property, constitute a lien upon the property, and must be satisfied, as in seeking equity the appellant must do equity.

For the reasons herein stated, the decrees must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to the principle herein laid down, and further according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

Rehearing denied.

McWhorter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

S. T. Chambers filed his bill in the circuit court of Mingo county against George F. Cramer and J. W. McCready, alleging: That he was the owner of certain valuable real estate in the town of Matewan, in said county, known as "Lot 14," upon which was located a valuable house, which he, with his family, occupied as a residence, and in which he had been keeping a hotel for several years. Said house had cost something like $1,000, was in good repair and condition, and suitable for the entertainment of guests and the traveling public. He also had on said lot a valuable store building, costing and worth at least $1,400. That in the hotel plaintiff had valuable personal property, consisting of household and kitchen furniture, worth several hundred dollars. That plaintiff, together with his son, as partners, had a stock of merchandise in the storehouse of value more than $5,000, in which plaintiff had an important and controlling interest. That recently defendants claimed to have purchased a lot in close proximity to plaintiff's property, there being only a small alley of 15 feet width intervening between the two properties. That plaintiff was informed that defendants were going to construct a building on their said lot in which they were going to locate an engine, and conduct what they called a "machine shop and blacksmith shop." That soon afterwards plaintiff served notice in writing upon defendants that they should not construct such a building, nor should they be permitted to keep and maintain any machine shops so close to the property of plaintiff, reciting that such shops and engines would greatly impair the value of plaintiff's property, and endanger it by exposure to fire; that the same would constitute a nuisance, which plaintiff would enjoin. That defendants paid no attention to said notice, and proceeded to the full construction of said building and openly proclaimed their purpose of locating an engine therein and conducting a blacksmith and machine shop thereon, all of which would greatly reduce the value of plaintiff's property. That its location would constitute a great menace and danger to the property of plaintiff and others. That said building was a worthless wooden and cheap affair, and liable and likely to be ignited by sparks emanating from the chimneys of the furnace of said blacksmith shop and the smokestack of the engine, which they were threatening to locate in said shop. That, if allowed to conduct said shops, the noise and confusion occasioned by the workings and equipments of the shops would greatly disturb, annoy, irritate, and confuse the plaintiff, his family living in the hotel, and his guests and servants, as well. That the location of the shops or engine would diminish, not only the value of the property, but the comfort and enjoyment of it. That the nuisance and inconvenience which said shops or engine would occasion would materially interfere with the ordinary comforts of human existence. That it was being so constructed so close to plaintiff's property as to almost darken the windows of his buildings. That, if said shops and engine were allowed to be operated and continued, smoke, effluvia, and cinders from the chimneys of said building and said engine would constitute an offensive, obnoxious, and undesirable element against the comfort and enjoyment of plaintiff's property. That since the construction of said shop the insurance companies had already increased the premiums paid and to be paid by plaintiff on his property, and he had been notified by the insurance companies that if said shops were maintained his insurance would be further increased. Allying that if defendants were allowed to conduct therein a blacksmith shop, or to run machine shops therein, it would comprise a nuisance of such a nature that the continuance of it would cause a constantly recurring grievance; that plaintiff was only able to procure insurance upon a portion of his said property; and only for a low per cent of its real value, and in case of fire great loss would come to plaintiff, over and above the insurance valuation; that the establishment thereof would be an infringement of the property rights of plaintiff, and, if permitted to be conducted or run or maintained, they would cause irreparable wrong and mischief to plaintiff's property, and, if allowed to be continued, liable to produce immediate injury to plaintiff, for which damage would afford no adequate compensation, for the reason that the life of plaintiff, as well as those of his family, guests, and servants, would be endangered; that J. W. McCready was insolvent and Cramer had no property in this state, except the interest mentioned, worth, perhaps, not over $400, and, besides, was a nonresident of the state. And he prayed that defendants be perpetually inhibited and enjoined from conducting or maintaining such blacksmith shop, machine shop, or works upon such premises, and from locating any engine thereon calculated to endanger life or property of plaintiff, and for general relief. Plaintiff filed with his bill a map showing location of his property and the proposed building, and the streets and alleys; also the notice served by him on defendants not to construct the building. On the 15th day of March, 1898, a temporary injunction was granted by the judge in vacation, as prayed for in the bill. On the 18th of May, 1898, defendants filed their demurrer, which was set down for argument. Defendants also tendered their joint and separate answer, to which plaintiff filed five exceptions, which exceptions were overruled, and the answer filed. The answer denied all the material allegations of the bill, averring that there would be no extraordinary danger from fire; that the machinery proposed to be put into the shops was of the most improved kind, and almost wholly noiseless. Denied that any smoke, effluvia, or cinders, or anything of the like nature, would constitute any undesirable element against the comfort and enjoyment of the property of anyone, or that it would increase the insurance on any building in the town of Matewan, or that the construction and operation of said plant would in any manner constitute a nuisance of any nature whatever, or cause any wrong or mischief to the property of plaintiff or anyone else. Denied the insolvency of either of the defendants, and the nonresidence of defendant Cramer. Averred: That they proposed to operate in said building two turning lathes, one planer, one shaver, one boarding mill, besides the blacksmith shop, the machinery of which would be put in place and operated by defendant McCready; describing fully the proposed building, how it was to be constructed,—sides covered with sheet iron, the roof made fireproof, the floor of dirt, and that the whole of said building would be as near fireproof as it would be possible to make it. The forge in the blacksmith shop would be of the most improved pattern, and the fire, when put in the forge, which is the only time, even in the old-pattern forges, there could possibly be any danger, would be what is known as "hooded;" that is, that the smoke, sparks, etc., would be collected in a funnel-shaped smokestack, and carried out of the building through a flue. That they had purchased and paid for over $2,000 worth of machinery to go in said plant, which machinery had arrived at said town of Matewan before the injunction was granted in this cause, and that the continuance in favor of said injunction was absolutely ruinous to defendants' business and to their property rights. That it was not their intention to injure the property rights of plaintiff or anyone whatsoever, but they merely desired to pursue a lawful, legitimate, and useful business on their own property, and that said business, instead of a nuisance, danger, or menace, was an enterprise badly needed in the town of Matewan.—and again denied each and every allegation of said bill not specifically denied or admitted in the answer, and prayed for the dissolution of the injunction, and that they be allowed to complete their said building and to conduct and maintain their business, and that the bill be dismissed. On the 1st day of June the cause was heard upon a written notice of motion to dissolve the injunction, when it was heard upon the bill and exhibits, the joint and separate answer of defendants, and general replication thereto upon the deposition of witnesses taken and filed in the cause both by plaintiff and defendants, and upon the affidavits filed by plaintiff, when the court overruled the motion to dissolve the injunction, and gave plaintiff judgment against defendants for costs of the motion. Further depositions were taken after this hearing of the motion, and filed in the cause. The cause was heard finally on the 12th day of October, 1898, when the court perpetuated the injunction and rendered judgment against defendants for the costs of the suit, from which decree the defendants appealed to this court, and say the court erred in awarding the injunction on the 15th of March, 1898, and in not sustaining defendants' demurrer to the bill, and in refusing to pass upon the said demurrer, either overruling or sustaining the same, in refusing to sustain the motion to dissolve the injunction made on the 1st day of June, 1898, and in continuing the same in full force and effect, and in refusing to dissolve the injunction on the 12th day of October, 1898, when the case was submitted for final decree, and in entering its decree perpetuating said injunction and striking said cause from the docket.

Should this injunction have been granted, upon the case made out in the bill? The defendants were engaging in a proper and legitimate business in harmony with and in furtherance of the material interests of the town and community,—one of the many useful industries that mark the progress of that rapidly developing section of our state. It would seem that inducements would be offered to encourage the building up of industries of that character. "It is a general rule that where the thing complained of is not a nuisance per se but may or may not become so, according to circumstances, and the injury apprehended is eventual or contingent, equity will not interfere. The presumption is that a person entering into a legitimate business will conduct it in a proper way, so that it will not constitute a nuisance; and so where a building in in course of erection, or about to be erected, will not of itself constitute a nuisance, equity will not enjoin it on the ground that it may be used for a purpose which will make it a nuisance. If the building is in fact used in such a manner as to create a nuisance, its use for such purpose will then be enjoined." 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1129, and cases cited. In Hough v. Doylestown, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 333, it was held that, in order for equity to enjoin a private nuisance, "the danger must be impending and imminent, and the effect certain, not resting on hypothesis or conjecture, but established by conclusive evidence. If the injury be doubtful, eventual, or contingent, or if the matter complained of is not ipso facto a nuisance, . . . an injunction will not be granted. . . . In cases of prospective nuisance a court of equity will not interfere unless the damages to be apprehended will be serious, nor when, upon balancing the inconveniences or injuries, greater injury will be inflicted by granting than by refusing an injunction." The property rights of defendants as well as plaintiff must be considered. The defendants had purchased this ground for the location and conducting of a legitimate business and industry in the line of the progress and growth of the town and community and, according to the evidence, had expended over $2,000 for the equipment of their business with machinery and appliances of the latest and most improved pattern and make. The testimony taken and filed in the cause of all who pretend to know anything about the machinery proposed to be used by defendants is to the effect that it is almost noiseless and without danger from fire, while the evidence to the contrary is principally by men who know little or nothing about machinery, and base their opinions (and their evidence is almost wholly "opinion evidence") upon their knowledge or observation of the conduct of country blacksmith shops. In Mygatt v. Goetchins, 20 Ga. 350, it is held that when the thing complained of will not prima facie be a nuisance, and the answer denies that it will be such, the preliminary injunction will be dissolved, and, if injury thereafter results from the alleged nuisance, ample relief can be afforded by the jury at the hearing. Flint v. Russell, 5 Dill. 151, Fed. Cas. No. 4,876. And in Bowen v. Mauzy, 117 Ind. 258, 19 N. E. 526, it was held that, in order to restrain a person from commencing the operation of a business in itself legitimate, it should be made to appear that the person about to enter into such business threatens and intends to conduct the business in a manner which will constitute a nuisance. And in Harrison v.

Brooks, 26 Ga. 537, it is held: A court of equity will only exercise the power to restrain nuisances in the course of erection in cases of necessity, when the evil sought to be remedied is not only probable, but certain; and it will be the less inclined to interfere when the establishment from which the injury is apprehended will have a tendency to promote the public convenience. And in Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415: "An injunction will not be granted to restrain the erection of a slaughter house and place for keeping hogs, where by the answer and affidavits it appears the defendants intend to carry on the business so as not to be a nuisance." See also Keiser v. Lovett, 85 Ind. 240, 44 Am. Rep. 10; Shiras v. Olinger, 50 Iowa 571, 33 Am. Rep. 138; Dumesnil v. Dupont, 18 B. Mon. 804, 68 Am. Dec. 750; Dunning v. Aurora, 40 Ill. 481. In Powell v. Bentley & G. Furniture Co. 34 W. Va. 804, 12 L. R. A. 53, 12 S. E. 1085, which was a suit to enjoin and inhibit a furniture manufacturing establishment from running, as a nuisance to plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of his home and lot as a residence, it was held that "such cases depend in a peculiar degree upon their own facts and surrounding circumstances, so that courts of equity should proceed with great caution in abating or restraining such factory by injunction, and not enjoin unless the fact of nuisance is made in some way to appear clearly beyond all grounds of fair questioning." In Faucher v. Grass, 60 Iowa, 505, 15 N. W. 302, the court says: "The conclusion is based upon the ground that a blacksmith shop is not a nuisance per se. We know of no authority to the contrary. The shop may be so constructed with a view to deaden the noise of the anvil and other noises, the forges may be so placed, and the smoke and gases may be so conducted away, and the business may be so prosecuted, that the shop would not be regarded by the law as a nuisance." Rouse v. Martin, 75 Ala. 510, 51 Am. Rep. 463. Livery stable is not a nuisance per se. Kirkman v. Handy, 11 Humph. 406, 54 Am. Dec. 45. "Injunction to prevent erection of building for manufacturing purposes, on ground of its being a nuisance to an adjoining dwelling house, will not be granted unless a very strong case is made, and one which is marked by some very peculiar features." Wolcott v. Melick, 11 N. J. Eq. 204, 68 Am. Dec. 790. "Business which is lawful if carried on reasonably and does not affect health, comfort, or the ordinary uses and enjoyment of property in the neighborhood, cannot be a nuisance in fact or in anticipation, and the courts will not interfere with it." Rhodes v. Dunbar, 57 Pa. 274, 98 Am. Dec. 221. Equity will not enjoin if injury be doubtful, eventual, or contingent. Ibid. Mere diminution in value of property, without irreparable mischief, is not ground for equitable relief by injunction. Ibid. That erection of building will increase rates of insurance upon neighboring buildings is not ground for injunction to restrain such erection. Ibid. Appellee cites in support of 54 L. R. A.

his contention several authorities, some of which seem to favor him, and yet the most of them do not help his case, e. g., take Whitney v. Bartholomew, 21 Conn. 213. It is there held that a blacksmith shop is not a nuisance per se; but it was shown upon the trial that the large carriage factory and blacksmith shop had several chimneys, and the shop and chimneys were placed near the dividing line between the lands of the parties, and in consequence of the location and use of the blacksmith shop the cinders, ashes, and smoke issuing therefrom were thrown in large quantities upon the plaintiff's house and land, rendering the water unfit for use and the house nearly untenable. The defendant was held liable. This is a case where an actual nuisance was established. The business was shown to be improperly conducted, making it a nuisance to plaintiff, by destroying his property for residence purposes. Also the case of Bowen v. Maury, 117 Ind. 258, 19 N. E. 528, where it was held that the business of blacksmithing and horseshoeing is lawful and not in itself a nuisance, and the presumption is that one about to engage therein will conduct the same in a proper manner. So, in the case of Ray v. Lynes, 10 Ala. 63, it is held: "A blacksmith shop in a small village is not, in judgment of law, a nuisance, so as to authorize a court of chancery to interpose by injunction and prevent its erection." Then: "Quære: Whether a blacksmith shop might not be so inartificially and improperly constructed as to be peculiarly liable to fire, and subject to be abated as a nuisance in a town." And appellants cite the case of Faucher v. Grass, 60 Iowa, 505, 15 N. W. 302, where it was held that "a blacksmith shop is not a nuisance per se, and a decree declaring a certain shop to be a nuisance, and restraining its further use as such, should not go so far as to restrain the further use of the lot on which the shop is situated, for such a shop." The judge, in writing the opinion of the court, says: "The shop may be so constructed with a view to deaden the noise of the anvil and other noises, the forges may be so placed, and the smoke and gases may be so conducted away, and the business may be so prosecuted, that the shop would not be regarded by the law as a nuisance. This may be true of a blacksmith shop erected on the site of the present shop, or at any other place upon the lots of the defendants. The cases of Tanner v. Albion, 5 Hill, 121, 40 Am. Dec. 337, and State v. Haines, 30 Me. 65, cited by appellee, are both for the suppression of bowling alleys, as nuisances, and much of the same character as that of Snyder v. Cabell, 29 W. Va. 48, 1 S. E. 241, wherein a skating rink was enjoined as a nuisance. Neither the bowling alley nor the skating rink is of any service to the community where it may exist, and just to the extent it interferes with the enjoyment of any of the residents in the locality, or causes any inconvenience, it is a nuisance, being of no use to the public in any way whatever. The case most favorable to ap-pellee, cited by him, is that of Whitaker v. Hudson, 65 Ga. 43, where it is held that, "though a blacksmith shop may not be a nuisance per se, yet the discretion of the chancellor enjoining its erection will not be controlled when the affidavits submitted as to whether the shop, under the circumstances of this particular case, would constitute a nuisance, preponderated in his opinion in favor of complainant." In the opinion the court says: "The granting of this injunction by the chancellor shows that the evidence in his opinion preponderated in favor of the complainant, and that he would allow a jury to pass thereon, and therefore we will not interfere with his judgment. And we will add that if he had refused it we should not have reversed it, but would have allowed the case to have gone before the jury, under the law, and let it be ascertained upon the trial whether, in the enjoyment and exercise of a clear legal right, which is not declared by the law or the courts to be a nuisance per se, it is possible that it may be so used as to become a legal injury and an infringement on the legal rights of others, and therefore a nuisance." From reading the opinion in that case, I take it that it was shown conclusively that the allegations of the bill were sustained, which were that the action of the defendants was done to annoy and weary plaintiff and his family, and to force him to purchase the land upon which the shop was proposed to be erected at double its real value, and it was alleged in the bill and admitted in the answer that defendants had another blacksmith shop in the same village. Appellee seems to rely confidently on the principle that where the depositions are conflicting, and different minds might reach different conclusions upon the facts, upon the testimony, the appellate court will decline to reverse the chancellor, even though the appellate court might have come to a different conclusion had it acted in the first instance, as announced in Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639, and many cases since. This case cannot come within the rule there laid down. The evidence is not in relation to existing facts and transactions had, but is something of a speculative character,—as to whether the shops can be so constructed and conducted as not to become a nuisance. If after the shops are opened and operated they prove to be a nuisance to plaintiff or others in the comfortable enjoyment of their property, they will be entitled to relief therefrom by the abatement of the nuisance, and the defendants will be held liable for damages.

For the reasons herein given the decrees of June 1 and October 12, 1898, are set aside and reversed, and the bill dismissed, but without prejudice to another suit or action in case the shops, when completed and operated, should become a nuisance to plaintiff.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF ROCK SPRINGS, Wyoming, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Richard FOSTER.

(.....Wyo.....)

1. A statute providing that three fourths of the jurors sitting in a civil case may concur in and render a verdict, and that such a verdict shall have the same force and effect as though found and returned by all the jurors, is not authorized by Const. art. 1, § 9, which provides that the right to trial by jury shall remain inviolate in criminal cases, but a jury in civil cases in all courts, or in criminal cases in courts not of record, may consist of less than twelve men, since the legislature is given no power to dispense with the unanimity of a verdict.
2. Failure to object to an instruction that three fourths of the jury may return a verdict does not waive the right to have the validity of the verdict considered on appeal, where the receiving and entering of the verdict are objected to, and an exception taken to the decision of the court in overruling the objection.

Messrs. Ben B. Lindsey and Fred W. Parks amici curiæ.

Corn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant in error brought suit against plaintiff in error upon a lost certificate of deposit. Under the instruction of the court that three fourths of the jury might concur in and return a verdict, a verdict for the plaintiff was returned signed by ten of the jurors, the other two refusing to concur. The defendant below objected to the verdict being received, for the reason that it was not unanimous, and therefore not a lawful verdict. The objection was overruled, and the verdict entered, and the defendant took its exception. Our Declaration of Rights (art. 1, § 9, of the Constitution) provides: "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate in criminal cases, but a jury in civil cases in all courts, or in criminal cases in courts not of record, may consist of less than twelve men, as may be prescribed by law. Hereafter a grand jury may consist of twelve men, any nine of whom concurring may find an indictment, but the legislature may change, regulate, or abolish the grand jury system." Rev. Stat. 1899, § 3651, provides that "in all civil cases in any of the courts of the state of Wyoming, which shall be tried by a jury, three fourths of the number of jurors sitting in any such case may concur in and return a verdict in said case, and such verdict shall have the same force and effect as though found and returned by all the jurors sitting in said case; but whenever such verdict is found and returned by a less number than twelve, said verdict shall be signed by each juror concurring therein." The plaintiff in error insists that the statute is in violation of the section of the Constitution above quoted, and this is the only important question presented. No other of the state Constitutions, so far as we are advised, contains precisely the same provision as ours, except that of Colorado. But the general question here involved has repeatedly been before the courts of this country for consideration, and certain propositions which lie at the threshold of the discussion are well settled. It is conceded that in almost all of the states the legislature may lawfully exercise, not only such powers as are specifically enumerated, but that it is invested with the entire legislative power of the state, except as restrained by the provisions of the Constitution. And our Constitution, in line with most of the others (art. 3, § 1), provides that "the legislative power shall be vested in a senate and house of representatives, which shall be designated 'the legislature of the state of Wyoming.'" It is also so well settled as to require no reference to authorities that when the Constitution secures to litigants the right of trial by jury the legislature has no power to deny or impair such right. The courts have uniformly held, also, that the word "jury," as used in our Constitutions, when not otherwise modified, means a common-law jury composed of twelve men, whose verdict shall be unanimous. As stated by the supreme court of Minnesota: "The expression 'trial by jury' is as old as Magna Charta, and has obtained a definite historical meaning, which is well understood by all English-speaking peoples; and for that reason no American Constitution has ever assumed to define it. We are therefore relegated to the history of the common law to ascertain its meaning. The essential and substantive attributes or elements of jury trial are, and always have been, number, impartiality, and unanimity. The jury must consist of twelve. They must be impartial and indifferent between the parties; and their verdict must be unanimous." Lommen v. Minneapolis Gaslight Co. 65 Minn. 196, 33 L. R. A. 437, 68 N. W. 53. An extended list of the cases is given in the note to State v. Bates (Utah) 43 L. R. A. 48. It is unquestioned, also, that at the adoption of the Constitution the right existed in Wyoming as at common law; that is, in felonies and in all common-law cases in the district court—our court of general common-law jurisdiction—the right was to an impartial jury of twelve men and a unanimous verdict. It is also conceded that the people of the state had the power by their Constitution to preserve or abrogate the right, or make such modifications of it, and establish such modes of trial, as might be deemed expedient. These general propositions being settled, the question before us is to ascertain to what extent the right of trial by jury, as above defined, is preserved by the section of the Declaration of Rights above quoted. As to the right in criminal cases there is no room for construction. The language is express that it shall remain inviolate; that is, that a person charged with crime has the right, as heretofore, to demand a trial by twelve impartial men, whose verdict must be unanimous in order to support a judgment. In civil cases the language is also express as to the matter of number,—one of the three essentials of a jury trial at common-law,—and the legislature is empowered to provide by law for juries consisting of less than twelve. There is no room for construction. But there is no specific mention in the section or anywhere in the Constitution of the third essential of unanimity. Is it, then, to be deemed a matter unprovided for, a right not preserved, leaving the legislature at full liberty to enact such laws upon the subject as it may deem proper, unrestrained by the Constitution? We do not think so. The whole section must be construed together. The subject of it is the right of trial by jury, and we think the intention of the framers reasonably appears to have been to preserve the right inviolate in criminal cases, and to point out, by way of permission to the legislature, wherein the common-law right might be invaded by statute in civil cases. It is as if the Constitution had said: "With reference to the right of trial by jury it is provided that in criminal cases it shall remain in all respects as heretofore. In civil cases it shall remain as heretofore, except that the legislature may provide for a number less than twelve to constitute a jury." There is no other reasonable construction; for, if a rule is to be applied that the legislature have power to enact any laws upon the subject unless prohibited in express language, then they may entirely abolish the right and practice of trial by jury in civil cases, for they are not expressly prohibited from so doing. Yet there appears nowhere in the Constitution any intention to abrogate the right or to substitute any other mode of trial. But the form of statement, when viewed in the light of the surroundings, makes it manifest that the intention was to preserve the right. The provision in regard to number is by way of permission, indicating clearly that in the judgment of the framers of the Constitution permission was necessary. It is also stated as an exception, the word "but" being used in its very customary meaning of "except." That it is stated as an exception is also shown by the use of the word "jury" itself. It cannot be supposed that the convention were ignorant of the legal meaning of the word, but they must be presumed to have used it in its correct legal sense of a body of twelve impartial men, whose verdict must be unanimous. And it is evident they did so use it. It is so used in the first clause securing the right inviolate in criminal cases. The provision that the number may be less than "twelve" is clear evidence that the word as used referred to the body universally known to be composed of twelve men. It is permission to the legislature to make a designated change in the common-law jury; to reduce the common-law number, twelve. It is not essential that a prohibition upon the legislature should be in express terms. It may be by implication. Page v. Allen, 58 Pa. 345, 98 Am. Dec. 272. It will scarcely be contended that an act would be valid providing for the trial of causes by a jury chosen by the plaintiff, or by the party by whom the jury was first demanded, thus disregarding the element of impartiality. Yet by the argument of counsel there is no prohibition upon such legislation. And it is, indeed, no more prohibited than a disregard of the element of unanimity is prohibited. Neither is prohibited except by the use of the word "jury," the plainly implied provision for "trial by jury" which, as matter of definition, necessarily involve and include both impartiality and unanimity of verdict. This view is fortified by reference to the remainder of the section (Const. art. 1, § 9) in regard to grand juries: "Hereafter a grand jury may consist of twelve men, any nine of whom concurring may find an indictment, but the legislature may change, regulate, or abolish the grand-jury system." Here it was deemed necessary, if the grand-jury system was to be changed or abolished by law, that the legislature should have express permission to take such action. But any such permission to change, regulate, or abolish the system of trial by jury is conspicuous by its absence. The reasonable conclusion is that there was no intention to give it, or to permit any interference with the right to the ancient, customary, and familiar mode of trial except in the one particular pointed out. Some other states adopting Constitutions in comparatively recent years have provided for the change in the jury system attempted in the act under consideration. But in every case, so far as our investigation has extended, the change has been made either by a direct constitutional provision, or by specific authority contained in the Constitution empowering the legislature to make it. Only in Colorado and this state has the attempt been made to accomplish the purpose by legislative enactment without express constitutional sanction. The question has not been directly passed upon by the Colorado court. But in Huston v. Wadsworth, 5 Colo. 213, the question was as to the power of the trial court to refer a common-law action without the consent of the parties. And in sustaining the procedure the supreme court of that state says: "Section 23 of the Bill of Rights, referred to in the appellant's brief, secures the right of trial by jury in criminal cases, but imposes no restriction upon the legislature in respect to the trial of civil causes." Subsequently a bill in substance the same as § 3651 of our statutes was pending before the legislature, and, upon its being referred to the attorney general, his opinion was that it was in conflict with the clause of the Constitution above quoted. Upon a further reference to the supreme court for their opinion, they say that the language of the court, as constituted when the decision in Huston v. Wadsworth was rendered, supports the constitutionality of the act. But under their rule in such cases they decline either to question or sanction the correctness of that opinion in an ex parte proceeding. Re Senate Bill, No. 142, 26 Colo. 167, 56 Pac. 564. The most that can be said, therefore, perhaps, is that the question of the constitutionality of the act is undetermined in Colorado. In order to sustain the constitutionality of this section of the statute, it is necessary for this court to say that there is no right of trial by jury in civil cases under the Constitution in this state, but that each succeeding session of the legislature may invent and establish any mode of trial that the whim of the hour or any supposed exigencies of convenience or economy might dictate. Under such a ruling it would be competent for the legislature to provide that the judge of the district should call into court the partisan board of county commissioners, and submit to them for decision by a majority vote all civil causes pending in any county. It is perfectly clear that no such revolutionary destruction of ancient landmarks was ever contemplated. The whole tenor of the instrument makes it plain that the ancient method of trial by jury was not to be abandoned, but was to be retained and preserved except as designated in the Constitution itself, and what the essentials of that method are is not a matter of construction or conjecture. We think the statute is clearly unconstitutional.

It is further objected that no exception was taken to the instruction of the court that three fourths of the jury might return a verdict, and that the defendant must be held to have waived its right. But the receiving and entering of the verdict were objected to, and exception taken to the decision of the court in overruling the objection. This exception brings the question regularly before this court for its decision, and the most that can be claimed is that the erroneous instruction will not be considered as a ground of reversal.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Potter, Ch. J., and Knight, J., concur.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Corn, J., on March 12, 1901, handed down the following response:

In the course of the trial in this case, the court instructed the jury that they might return a verdict upon the concurrence of three fourths of their number. The record shows no objection to this instruction by either party, and it seems that none was in fact made. But, upon the return of the jury into court with a verdict signed by ten of their number, the defendant, by its counsel, requested that the jury be polled. From the poll it appeared that only ten of the twelve jurymen concurred in the finding, and defendant then objected to the receiving and entry of the verdict, for the reason that it was not a lawful verdict. The court overruled the objection, and received the verdict, and plaintiff in error excepted.

The defendant in error insists that, by its failure to object to the instruction, plaintiff in error waived its right to object at any future stage of the proceedings to the acceptance of a verdict found by less than the whole number, and a great many authorities are cited in support of the proposition. We have read a large number of the cases cited, and have given a careful examination to those specially relied upon. They establish beyond controversy, if any authority was required, that error may be waived. It may be waived by consent, either express or implied, or by such conduct of the party as will estop him from afterwards objecting. But we fail to find any case holding a party to have consented when the action complained of was objected to before it was taken, and an exception preserved, at the time, to the decision of the court overruling such objection. Indeed, it would be a contradiction in terms to say that there was consent to the action of the court when such action was objected to before it was taken, and the court informed by an immediate exception that the objection would be insisted upon. But, where there has been no consent, illustrations are not wanting where a party, by his conduct or by his silence, loses his right to interpose objections which would otherwise be available. If, for instance, in support of his case, he introduces incompetent evidence, he cannot afterwards object if his opponent pursues the same line of evidence. He has opened the door. If he has joined in the trial of the cause upon a particular theory, he cannot afterwards be heard to object that it was a false theory. He is held to the theory which he maintained or to which by his silence he assented. But all such cases depend upon the principle that the court or his opponent has been led into error which, but for his apparent assent, it is presumed would have been corrected. And nothing of the kind appears in this case. The instruction to which he failed to object, and which, it is claimed, estops him from objecting to an illegal verdict, was a mere announcement to the jury that they might reach a verdict by the concurrence of three fourths of their number. It announces no principle of law nor any theory of the case. By his failure to object the court was not misled in its procedure, and opposing counsel was not betrayed into any step prejudicial to his own case. It is urged that counsel took an unfair advantage in offering no objection until he ascertained that the verdict was against him. But he took no advantage which was not equally open to counsel on the other side in case a verdict should have been adverse to him. He was not in bad faith with the court; for the court was not proceeding in the matter by consent of parties, but by authority of a void statute.

Moreover, it is the ultimate ruling in any case which constitutes available error. Elliott, App. Proc. § 590. If the jury had finally reached a unanimous verdict, the erroneous instruction would have been harmless to either party, unless, perhaps, actual prejudice could be shown by its influence upon the deliberations of the jury. The time to object and to save an exception is when the irregularity occurs. Thomp. Trials, 700. The irregularity complained of in this case was the acceptance of a verdict agreed to by less than the whole jury. The objection was in time for the court to correct its error, and direct the jury to retire for further deliberation.

It would not be practicable to refer to all the authorities cited by counsel, and keep this opinion within reasonable limits. But it may be proper to distinguish some of them from the case under consideration, choosing those which seem to be most relied upon. In Chicago Driving Park v. West, 35 Ill. App. 496, the case was tried by the court without a jury, and the appellant insisted in the appellate court that it was entitled to a trial by jury, and had not waived its right. The court disposed of the matter by saying: "If appellant desired a trial by jury, and had objected to the trial by the court, it would have been error to have denied him a jury; but as he was present by his counsel, and failed to interpose any objection of that kind, he waived his right to have the case submitted to a jury." Barnes v. Perine, 12 N. Y. 23, decides only that a party having treated the questions as purely legal, and acquiesced in the disposal of them by the court as such, cannot, on appeal, be heard to object that facts were involved which should have been decided by the jury. In Millett v. Hayford, 1 Wis. 401, the case was tried in the county court by a jury of six under the act creating the court. Plaintiff in error claimed that the statute was unconstitutional, in so far as it limited the jury to six persons. The court refused to consider the constitutional question upon the ground that the record did not show that the plaintiff in error made any objections to the jury, and that, in the absence of such objection, it must be presumed that he consented to submit his case to a jury, as allowed by the statute. In Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Bull, 52 Iowa, 554, 3 N. W. 564, a reversal was asked for upon the ground that the court permitted evidence to be introduced which was not justified by the pleadings. In affirming the judgment, the supreme court said that it was sufficient to say that no such objection was made to the introduction of the evidence in the court below, and that it was not even objected in general terms that the evidence was incompetent. In the case under consideration objection was made to receiving the verdict, the very action of the court which is complained of. In the cases cited the ground of the decision is that no objection was made. It is so evident that they and similar cases cited do not even tend to sustain the position of plaintiff in error that further comment upon them is unnecessary. But counsel insist that Farrell v. Hennessy, 21 Wis. 632, is very similar in some of its features to the case before us, and that it sustains counsel's contention. The jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff, and they were polled upon demand of defendant's counsel. One of the jurymen answered: "It was and is my verdict, but it is contrary to my conscience. I only consent to it because all the rest have given in for the plaintiff." The verdict, however, was received and recorded without any objection by the defendant. He subsequently moved to set it aside, upon affidavits showing the above facts, and, upon his motion being overruled, appealed to the supreme court. Even in the face of the fact that the verdict was received and recorded absolutely without objection, that court say they find no little difficulty in determining what should be the effect of a verdict received under the circumstances disclosed. They finally, however, reach the conclusion that the time to raise an objection of this nature is before the verdict is received, and when an opportunity exists for the jury to reconsider their verdict, and, if the objection is not then taken, it is waived. But they add that, even though no objection was taken at the time by the defeated party, it was clearly the duty of the court, upon its own motion, to have directed the jury to retire and reconsider their verdict. It is a little difficult to see how counsel for plaintiff in error find in this decision any support of their position, when it points out the very method pursued by the defendant in this case as the proper one, and declares the objection waived by a failure to adopt it. But there is one other decision, in the English case of Morrish v. Murrey, 13 Mees. & W. 52, which plaintiff in error claims to be decisive in its favor. The judge was of the opinion that one of the defendant's pleas was a sufficient answer to the action, and that it was proved, and that the judgment must be for the defendant. But he left it to the jury to say what amount of damages the plaintiff had sustained, so that, in the event of the court being of the opinion that the plea was not proved, the plaintiff might enter judgment for the damages so found by the jury. This course was unauthorized by law, and could only be pursued by the consent of the parties; but, neither party offering any objection, the jury returned their verdict assessing plaintiff's damages at one farthing. The court held that the judge was in error in holding the plea sufficient, and the plaintiff insisted that she was entitled to a new trial on the ground of misdirection. But the court held that, having consented to the assessment of the damages contingently, she was precluded from insisting upon the misdirection, and could only move to enter a verdict for the sum found by the jury. It is perfectly apparent that this case, like the others referred to, is distinguished from the one before us by the essential fact that the unauthorized act of the court was not objected to at the time it was committed.

We have gone into great, and perhaps unnecessary, detail in the discussion of the question presented. But we have done so out of deference to the great earnestness and unquestioned sincerity with which counsel have maintained the correctness of their views. We understand that the request for a rehearing upon the ground that this court erred in holding the statute in question to be unconstitutional, is no longer urged, the supreme court of Colorado having since announced the same conclusion in a very able and exhaustive opinion in the case of Denver v. Hyatt (Colo.) 63 Pac. 403.

A rehearing is denied.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

George L. FOOTE, Exr., etc., of Martha J. Nickerson, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

Stephen D. NICKERSON.

(.....N. H.....)

1. A man and wife cannot make a valid contract for a separation.
2. The statutes extending the power of husband and wife to contract as to property matters gives them no authority to enter into an agreement renouncing marital rights.
3. If covenants for separation and touching property rights occur in the same agreement between husband and wife, the legal part of the agreement touching the property rights will be upheld if the promises are separate and the consideration is divisible; but if the consideration is entire the whole must fail.
4. A mutual agreement between husband and wife to separate on friendly terms, and to make no future demands upon each other's property, carried out until the wife's death, will not prevent the husband from claiming his rights in her estate.
5. A husband separating from his wife by agreement is not within the terms of a statute depriving of his interest in his wife's estate a man who willingly abandons, absents himself from, or wilfully neglects to support, his wife for a certain time.
6. Disposition by will is not within the terms of a statute permitting the wife of a nonresident to convey her property as though sole.

(March 15, 1901.)

APPEAL by proponent from a decree of the Probate Court for Merrimack County requiring him to file an inventory and give bonds as executor of the estate of Martha J. Nickerson, deceased. Dismissed.

Proponent's mother, Martha J. White, was married to Stephen D. Nickerson in Maine, in 1891. On April 18, 1892, duplicate agreements, of one of which the following is a copy, were drawn up and executed by each, and delivered to the other.

Orrington, April 18, '92.

This is to certify that I, Stephen D. Nickerson, husband of Martha J. Nickerson, do mutually agree to separate on friendly terms, and to make no demand (neither me nor my heirs) on her, or her property, after this date.

Stephen D. Nickerson.
Orrington, Maine.

Mrs. Nickerson immediately removed to the state of New Hampshire, where she continued to live until her death, which occurred December 25, 1897. Mr. Nickerson, soon after the separation, published a notice refusing to be responsible for further bills contracted by his wife, and from that date ceased to contribute toward her support.

By her will Mrs. Nickerson left her husband the sum of $1, stating: "I make this small bequest because of his agreement to live separate from me, and to make no claim upon my estate in any way." The rest of the estate was bequeathed to her son, the appellant in this case.

Galusha v. Galusha (N. Y.) 6 L. R. A. 487, and note; Carey v. Mackey (Me.) 9 L. R. A. 113, and note; Blank v. Nohl (Mo.) 18 L. R. A. 350; and Henderson v. Henderson (Or.) 48 L. R. A. 766.

Mr. Nickerson waived the provision of the will in his favor, and made a claim for his share of the estate.

The court ordered the proponent as executor to file an inventory and bond, and decreed that Nickerson was entitled to his share of the estate. From this decree the proponent appeals.

Messrs. Sargent & Niles, for appellant: In Jewell v. McQuesten, 68 N. H. 233, 34 Atl. 742, it was held that a husband could not be prevented from claiming his distributive share of his wife's estate by proof of an agreement on his part not to claim any right, title, or interest in her property.

In the present case it appears that the property of the testatrix consisted of money belonging to her in her own right at the time of her marriage. And the provision of the contract that neither the husband nor his heirs would make any claim on her property negatives the possibility of interpreting the agreement as relating only to the duration of their married life. The court therefore has an opportunity of considering the question, not involved in that case, of the validity of an agreement of this character.

A question which we are unable to differentiate from this was considered by this court in Eaton v. Tewksbury, 41 Atl. 351, Advance Sheets. The husband and wife had, before marriage, made an agreement by which each waived all rights in the property of the other during marriage and after the death of either of them. After marriage the husband made a will in which was a legacy of $1,500 to the wife. He afterwards transferred to her securities of the value of $1,500, in consideration of which she executed an instrument releasing and quitclaiming to him all interest which she might have in his estate. The court held that, in view of the antenuptial agreement, the only interest which she had in her husband's estate at the time when this release was executed was the prospective legacy, and that her agreement with her husband to release this was binding, and would support a bill in equity by the executors to restrain the prosecution of a suit at law for the recovery of the legacy.

It is a matter of entire indifference whether the contract is treated as a Maine or as a New Hampshire contract. In either state the wife is free to make with her husband contracts affecting her separate estate.

Contracts made with persons under the special protection of the law, as minors and married women, cannot be avoided by the other party after the contract has been fully executed on the part of the married woman or minor.

Ham v. Boody, 20 N. H. 411, 51 Am. Dec. 235.

The petitioner brings himself within the terms of the statute by having for three years wilfully neglected to support his wife.

N. H. Pub. Stat. chap. 176, § 8, is as follows: "If a woman, the wife of an alien or of a citizen of another state, has resided in this state six months successively, separate from her husband, she may acquire and hold real and personal estate, and convey it the same as if she were sole and unmarried."

The word "convey" is ordinarily used with reference to transfers of real property, but it may also be employed to designate a transfer of personalty.

Leaycraft v. Hedden, 4 N. J. Eq. 512.

A will is, in contemplation of law, a conveyance.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 133, note 1.

Messrs. Charles Hamlin, Charles J. Hutchings, and Fred H. Gould, for appellee:

The writings of April 18, 1892, between the husband and wife, were not intended to bar each other's statutory rights after decease, etc. They were intended to operate during their separation, or the lives only of the parties, and ceased, at their death, to have any legal effect.

Jewell v. McQuesten, 68 N. H. 233, 34 Atl. 742; Newton v. Truesdale, 69 N. H. 634, 45 Atl. 646.

The validity and effect of these writings should be determined by the law of the state of Maine.

Carey v. Mackey, 82 Me. 521, 9 L. R. A. 113, 20 Atl. 84.

There is no statute in Maine whereby, by any writing or agreement, the right of the wife to a distributive share of the personal property of her husband, or the right of a husband to a distributive share in the personal property of the wife, may be barred or released after marriage.

If the covenant not to claim any part of the personal estate could be construed as a release, a release of a claim which has no present existence is inoperative. The contract, being executory, cannot avail by way of estoppel. It could not be broken so as to create any cause of action upon it until after a decree of distribution had been made.

Sullings v. Richmond, 5 Allen, 191, 81 Am. Dec. 742.

The parties were not legally capable of entering into such contract as they seem to have contemplated.

Peaslee, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One question presented for decision is whether the relation of husband and wife is one that the parties can dissolve or modify; whether the married status is so far within the control of the parties that its alteration is a result they can themselves effect, provided they agree upon the terms. It may fairly be said that the question is not settled by the decisions in this state. It has been touched upon incidentally, but in no case has it been directly involved. It therefore becomes necessary to examine the law on the subject elsewhere. Turning to other jurisdictions, it will be found that the question has been the subject of much litigation, and with varied results. Not only do the cases in one state conflict with those in other states, but in the same jurisdiction the views of one generation have often been held to be erroneous in later times. There is disagreement, not only as to what the law is, and what the policy on this subject should be, but also as to the history of the law, and how it was held to be in former times. In order, then, to reach a satisfactory solution of the question, it is essential to examine with some minuteness the historical aspect of the law applicable in this case.

The English cases decided before the Revolutionary War are conflicting, and many of them apparently imperfectly reported. The precise question here involved did not then come directly before the so-called "law courts." All causes concerning marriage and the marital status were tried in the ecclesiastical courts, which also had jurisdiction of the probate of wills and the administration of estates. 2 Bl. Com. 496. While, in a narrow sense, these were not common-law courts, they administered the unwritten law of the realm upon these subjects. Although the inferior judges were appointed by the ecclesiastics, the bishops themselves were nominated by the King. 1 Bl. Com. 280. In all causes an appeal might be taken to the King, who was represented by the court of delegates, appointed by him for that purpose. "This commission is frequently filled with lords, spiritual and temporal, and always with judges of the courts at Westminster and doctors of the civil law." 3 Bl. Com. 66. The law thus administered is a part of the common law of England. Reg. v. Mills, 10 Clark & F. 534, 671. To ascertain the state of the English common law as to divorce, suits for nullity, and other matters directly concerning the marital relation, recourse must be had to the decisions of those courts. The doctrine of either total or partial divorce by agreement of the parties found no favor there. They were not permitted to "release themselves by any private act of their own, or for causes which the law itself has not pronounced to be sufficient and sufficiently proved." Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 310, 318; 2 Roper, Husb. & W. 267. The rule that separation agreements are wholly void seems to have been adhered to from the earliest times until the court was abolished, in 1857, by the statute of 20 & 21 Vict. chap. 85. Smith v. Smith, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. Supp. 44, note; West- moath v. Westmoath, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. Supp. 1; Barlee v. Barlee, 1 Addams, Eccl. Rep. 301, 305; Nash v. Nash, 1 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 140. There are some very early cases wherein contracts of husbands with a third person concerning the support of their wives were enforced in chancery. In Seeling v. Crawley, 2 Vern. 386 (decided in 1700), Crawley, who had separated from his wife, made a contract with her father, Seeling, that the wife and a child should be supported at her father's house. Upon a bill brought by the father, in which the wife joined, performance of the husband's covenants was decreed. The contract did not depend upon a separation agreement. In other cases decided at about the same time the court seems to have proceeded partly upon the theory that in case of wrongdoing by the husband chancery had power to decree separate maintenance. Ozenden v. Ozenden, 2 Vern. 493; Nicholls v. Danvers, 2 Vern. 671. These cases may have resulted from confused ideas about the respective jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical and chancery courts incident to and following after the abolition of the former during the Commonwealth. 1 Fonblanque, Eq. 97, note n. The early cases in the law and equity courts which really bear upon this question are those wherein the validity of the agreement was incidentally drawn in question.* Of these one of the earliest that is reported is Lister's Case, 8 Mod. 22, decided in 1721. A wife, living separate from her husband under an agreement, sued out a writ of habeas corpus to be freed from imprisonment by him in the Mint. The court said: "An agreement between husband and wife to live separate, and that she shall have a separate maintenance, shall bind them both until they both agree to cohabit again; and, if the wife be willing to return to her husband, no court will interpose or obstruct her. But, as to the coercive power which the husband has over his wife, it is not a power to confine her: for by the law of England she is entitled to all reasonable liberty, if her behavior is not very bad." According to this report the decision was put upon two grounds,—that the agreement cut off the husband's rights, and that his rights did not, in any event, entitle him to such means of coercion. Strange reports the case somewhat differently. He says: "And, all this matter appearing, and that he declared he took her into his power in order to prevail with her to part with some of her separate maintenance, the chief justice declared, and all the rest agreed, that where the wife will make an undue use of her liberty, either by squandering away her husband's estate, or go into lewd company, it is lawful for the husband, in order to preserve his honor and estate, to lay such a wife under restraint. But, where nothing of that appears, he cannot justify the depriving her of her liberty: that there was no color for what he did in this case, there being a separation by consent." s. c., sub nom. Rex v. Lister, 1 Strange, 478. If the latter report states the opinion correctly, the case is not authority for the proposition that such agreements are valid. It only decides that the husband may lay the wife under restraint when she squanders his property, or goes into lewd company, and that her mere leaving him in accordance with their mutual agreement does not make out a cause for such action. In 1725, More v. Ellis, Bunbury, 205, was decided. The wife of Sir Cleave More had a separate estate, payable by trustees to whom she should appoint. She was living apart from him in adultery. Upon his forcibly retaking her, she appointed a portion of the property to him in consideration of his promise to allow her to live separate. The execution of the power was held to be good. There was no discussion of the validity of the agreement to live apart. This case has been somewhat relied upon as upholding separation agreements, but the better opinion is that it merely decides that she might give the property to whom she chose, and that without any consideration. 2 Roper, Husb. & W. 294, note. Fitzer v. Fitzer, 2 Atk. 511 (decided in 1742), related to a contract to maintain the wife at a place other than her husband's residence. The decision was that the agreement of the husband to so far perform his marital duty was binding upon him. In 1747, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said: "I do not find that this court ever made a decree for establishing a perpetual separation betwixt husband and wife, or to compel a husband to pay a separate maintenance to his wife, unless upon an agreement between them; and even upon this unwillingly." Head v. Head, 3 Atk. 547. In 1757, a writ of habeas corpus was issued at the instance of John Wilkes to obtain the custody of his wife, who was living with her relatives under a separation agreement. The court held this agreement to be a formal renunciation by the husband of his marital right to seize her or force her back to live with him. Rea v. Mead, 1 Burr. 542. In view of the decision in Lister's Case, 8 Mod. 22, that he had no such right to renounce, the case cannot be considered a satisfactory authority. "When I see such dicta as occur in the case of Rea v. Mead falling from great men, and establishing a course of decision that can be demonstrated to stand upon no principle consistent with the law of the land, I feel great difficulty in deciding upon such authority." Lord Eldon in St. John v. St. John, 11 Ves. Jr. 523, 529. Its value is further impaired by a decision of the court of chancery, rendered the same year, dismissing a bill so far as it related to the setting up of an agreement to live separate. Wilkes v. Wilkes, 2 Dick. 791. In 1776 it was decided that a married woman living apart from her husband could not be sued as a feme sole, "except in the known excepted cases of abjuration, exile, and the like, where the husband is considered as dead, and the woman as a widow." Hatchett v. Baddeley, 2 W. Bl. 1079, 1082. The same conclusion was reached in another case, decided two years later. Lean v. Schutz, 2 W. Bl. 1195.

subject (which became the common law of this state, so far as applicable to conditions here) was that as to the settlement of estates, suits of nullity of marriage, and such limited divorce as was then granted, a separation agreement was wholly void. It was refused recognition in chancery, and even in the law courts its efficacy was denied by the later cases. The only case actually deciding that such an agreement was a valid modification of the marriage contract was Rea v. Mead, 1 Burr. 542, and this was not followed in the cases in 2 W. Bl. Contemporary judges and text writers understood this to be the state of the law. It was so laid down by Lord Mansfield, who had been chief justice of the King's bench since 1756, and who, shortly after the decision of these cases, thought that the law should be held otherwise because of changed conditions. Ringsted v. Butler, 3 Dougl. 197, 203; Barwell v. Brooks, 3 Dougl. 371, 373; Corbett v. Poelnitz, 1 T. R. 5. The modern English doctrine differs widely from this, and an examination of its origin and development shows that it is a departure from the old law, and not merely an adaptation of recognized principles to changed conditions. It was immediately after the rendition of the decisions reported by Blackstone that changes in the law began to be made. In 1783, Lord Mansfield, while admitting that the common law was otherwise, held that an agreement for separation bound both parties as though they were sole. The point at issue was whether the wife could be sued alone. The fact that these agreements had come into use, and by them separate estates had been given to wives, who, for that reason, ought to be liable to suit, was considered to be of controlling importance. The question of the effect of the decision upon the marital status was not discussed. Ringsted v. Butler, 3 Dougl. 197. The object of the decision plainly was to accomplish what has been done here by legislation. It gave married women a limited power to contract and sue and be sued. A similar result was reached the following year. Lord Mansfield said: "The fashion of the times has introduced an alteration, and now husband and wife may, for many purposes, be separated and possess separate property, a practice unknown to the old law." Barwell v. Brooks, 3 Dougl. 371, 373. In 1794 the new doctrine was affirmed in the leading case of Corbett v. Poelnitz, 1 T. R. 5. Lord Mansfield again justified the result by reasoning similar to that just quoted. These cases "introduced a new principle into the English law respecting the relation of husband and wife; but a principle that was familiar to the Roman law, and to the municipal law of most of the nations of Europe." 2 Kent, Com. 159. It was natural that this principle should appeal to Lord Mansfield, whose work is so distinguished for its upbuilding of commercial law. So long as he remained upon the bench these cases were followed. Accordingly, in 1788, Mr. Justice Buller said that separation deeds were valid when fairly entered into, and that courts of equity had jurisdiction to enforce them. Fletcher v. Fletcher, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 99. In another case he said that it had been decided that by agreement the parties could make the wife a feme sole as to everything but the right of remarriage. Compton v. Collinson, 2 Bro. Ch. 377. The case went off upon another point, and the cases upon this question are not cited. Acquiescence in the doctrine of Corbett v. Poelnitz was by no means uniform. The case "gave rise to great scrutiny and criticism. It was considered as a deep and dangerous innovation upon the ancient law." 2 Kent, Com. 159. Lord Mansfield retired in 1788. His successor, Lord Kenyon, had passed most of his life as a law writer for more successful practitioners, and as a judge of an inferior court in a remote part of the Kingdom. His reverence for the law was as great as Mansfield's devotion to progressive ideas. The effect of the change is plainly traceable in the decisions upon this subject. In 1790 the case of Compton v. Collinson, 2 Bro. Ch. 377, having been sent out from chancery for the opinion of the court of common pleas upon the law, Lord Loughborough said that the question of a separated wife's liability to suit was still an open one. Compton v. Collinson, 1 H. Bl. 334. In the same year the ecclesiastical court again declared its adherence to the doctrine heretofore noticed. Nash v. Nash, 1 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 140. In 1792 the chancery court, following the dictum of Justice Buller in Fletcher v. Fletcher, decreed specific performance of articles of separation, in the face of the husband's offer to return and live with his wife. Guth v. Guth, 3 Bro. Ch. 614. This case was never considered sound. Soon after its decision Lord Loughborough denied equity jurisdiction of suits involving the marital relation. Legard v. Johnson, 3 Ves. Jr. 352, decided in 1797. Again, in 1792, Justice Buller expressed his adherence to the law as held by Lord Mansfield. A writ of habeas corpus was directed, at the instance of J. Greygoose, to bring up the body of his wife. It was alleged that she was detained by the defendant, and living with him in adultery. One defense set up, but not fully pleaded, was a separation contract, and Rea v. Mead, 1 Burr. 542, was relied upon. Justice Buller said: "If this case turn out on further examination to be like that in Burrow I am strongly inclined to think that this would be an answer to the writ. But that is not at present made out." Rea v. Winton, 5 T. R. 89. The chief justice was absent when this decision was rendered. The question was first considered by Lord Kenyon in 1794, when he declared that, if changes in the law were needed, they must be made by the legislature. The authority of Corbett v. Poelnitz was doubted, but the nonliability of the defendant was finally put upon other grounds. Ellah v. Leigh, 5 T. R. 679. This was after Justice Buller had retired from the King's bench, to accept a seat upon the common bench. Two years later, when speaking of the same subject, Lord Kenyon said: "We must not, by any whimsical conceits, supposed to be adapted to the faltering fashions of the times, overturn the established law of the land. It descended to us as a sacred charge, and it is our duty to preserve it." Clayton v. Adams, 6 T. R. 604. A decision of his in 1793 has sometimes been referred to as inconsistent with the views expressed in the cases just cited. In a suit for the seduction of a wife the defense was set up that before the commission of the acts complained of the husband and wife had voluntarily separated. It was decided that this went to the merits of the action. Weedon v. Timbrell, 5 T. R. 357. The real ground of the decision was that this action is not maintainable by one who has abandoned the right upon which the action is founded. It does not decide that rights had been acquired under a valid contract. In harmony with this view, the same judge held that the fact that the husband was living in adultery was a bar to his suit. Wyndham v. Wycombe, 4 Esp. 16. While this decision was erroneous (Cross v. Grant, 62 N. H. 675, and cases cited), it is of importance as showing that Weedon v. Timbrell was not based upon the proposition that a separation agreement is a valid contract. In 1800 the question involved in Corbett v. Poelnitz came before Lord Eldon. He refrained from deciding it, because it was then pending in a case which was soon to be argued before all twelve judges; but he reviewed the cases, and manifestly was of the opinion that the decision of Lord Mansfield was unsound, and that Rea v. Mead, 1 Burr. 542, was not an authority for the validity of separation agreements. Beard v. Webb, 2 Bos. & P. 93. In the case there referred to the question was fairly presented for decision. It was twice argued before all the judges except Justice Buller, who was incapacitated by the illness of which he died shortly thereafter. All concurred in the opinion of the chief justice, overruling Corbett v. Poelnitz. Lord Kenyon said: "If . . . the parties were competent to contract at all, it would then become material to consider how far a compact could be valid which has for its object the contravention of the general policy of the law in settling the relations of domestic life, and which the public is interested to preserve; and which, without dissolving the bond of marriage, would place the parties in some respects in the condition of being single, and leave them in others subject to the consequences of being married, and which would introduce all the confusion and inconvenience which must necessarily result from so anomalous and mixed a character. In the course of the argument some of these difficulties were pointed out, and it was asked whether, after such an agreement as this, the temporal courts could prohibit if either party were to sue in the ecclesiastical court for the restitution of conjugal rights; whether the wife, if she committed a felony in the presence of her husband, would be liable to conviction; whether they could be witnesses for and against each other; whether they could sue and take each other in execution? And many other questions will occur to everyone to which it will be impossible to give satisfactory answer. For instance, it may be asked how it can be in the power of any persons by their private agreement to alter the character and condition which by law results from the state of marriage while it subsists and from thence to infer rights of action and legal responsibilities as consequences following from such alteration of character and condition; or how any power short of that of the legislature can change that which, by the common law of the land, is established as the course of judicial proceedings." Marshall v. Rutton, 8 T. R. 545. Chief Justice Eyre of the common pleas, who retired shortly after the first argument of the case, also concurred in this opinion.

It was thus that the law stood until the death of Lord Kenyon, in 1802. During that year a case arose involving the validity of an agreement between George Chambers, his wife, and certain trustees. The husband agreed that in case of a future separation the wife might live where she chose, without molestation from him, and that he would make certain payments to the trustees for her. A separation took place. The payments were not made, and the trustees sued on the covenant. The case was argued upon the general invalidity of separation agreements, and especially upon the point that an agreement looking to a future separation is illegal. Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., held the contract to be valid, upon the ground that "the question which has been agitated appears to have been laid at rest for a long period by repeated decisions and the uniform practice of the courts." So far as the agreement related to a future separation, he declared it was no worse than others which had been upheld. Rodney v. Chambers, 2 East, 283. The case of Nicholls v. Danvers, 2 Vern. 671, was relied upon as authority for the proposition. It is true that, taking that case as reported by Vernon, such a holding might, perhaps, be inferred. There was such an agreement between the parties, but the court did not enforce it. Proceedings for cruelty had been had in the ecclesiastical court (1 Fonblanque, Eq. 97, note), and this was merely an application for alimony in accordance with the practice in the chancery courts after the Restoration. Thus, in two years' time, at the first term presided over by Lord Ellenborough, the conservative doctrines laid down by Lord Kenyon were disapproved of, and a decision was rendered of so radical a nature that it finds no support in the cases preceding it, and has not since been followed as an authority. A side light upon this case is seen in the reference to the wife as "the Honorable Jane Rodney," and to the husband as "George Chambers." In the following year Lord Eldon expressed a strong disapproval of Rodney v. Chambers, and of the whole doctrine of separation agreements. He suggested, however, that the practice of upholding them to a limited extent (that is, as to property rights) might have become too firmly established to be overturned. The case went off upon a question of pleading, and was then settled by the parties. St. John v. St. John, 11 Ves. Jr. 526. In 1804 the master of the rolls recognized the validity of an agreement to pay an annuity to a separated wife, without discussion of the question. Cooke v. Wiggins, 10 Ves. Jr. 191. In 1806 the common pleas, by a divided court, held that an unfulfilled agreement to pay a separate allowance did not free the husband from liability for necessities thereafter furnished to his separated wife. Nurse v. Craig, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 148. Sir James Mansfield, Ch. J., dissented, following the reasoning of Lord Mansfield in the earlier cases. In Worrall v. Jacob, 3 Meriv. 256, 268 (decided in 1817), Sir William Grant, master of the rolls, said: "I apprehend it to be now settled that this court will not carry into execution articles of separation between husband and wife. It recognizes no power in them to vary the rights and duties growing out of the marriage contract, or to effect, at their pleasure, a partial dissolution of that contract. It should seem to follow that the court would not acknowledge the validity of any stipulation that is merely accessory to an agreement for separation. The object of the covenants between the husband and the trustee is to give efficacy to the agreement between the husband and the wife; and it does seem rather strange that the auxiliary agreement should be enforced, while the principal agreement is held to be contrary to the spirit and the policy of the law." He also quotes from Lord Eldon, as follows: "If this were res integra, untouched by dictum or decision, I would not have permitted such a covenant to be the foundation of an action or a suit in this court. But if dicta have followed dicta, or decision has followed decision, to the extent of settling the law, I cannot, upon any doubt of mine as to what ought originally to have been the decision, shake what is the settled law upon the subject." St. John v. St. John, 11 Ves. Jr. 526. Accordingly, effect was given to an appointment by a separated wife of property deeded by the husband to trustees in consideration of their agreement to save him harmless from his wife's debts, etc. Shortly thereafter the ecclesiastical court again reiterated its adherence to the view that these agreements are void. "These courts, therefore, to which the law has appropriated the right of adjudicating upon the nature of the matrimonial contract, have uniformly rejected such covenant as insignificant in a plea of bar, and leave it to other courts to enforce them, so far as they may deem proper upon a more favorable view (if they entertain it) of their consistency with the principles of the matrimonial contract." Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 310, 318. In 1821 a bill in equity was brought for the cancellation of separation deeds upon the ground that they were contrary to the policy of the law and void. The bill was dismissed for the reason that, if the plaintiff's contention was sound, it was as good a defense to the deed at law as in equity. Lord Eldon, again considering the question at some length, said: "I perceive that it seems to have struck everyone as extraordinary that such deeds should ever have been supported. . . . It has always seemed to me very difficult to hold these deeds legal. It seems to be admitted that a mere agreement to live separate is one that would not be deemed valid; and it seems strange, as Sir William Grant observes, that, if the primary object be vicious, these auxiliary provisions should be held good, and thereby that which the law objects to should be carried into effect." Westmeath v. Westmeath, Jac. 126, 141, 142. Other chancery judges entertained different views. Upon demurrer to a bill brought to recover arrears of an annuity due under a separation agreement, Richards, lord chief baron of the exchequer, said: "The question is, not what the law ought to be, but what it is; and the opinions of judges, however great and learned, are not to be put in competition with decisions determining the point and settling the law." Baron Graham said: "The language of regret is certainly found to be used by many of the judges; but the law is clearly established, and such demands have been constantly enforced." Notwithstanding this declared confidence in the settled state of the law, the chief baron also said that the case involved "a grave question, of too great importance to be disposed of on demurrer." Ros v. Willoughby, 10 Price, 2, decided in 1822. Cases following soon after this held that separation deeds are valid, so far as they relate to an annuity for the wife (Jee v. Thurlow [1824] 2 Barn. & C. 547; Wilson v. Mushett [1832] 3 Barn. & Ad. 743); but invalid if the separation does not take place until a future day (Hindley v. Westmeath [1827] 6 Barn. & C. 200). In 1835 the question first came before the House of Lords. A Scotch nobleman had obtained a divorce from his wife in the courts of that country, and one question was whether the wife was within the jurisdiction of the court, and duly served with process. The decision turned upon the fact as to her residence, and, as she was living apart from her husband under a separation agreement, it was argued that she was no longer domiciled where he was. In speaking of the agreement, Lord Brougham said: "What is the legal value or force of this kind of agreement in our law? Absolutely none whatever, in any court whatever, for any purpose whatever, save and except one only,—the obligation contracted by the husband with trustees to pay certain sums to the wife, the cestui que trust. In no other point of view is any effect given by our jurisprudence, either at law or in equity, to such a contract. No damages can be recovered for its breach; no specific performance of its articles can be decreed. No court, civil or consistorial, can take notice of its existence. So far has the 54 L. R. A.

legal presumption of cohabitation been carried by the common-law courts that the most formal separation can only be given in mitigation of damages, and not at all as an answer to an action for criminal conversation, the ground of which is the alleged loss of comfort in the wife's society; and all the evidence that can be adduced of the fact of living apart, and all the instruments that can be produced binding the husband to suffer the separate residence of his wife,—may, even when he has for himself stipulated for her living apart, and laid her under conditions that she should never come near him,—all is utterly insufficient to repel the claim which he makes for the loss of her society, without doing any act either in court or in pais to determine the separation or annul the agreement." Lord Lyndhurst said: "The strongest articles of separation may be drawn up and signed with full acquiescence of the husband and wife, yet he may sue her and she may sue him notwithstanding." Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Clark & F. 488, 527, 561. In the same year the case of Waite v. Jones, 1 Bing. N. C. 656, was decided in the court of common pleas. The plaintiff sued for money agreed to be paid in consideration of his executing a deed of separation from his wife. The defense was that the promise to execute the deed was illegal, and vitiated the whole agreement. The court held that agreements for future separation, or promises of payments to induce the same, are illegal; but that an agreement for a present separation may be valid. It was admitted that a promise to separate in consideration of a sum of money was not binding; but this agreement was upheld because it might be inferred that the separation had already taken place, and it did not affirmatively appear that this promise induced such action. Upon appeal to the exchequer chamber, the decision was affirmed by a divided court. Lord Denman, Ch. J., dissenting, disapproved of separation deeds, and said: "If I could venture to lay down the principle which alone seems to be safely deducible from all these cases, it is this: That when a husband has by his deed acknowledged his wife to have a just cause of separation from him, and has covenanted with her natural friends to allow her a maintenance during separation on being relieved from liability to her debts, he shall not be allowed to impeach the validity of that covenant." Jones v. Waite, 5 Bing. N. C. 341. The judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, and the contract was upheld in a brief opinion. Jones v. Waite (1842) 4 Mann. & G. 1104.

From this time on it seems to have been the law of England that such contracts are enforceable, except as to the one provision, which is of their essence. Courts accept the rule, while acknowledging the lack of reason for it. "It is in vain to regret the perplexities in which the courts have found themselves involved by enforcing the minor and auxiliary parts of the agreement to separate, while they profess to repudiate the principal and essential part and motive of it." Frampton v. Frampton (1841) 4 Beav. 287, 293. In 1848, the House of Lords held unequivocally that a separation agreement is a valid contract, and specific performance of the covenants of the deed was decreed. Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 538. The case goes solely upon the ground of recent decisions, admitting that the holding is opposed to earlier precedents. The deed was made to settle the wife's suit for nullity in the ecclesiastical court, and the case might have been distinguished on that ground. Shortly after this, Lord Romilly, master of the rolls, enjoined the breach of a covenant not to interfere with the wife, who was living separate. The upholding of separation deeds "in a great number of cases" is the only reason assigned for the decision. Sanders v. Rodway (1852) 16 Beav. 207. The doctrine of these later cases was not wholly approved of, and in 1858 the court declared that the very basis of the contract was an agreement which could not be enforced in any court. Vansittart v. Vansittart, 2 De G. & J. 249. In most cases, however, the general tendency towards upholding the agreement was followed. Webster v. Webster, 1 Smale & G. 489; Randle v. Gould, 8 El. & Bl. 457; Williams v. Baily, L. R. 2 Eq. 731; Rowley v. Rowley, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 63; Gibbs v. Harding, L. R. 3 Eq. 492. Lord Chancellor Westbury, in 1862, enjoined a suit for restitution which had been begun in the divorce court, contrary to the stipulation of a separation deed. The divorce court had succeeded to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court in 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. chap. 85), and administered the law in a similar manner (Id. § 22). The chancellor justified the decision by reasoning that separation deeds were valid, although the ecclesiastical doctrine was different, because by a statute of Henry VIII. the ecclesiastical law was subordinated to the common law; that the decision of the House of Lords in Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 538, overruling the earlier cases, must be treated like a statute; and that, while a voluntary separation was an offense against the ecclesiastical law, it was not one against the common law, and therefore, the rights in controversy were only private, and public policy was not involved. Hunt v. Hunt, 4 De G. F. & J. 221. The case was appealed to the House of Lords, but no decision was rendered, as Mrs. Hunt died pendente lite. See Brown v. Brown, L. R. 7 Eq. 185, 191. The reasoning of this case does not seem to have been followed, but its conclusions have been adopted. In 1879, Sir William Jessel, master of the rolls, treated the question as settled by the later cases. "For a great number of years both ecclesiastical judges and lay judges thought it was something very horrible, and against public policy, that husband and wife should agree to live separate; and it was supposed that a civilized country could not longer exist if such agreements were enforced by courts of law, whether ecclesiastical or not. But a change came over judicial opinion as to public policy, and other considerations arose, and people began to think that, after all, it might be better and more beneficial for married people to avoid in many cases the expense and the scandal of suits of divorce by settling their differences quietly by the aid of friends out of court, although the consequence might be that they would live separately; and that was the view carried out by the courts when it became once decided that separation deeds were not per se against public policy." Besant v. Wood, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 605. In that case the agreement provided that each party should have the custody of one child. Afterwards the father sued for and obtained custody of the one with the mother, the court treating the agreement touching that subject as void. Thereupon the wife sought to renew cohabitation, "but the court deemed that the policy of the law made her agreement for separation controlling over her, and the consideration for it void as to him. This exquisitely refined principle of high honor does not pertain to the laws of so young a people as we are." 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 634a, note. In the same year it was again decided that an agreement not to demand restitution of conjugal rights is a valid contract, and that, since by the judicature act of 1873 all defenses are made available in the divorce courts that would be available in equity, the covenant is a bar to proceedings for restitution. Marshall v. Marshall, L. R. 5 Prob. Div. 19. Finally, in 1888, it was decided that a trustee is no longer necessary, and that the parties may make the contract directly with each other. McGregor v. McGregor, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 529. This decision is expressly put upon common-law grounds, and in no way depends upon statutes enlarging the powers of married women.

It appears that the present position of the English courts has been reached by means of a gradual abandonment of common-law doctrines. It originated in the undoubted proposition that an agreement by the husband to support his wife is not in violation of marital obligation, but a part performance of the duties thereby imposed. From this has come the whole elaborate system of annuities and other property arrangements, each finding its real, if not ostensible, consideration in an agreement to live separate. For a time some other consideration was always shown; as, for example, the promise of a third person to furnish support to the wife. Later this concession to the old law was abandoned; and, while courts acknowledged the inconsistency of their position, they enforced property arrangements that depended solely upon a principal agreement which was declared to be invalid. Nor did fallacious reasoning stop here. The argument next advanced was that, while it was true courts in words denied the validity of these agreements, by judgments enforcing provisions dependent upon them the judges really decided that separation agreements were good contracts. It was not without some vigorous protest that this line of argument was accepted as sound, but it finally prevailed. In one phase after another it was adopted, until now it seems to be held that as to everything but the right to remarry the parties may divorce themselves. This wide departure from the common law has been induced by conditions which do not exist here. The arrangement of property matters through trustees, which forms so large a part of English conveyancing that half of the property in England is vested in nominal owners (2 Kent, Com. 182), is practically unknown in this state. It is to the conveyancers, and their eagerness in seizing upon each new opportunity for arranging property matters, that the present results are largely due. Running through many of the opinions is found the idea that these conveyances are now so common that the titles to large amounts of property depend upon them, and therefore they cannot safely be disturbed. Another fruitful source of such agreements was that there was practically no divorce from the bonds of matrimony in England. These causes do not exist here. The decisions which were in part induced by such conditions and in part by the notions of the times as to "social policy" (Wennhak v. Morgan, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 635), are not authority here when in conflict with the common law. The doctrine adhered to by Lord Kenyon, that if changes in the law are needed, they must be made by the legislature, still prevails in this state. The modern English rule has not been generally adopted in this country. Few, if any American courts have ever gone so far as to enforce an agreement to live in separation, or have even sustained covenants incident to such an agreement, except upon facts assumed to be sufficient to avoid a holding that the promise to live apart is valid. In a few states it is declared that these agreements are wholly void. Collins v. Collins, 62 N. C. 153, 93 Am. Dec. 606; Simpson v. Simpson, 4 Dana, 140, 142. The general doctrine of these cases does not seem to differ materially from that of most of the American authorities, but the application of the rule to contracts in part dependent upon an illegal covenant is more logical and satisfactory. Some of the late decisions in New York approach more nearly to the modern English theory than those in other states. The great number of reported cases in which these agreements are involved in one way or another shows that they have come to be in common use there. As in England, the law supporting them has developed from small beginnings. In 1811, in the case of Baker v. Barney, 8 Johns. 72, 5 Am. Dec. 326, it was decided that a husband who had provided suitably for a separated wife was not liable for goods thereafter furnished to her, but that, in the absence of such provision, he was liable for necessities, in spite of her agreement to the contrary. There was no discussion of the validity of agreements to live separate, and the case is disposed of in a brief per curiam opinion. Two years later it was relied upon as an authority for the proposition that upon the execution of a separation agreement the marriage union "essentially ceased," and therefore the husband and wife were competent witnesses for or against each other. Fenner v. Lewis, 10 Johns. 38. The weight of this case is much lessened by the later opinion of the then chief justice. "The general principle is established that the law does not authorize or sanction a voluntary agreement for a separation between husband and wife. . . . A private separation is an illegal contract, a renunciation of stipulated duties from which the parties cannot release themselves by any private act of their own. . . . Nothing can be clearer or more sound than this conjugal doctrine." 2 Kent, Com. 176, note b. It was next held that a bond for separate maintenance, which was assumed to be based upon a contract to continue to live apart, was valid and enforceable so long as the separation continued. Baker v. Barney, 9 Johns. 72, 5 Am. Dec. 326, was relied upon, and no distinction was noted between agreements which do and those which do not depend upon a covenant to live apart. Shelthar v. Gregory (1829) 2 Wend. 422. Relying upon these cases, Chancellor Walworth, although joining in Lord Eldon's expressions of regret at the state of the law, held that an agreement for an immediate separation was valid if made through a trustee. Carson v. Murray (1832) 3 Paige, 483. The opinion also stated that a return to cohabitation would restore the husband to all his marital rights. The logic by which it is held that the mere agreement to live apart is invalid, and that the covenant as to maintenance can be sustained only through a trustee, leads inevitably to the conclusion that the covenant does not in any way affect marital rights. When it is also held that a return to cohabitation restores such rights, and puts an end to the contract with the trustee, it becomes evident that the true reason which led the court to sustain the agreement in the first instance was not given. If the covenant did not affect marital rights, its rescission could not restore them. If the rescission of the covenant was a necessary accompaniment of the restoration of marital rights, its original execution must have had to do with taking them away. This decision fairly illustrates the course taken in other cases in the court of chancery. Rogers v. Rogers, 4 Paige, 516, 27 Am. Dec. 84; Heyer v. Burger, Hoffm. Ch. 1; Champlin v. Champlin, Hoffm. Ch. 55; Anderson v. Anderson, 1 Edw. Ch. 380; People v. Merocein, 8 Paige, 47. These cases were not always approved of. In Merocein v. People, 25 Wend. 64, 77, Justice Bronson said: "It is well worthy of consideration whether all agreements based on the voluntary separation of husband and wife are not contrary to law, and absolutely void." Chief Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court denying to such an agreement the effect of placing the wife on the footing of a feme sole as to suits at law, said that in courts of law the agreement was "condemned as waste paper by the soundest principles of policy, morality, and law." Beach v. Beach, 2 Hill, 260, 38 Am. Dec. 584. In many of the later cases agreements for support and as to property have been upheld, apparently without much regard to whether they in fact depended upon a covenant to continue to live separate (Carpenter v. Osborn, 102 N. Y. 552, 7 N. E. 823; Pettit v. Pettit, 107 N. Y. 677, 14 N. E. 500; Galusha v. Galusha, 116 N. Y. 635, 6 L. R. A. 487, 22 N. E. 1114; Clark v. Fosdick, 118 N. Y. 7, 6 L. R. A. 132, 22 N. E. 1111, 23 N. E. 136), until the court declared in terms that "it is settled in this state that a contract between a husband and wife who have separated to thereafter live apart is not void on the ground of public policy" (Duryea v. Bliven, 122 N. Y. 567, 25 N. E. 908). This proposition is perhaps modified or explained by the very recent opinion in which the court said that "it must be borne in mind that a contract between husband and wife is void at law, and upheld solely in equity, and then not in every case, but only when the provision for the maintenance of the wife or children is suitable and equitable." Hungerford v. Hungerford, 161 N. Y. 550, 553, 56 N. E. 117, 118. In some other late cases agreements of this sort are disapproved of. Poillon v. Poillon, 49 App. Div. 341, 63 N. Y. Supp. 301; Whitney v. Whitney, 4 App. Div. 597, 36 N. Y. Supp. 891, 39 N. Y. Supp. 1136; Friedman v. Bierman, 43 Hun. 387.

In Massachusetts, actions to enforce the husband's agreement to pay money to or for a separated wife have been sustained. Page v. Trufant, 2 Mass. 159, 3 Am. Dec. 41; Holbrook v. Comstock, 16 Gray, 109; Fox v. Davis, 113 Mass. 255, 18 Am. Rep. 476. The question of the validity of such an agreement when inseparable from a covenant to continue to live apart arose in Albee v. Wyman, 10 Gray, 222. The court considered the English rule to be open to grave objections, and disposed of the case upon other grounds. In a recent case the agreement was sustained because the covenant to pay money for support was separable from others which were objectionable. Grime v. Borden, 166 Mass. 198, 44 N. E. 216.

In the United States courts agreements for a separate maintenance are upheld. Whether they would be if they depended upon an agreement to continue to live apart is a question the court was not called upon to consider, and it declined to discuss the subject in any aspect the case did not present. Walker v. Walker, 9 Wall. 743, 19 L. ed. 814.

The question was early before the Connecticut court, and gave rise to much discussion. It was finally decided, by a vote of five to four, that a contract for separate maintenance was valid if made for what the court termed "proper cause;" and that, while "there may be cases of separation by agreement, attended with such circumstances and resting on such foul principles that good policy will not support them, when a case is claimed to be of that description it is incumbent on those who claim it so to show it." Nichols v. Palmer, 5 Day, 47, 52, 53. A discretionary power of this kind is broad, and somewhat novel. The practical result of exercising it would be what is set forth in one of the dissenting opinions: "It is true, it has been said, that such separation should be admitted only in cases of the most urgent necessity, and for the strongest reasons; but no line of demarcation can be drawn. This decision proclaims to all who are married that they have the right to separate by mutual consent, as whim, fancy, or passion may dictate." Id. 60. The true rule is stated in the dissenting opinion of Judge Ingersoll: "The marriage contract cannot, ad libitum, be dissolved by the parties. Nay, I presume in every case application must be made to a forum appointed by law for the purpose, to effect a dissolution. It follows, then, of course, that every agreement the consideration of which is the dissolution, or the intended dissolution, of the marriage contract, is void, and cannot be enforced in a court of justice. What, then, is a dissolution of it? I should suppose an agreement to live separately, and to perform none of the duties to each other, which they solemnly promised to perform when the marriage took place, is a dissolution of the contract, so far as the parties can dissolve it. If this be a just position, every agreement to carry into effect such separation must be against law. The agreement in question, being made to carry into effect such separation, by fair logical deduction, is against law and void." Id. 61. In a recent case the court of that state said of these contracts: "The principle upon which they are sustained is, not that the separation should be enforced, nor that it is lawful for the parties to contract to separate, but that when they are living apart for causes rendering such separation reasonably necessary the agreement of the husband to perform his duty to furnish support for his wife should be carried out." Boland v. O'Neil, 72 Conn. 217, 44 Atl. 15. "After a marriage is entered into, the relation becomes a status, and is no longer one resting merely on contract. It is the relation fixed by law in which the married parties stand to each other, towards all other persons, and to the state. It continues so long as the parties both live, and is one from which they cannot separate themselves by their own agreement, or by their own misconduct. This status can only be dissolved by the assent of the state, which is ordinarily indicated by the judgment of a competent court. When an attempt is made through the courts to undo a marriage, the state becomes in a sense a party to the proceedings, not necessarily to oppose, but to make sure that the attempt will not prevail without sufficient and lawful cause shown by the real facts of the case, nor unless those conditions are found to exist at the time the decree is made upon which the state permits a divorce to be granted. The state has an interest in the maintenance of the marriage tie, which neither the collusion nor the negligence of the parties can impair." Andrews, Ch. J., Allen v. Allen, 73 Conn. 54, 49 L. R. A. 142, 46 Atl. 242. According to these decisions, the present law of that state is more nearly expressed in the dissenting opinions in Nichols v. Palmer, 5 Day, 47, than in the prevailing ones.

That a contract simply for separate maintenance is valid may be said to be the general American rule. Randall v. Randall, 37 Mich. 563; Henderson v. Henderson, 37 Or. 141, 48 L. R. A. 766, 60 Pac. 597, 61 Pac. 136; Emery v. Neighbour, 7 N. J. L. 142, 11 Am. Dec. 541; Aspinwall v. Aspinwall, 49 N. J. Eq. 302, 24 Atl. 926; Phillips v. Meyers, 82 Ill. 67, 25 Am. Rep. 295; Luttrell v. Boggs, 168 Ill. 361, 48 N. E. 171; Dutton v. Dutton, 30 Ind. 452; Robertson v. Robertson, 25 Iowa, 350; Carey v. Mackey, 82 Me. 516, 9 L. R. A. 113, 20 Atl. 84; Roll v. Roll, 51 Minn. 353, 53 N. W. 716; Helms v. Francis, 2 Bland, Ch. 544, 20 Am. Dec. 402; Squires v. Squires, 53 Vt. 208, 38 Am. Rep. 668; Gaines v. Poor, 3 Met. (Ky.) 503, 79 Am. Dec. 559; Chapman v. Gray, 8 Ga. 341; McLaren v. Bradford, 52 Ga. 648; Garver v. Miller, 16 Ohio St. 527; Hutton v. Hutton, 3 Pa. 100; Buckner v. Ruth, 13 Rich. L. 157; Goodrich v. Bryant, 5 Sneed, 325; Bowers v. Hutchinson, 67 Ark. 15, 53 S. W. 399. In most of the cases where the question has been discussed the decisions have been put upon grounds other than that of upholding an agreement to live separate. In a few cases courts have been misled by the fact that an agreement to maintain is valid into supposing that one to live separate is equally so. Even these courts agree that, if there be a covenant for future separation, the whole deed is void. Yet this has no more tendency to promote a method of living not approved by law than an agreement to continue a present separation. The distinction, so far as one exists, originated from the rule that a mere agreement to maintain a separated wife was all that was at first recognized. This was put upon the ground that the husband's agreement was one to do what was a part of his duty. It was not the fact that the agreement depended upon an existing separation, but that it neither depended upon nor induced separation of any kind, either present or prospective, that made it a valid contract. When there was an existing separation, conveyancers were skilful enough to so draw the agreement that it appeared free from objectionable features, and so it would be upheld; but, when there was only a contemplation of separation, this was not so easily accomplished. The real motive and consideration then appeared in the contract, and for this cause it would be condemned by the court. Hence it came to be thought that, if the parties had actually separated, they might make a legal contract to continue to live apart. "Out of these . . . propositions,—namely, that married parties cannot validly contract to live in separation, yet the husband can obligate himself to render her a maintenance wherever she resides—comes the entire doctrine of separation under articles. When we look at the cases we find that they are sometimes discordant, and sometimes the particular decision proceeded on a misapprehension of true legal distinctions; but, on the whole, 54 L. R. A.

the law as adjudicated is plainly so in our country, and it was so in England until of late, however it may be there now." 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 633. This doctrine is the only one which can be sustained if it be conceded that the marital status is one in which the state has an interest, and over which it may exercise a control. No intermediate rule ever has been or can be justified by any process of reasoning. If it be true that the rights involved are only private, why stop at the right of remarriage, or object to decrees of divorce by agreement? If it is good law that by their own act husband and wife may cease to sustain that relation, and may thus become as strangers, what is the principle that forbids one of them to remarry? No answer to these questions has been vouchsafed. The courts which have announced the extreme decisions have thus far refrained from considering the end to which their logic leads. In avoidance of these questions and similar ones asked long ago by Lord Kenyon, it is said that public sentiment has changed, social policy is different, and courts must fashion the law to the demands of the times. However satisfactory this line of argument may be in England, it cannot be followed here. "To declare what the law is or has been is a judicial power; to declare what the law shall be is legislative. One of the fundamental principles of all our government is that the legislative power shall be separate from the judicial." Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477, 498, 5 Am. Dec. 291. The authorities in this state, so far as they have touched upon the question, follow the common law. In Pidgin v. Cram, 8 N. H. 350, the husband and wife had separated, and the wife was living with her father, who had covenanted with the husband to support her. It was decided that this agreement did not free the husband from his obligation to support his wife. So long as its covenants were performed, he would not be liable for goods furnished to her, because he was in this way performing his duty. If, however, she should be driven from her father's house by the inmates thereof, the husband would be liable to one who thereafter supplied her with necessaries. Unless she leaves his house against his will, he is bound to support her, and she takes his credit with her. Rumney v. Keyes, 7 N. H. 571; Allen v. Aldrich, 20 N. H. 63. Sayles v. Sayles, 21 N. H. 312, 53 Am. Dec. 208, was a suit upon a note given in consideration of a promise not to contest a libel for divorce. Justice Wood said: "No such agreement, even if executed, can form a valid consideration for either a verbal or written promise. The great and principal object of the agreement made between the parties was to bring about a dissolution of the marriage contract, and to put an end to the various duties and relations resulting from it. Any contract having any such purpose, object, and tendency cannot be, in law, sustained, but must be regarded as being against sound public policy, and consequently illegal and void. The marriage relation is one to be encouraged and maintained when formed. Such is the well-settled policy of the law; and its dissolution or determination is not to be left to depend upon the caprice of the parties. If determined, it must be done in accordance with some positive enactment of law, and in due course of judicial proceedings. The good order and well-being of society require . . . this." The then recent cases upholding separation agreements were reviewed, but no opinion of their soundness was expressed beyond the suggestive statement that "in this state, at least, a separation a vinculo can only be effected through a decree of the courts of law." From this it may well be inferred that the court did not consider those cases as in harmony with the law here. Similar views of the nature of the status have been expressed in other cases. Clark v. Clark, 10 N. H. 380, 34 Am. Dec. 165; Cross v. Cross, 58 N. H. 373; Cross v. Grant, 62 N. H. 675. So far as the English ideas are outgrowths of the early form of divorce a mensa et thoro, they are not applicable here. Limited divorces were never granted in this state. Parsons v. Parsons, 9 N. H. 309, 317, 32 Am. Dec. 362. As early as 1791 absolute divorces were here granted for the causes for which limited divorces were granted under the English practice. Act Feb. 17, 1791; Laws 1806, p. 280. In no reported case in this state has an agreement to live separate been passed upon favorably. What has been said upon the subject has uniformly been opposed to the validity of such a contract. The theory that marriage is only a civil contract is also disapproved of. "It is an institution of society, having its foundation in civil contract." Cross v. Grant, 62 N. H. 675, 684. The whole doctrine is summed up by Chief Justice Doe in a single sentence: "The marriage contract may be broken by either party, with or without the consent of the other; but it cannot be rescinded or modified by them." Ferren v. Moore, 59 N. H. 106.

It is not necessary to now consider how far the statutory power of husband and wife to contract as to property matters extends, or whether their agreement to release prospective rights in each other's estates could, in any event, be enforced. Compare Shute v. Sargent, 67 N. H. 305, 36 Atl. 282, with Reed v. Blaisdell, 16 N. H. 194, 41 Am. Dec. 722; Cutter v. Butler, 25 N. H. 343, 57 Am. Dec. 339, and Hayes v. Seavey, 69 N. H. 308, 46 Atl. 189. Conceding that the right extends to the release of every property interest, present and prospective, it cannot avail this plaintiff. Modern legislation enlarging the rights of married women as to contracts and torts has not destroyed the marital status, as defined by the common law. "There is nothing in the series of statutes by which her rights and privileges have gradually approximated an equality with those of her husband that abrogates the marital rights of trust and confidence incident to the relation in all stages of society. . . . The obligations, the disabilities, and the privileges inherently consequent upon the marriage union remain unchanged. . . . While unjust disabilities of the wife have been removed, there are implied stipulations of the contract which each party remains justly disabled to violate." Laton v. Bacon, 64 N. H. 92, 95, 96, 6 Atl. 37, 39, 40. "The incidental changes of conjugal rights and duties are such only as are reasonably and necessarily implied." Cross v. Grant, 62 N. H. 675, 685. "These statutes have not taken away the right of either party to the marital contract to have the affection, society, and aid of the other." Ott v. Hentall (N. H.) 51 L. R. A. 226, 47 Atl. 80. An agreement renouncing marital rights is void. An agreement touching property rights may be valid. If covenants of each kind occur in the same agreement, its validity must be determined by the ordinary rules. If the promises are separate, and the consideration is divisible, the legal part of the contract is upheld, but, if the consideration is entire, the whole must fail. Bisby v. Moor, 51 N. H. 402. Applying this test to the agreement in the present case, the result is at once apparent. The husband agreed to separate on friendly terms, and to make no demand on the wife nor her property after that date. The wife made a similar agreement on her part. The agreement to live separate is not distinct from that as to property. There is no separate promise, upon separate consideration, as to the legal and illegal parts. They are blended together without discrimination. The wording of the writing and the facts surrounding the separation all tend to show that the dissolution of the marriage relation was the object the parties had in view. All other matters were merely incidental to this main purpose. The agreement was an attempt by a husband and wife to do that which the court could not have done, either upon the application of one of the parties or with the consent of both. They were desirous of dissolving the marital relation; and, although no cause for divorce existed, they entered into this agreement, whereby each attempted, not only to release all the rights then held as against the other, but also to absolve the other from all duties attendant upon the married state. It is not an agreement made up of distinct parts, but a harmonious whole, the main object of which is the dissolution of the marriage tie. It had its inception in the wife's declaration of her intention to leave her husband's house. The agreement as to property is merely incidental, while anything in the nature of a provision for the support of the wife is wholly lacking. It is hardly open to doubt that, if they had intended to continue to live as husband and wife, they would not have contracted as to property rights. In any event, it does not appear that there would have been such a contract, or that the agreement on that subject is independent of the illegal promise to separate. "Whether the illegality extends to the whole or only a part of the consideration is immaterial. The contract was entire, and in such case the whole is void if tainted with illegality in any part." Weeks v. Hill, 38 N.

H. 199, 203; Hinds v. Chamberlain, 6 N. H. 225, 227. The executor also contends that his first reason for appeal (that the defendant has no interest in the estate) is well founded, because the husband "willingly abandoned his wife, and has absented himself from her, or has wilfully neglected to support her . . . for the term of three years next preceding her death." Pub. Stat. chap. 195, § 18. The object of this statute is to deprive a wrongdoer of certain rights which he would otherwise possess. It applies to a "deserting husband" (Martin v. Swanton, 65 N. H. 10, 11, 18 Atl. 170, 171), and there is no desertion where there is a separation by agreement (Moores v. Moores, 16 N. J. Eq. 275, 280; 1 Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. § 1662). There was here no abandonment and no wilful neglect to support, in the sense in which those terms are used in the statute. There was no denial by the husband of any right which the wife desired to enjoy. She was not abandoned, but merely permitted to go the way of her own choosing. She was not wilfully neglected, but was left to her own resources at her own request.

It is also contended that the defendant's rights are cut off because in certain cases the wife of a nonresident may convey her property as though sole. Pub. Stat. chap. 176, § 8. The object of this statute is to allow the wife, in such a case, to manage her property as she chooses. It looks wholly to transactions during life. Its objects would not be promoted by a construction which would include a disposition of property by will. The language used aptly expresses the purpose; for while, in a technical sense, a will may be said to be a conveyance, the ordinary rule is that it is not included when that term is used. Jenckes v. Smithfield Probate Ct. 2 R. I. 255, 256; May v. Slaughter, 3 A. K. Marsh. 509.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

John DICKINSON, Appt.,
v.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Public officers receiving no more than $5,000 per year for their services should not, on grounds of public policy, be required by the courts to set apart any part of their salaries for the payment of their debts.
2. Investments of salary by a public officer in real estate are not exempt from the claims of antecedent creditors, even though the conveyance has been taken in the name of his wife.

(March 6, 1901.)

NOTE.—Exemption of officer's salary from claims of his creditors.

- I. Creditors' bills and supplementary proceedings.
 - II. On the ground of public policy.
 - III. Statutory provisions.
 - IV. School teacher's salary.
 - V. Officers of municipal corporations in Kentucky.
 - VI. Summary.
- I. Creditors' bills and supplementary proceedings.

In DICKINSON v. JOHNSON, which was a proceeding in aid of execution, it was held that the clerk of a county court could not be required to set apart from time to time a portion of his salary for the payment of the claims of his creditors. This was on the ground that, as the Constitution prohibits any officer except the governor from receiving a greater compensation than $5,000 per year, it would be contrary to public policy to subject his salary to the claims of his creditors. But it was held that salary invested in real estate could be subjected to the creditor's claim. The court said that they had

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendants in an action to subject property belonging to them to the payment of a judgment which had been recovered by plaintiff against William P. Johnson. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. W. Thum and Stanley E. Sloss, for appellant:

Under the Kentucky Civil Code of Practice, § 439, the salary of a public officer, even though he be an officer of the state or county, and even though his salary is not liable to attachment or garnishment, may be sequestered by the court, and applied in satisfaction of the judgment against him.

decided that investments of pension money could be subjected to the claims of creditors for an antecedent debt. "And it would be entirely inconsistent with such a rule to hold that officers' fees or salary invested in real estate should be exempt from antecedent debts, even if we were deciding—which we do not—that an officer's fees or salary are exempt by statute from the debts of the officer."

This action appears to have been an effort to anticipate future salary, as the case does not indicate that there was any money due at the time. The ruling in this case does not seem to have been on the ground that a creditor cannot require his debtor to labor and thus pay the debt, but on the ground that "public policy demands that the courts refuse to require any officer to set apart any part of his salary for the payment of his debts." If the salary had been earned the ruling might have been different. In this state the cases hold that a school teacher's salary and jailer's fees cannot be garnished, but that municipal officers' salaries may be.

There is some conflict of authority in regard to whether an officer's salary that has been earned is subject to the claims of his creditors in proceedings in aid of execution or in supplementary proceedings.

The real estate standing in Mrs. John-

In Wallace v. Lawyer, 54 Ind. 501, 23 Am. Rep. 661, holding that a body politic and corporate cannot be required to answer as to its indebtedness in a proceeding supplementary to execution, and that the wages, fees, or salaries of a county auditor, due from the county, cannot be subjected, in the hands of the county, to the payment of his debts under proceedings supplementary to execution, it was said: "All the cases we have consulted upon these questions seem to rest their decisions upon a branch of the great public principle which exempts an ambassador, a foreign minister, charge d'affaires, consul, members of a legislature, or other public functionaries, while in office and in the public service, from civil arrest or other legal embarrassment at the suit of a private party. Without such a rule, it would frequently be in the power of an individual to endanger the public interests, or even check the wheels of government, which would be a far greater public evil than the occasional delay, or even sacrifice, of a private right. The exemption is not given to the person for a private advantage, but granted to the office from public necessity." It was claimed that there could be no exemption unless it was specifically claimed. The court said: "In an equitable proceeding, like the present, seeking specific property, when the finding is that the defendant is a resident householder, and shows that he had no property subject to execution over the amount exempt by law, the court will not grant the plaintiff relief, against which it is apparent that the defendant, in another or further proceeding, has a good defense at law. The court having jurisdiction of the whole matter grants the entire relief."

And in Roeller v. Ames, 33 Minn. 132, 22 N. W. 177, it was held in proceedings supplementary to execution that a receiver would not be appointed, nor would the defendant be required to assign to the receiver a warrant directed to be drawn for his past salary. It was also held that the fact that the mayor was out of office would not change the rule, as public policy would forbid that such salary be subjected to creditors. In this case it was said that numerous authorities hold that municipal corporations are exempt from garnishment; but it has also often been held that the salary of a public officer, due him from a municipal corporation, cannot be intercepted by his creditors on the grounds that officers are public servants; that the public have a right to fill those offices; that these officers are usually dependent on their salary for their support, and that the efficiency of their services may depend upon the 54 L. R. A.

prompt payment of their salaries. The court said that the doctrine rests upon an entirely different reason from that assigned for exempting municipal corporations from garnishment, and is independent of the question where the corporation or its officers are made parties to the proceedings, and that frequently these reasons have been confounded by courts and in the citation of authorities.

In Driscoll v. Kelly, 5 Ohio N. P. 243, in proceedings in aid of execution, it was held that under the Ohio statutes the necessary earnings for three months were exempt. See subd. III., Statutory provisions.

Under lord's act, 32 Geo. II. chap. 28, § 13, providing that a prisoner before he is discharged shall deliver in a schedule of all his estates, real or personal, or which he or any person in trust for him is interested in or entitled to, the creditors cannot compel an officer to include his half pay in his schedule as bankrupt. Flarty v. Odium, 3 T. R. 681. In this case Kenyon, Ch. J., said: "It would therefore be highly impolitic to permit them to be assigned, for persons who are liable to be called out in the service of their country ought not to be taken from a state of poverty." Buller, J., said: "If the question had been whether or not the pay which was actually due might be assigned, I should have thought it, like any other existing debt, assignable; but that does not extend to future accruing payments."

In Es parte Butler, 1 Atk. 210, 1 Amb. 73, where an application was made for the sale of the office of under-marshal for the benefit of creditors, under the bankrupt law, the question was whether the office is of such a nature that the creditors can lay hold of the salary belonging to it. It was held that the assignees could sell the office of under-marshal of the city of London as it is not within the statute of Edw. VI., which concerns the execution of justice, and that if the bankrupt refused to comply with the order substituting the purchaser he would be committed to the Fleet until he complied. The Lord Chancellor said that he had no doubt but that he had the power to lay his hands upon the pay of an army officer for the benefit of his creditors, if he should become bankrupt. The effect of this decision had been overruled in Flarty v. Odium, 3 T. R. 681.

But after an official was out of office and had sued the municipal corporation for fees and emoluments, it was held that whatever of exemption may have inhered in his original claim had been lost in this new and radically different form which it had assumed at his instance, and as the result of hostile litigation instituted by him, son's name was really bought with the defendant's (W. P. Johnson's) money, and the attempt to put the title in her should be adjudged fraudulent, and the property sold to satisfy this debt.

53 S. W. 528; O'Kane v. Vinnege, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1551, 55 S. W. 711.

The salary of even a state officer may be reached by a proper proceeding.

Though the salaries of officers are not liable to attachment, they can yet be reached by creditor's bill.

Speed v. Brown, 10 B. Mon. 108; Newark v. Funk, 15 Ohio St. 462; Pendleton v. Perkins, 49 Mo. 565; Furlong v. Thomssen, 19 Mo. App. 364; Singer & T. Stone Co. v. Wheeler, 6 Ill. App. 225; Browning v. Bettis, 8 Paige, 568; Kingman v. Frank, 33 Hun, 471; McCoun v. Dorsheimer, 1 Clarke, Ch. 144; Thompson v. Nixon, 3 Edw. Ch. 457; Smith v. ———, 4 Edw. Ch. 653; Clark v. Bert, 2 Kan. App. 407, 42 Pac. 733; Riggin v. Hillard, 56 Ark. 476, 20 S. W. 402.

Baird v. Rogers, 95 Tenn. 492, 32 S. W. 630. In this case the court said: "He stands now on the same level with creditors of the corporation whose judgments rest on general indebtedness. And, as to one of these, we do not think it could be maintained that he could successfully insist upon this exemption for his protection in the event an effort was made to reach his judgment by one of his creditors. It may be that the corporation might do so for its own relief, upon the authority of the cases before referred to, but, if so, it is clear that this right would be one personal to it, and one which the defendant debtor could not call into activity, of his own motion, for his own defense."

And in Mays v. Frazer, 3 Tenn. Ch. 413, it was held that a judgment creditor may upon the return of an execution "No goods," file a bill in chancery to reach money in the hands of the present clerk of the supreme court, collected for the judgment debtor, being fees due for services rendered by him as former clerk of the supreme court. The bill in this case was held not demurrable as it did not show that the money was held by the present clerk by virtue of his office, nor subject to the orders of the court. The court said: "It may be that the money is held by the defendant by virtue of his office, and subject to the orders of the court, but the bill does not directly aver the fact, nor state such a case as fairly implies the fact."

And where all services to entitle a Federal marshal to his salary had been rendered at the time of filing complainant's bill for a receiver, it was held that such salary may be reached by the creditor, although it had not become actually payable when the bill was filed. Browning v. Bettis, 8 Paige, 568. In this case it was said: "But the complainant had no right to reach by this bill the compensation to which the judgment debtor might thereafter become entitled, under the laws of the United States, when he should have completed the census and made a return thereof to the marshal. In the case of Carr v. Kirby, which came before this court upon an appeal from a decision of the vice chancellor of the first circuit, and was decided here March 7, 1837, the complainant in a creditors' suit was permitted to reach the salary of a schoolmaster which had been wholly and completely earned by the performance of all the services required to entitle him to the same, before the filing of the bill, although by the terms of the agreement with his employers the salary was not payable until four days afterwards. In that case the court decided that the quarter's salary was an existing debt at the time of the filing of the bill, though payable in futuro. But in the subsequent case of Wood- worth v. Gillespie, in chancery, May 7, 1839, this court decided that a creditors' bill could not reach a compensation to become due to the defendant at a future time, for the performance of services not yet completed, and where he would have no legal or equitable right to demand payment for the services performed at the time of filing of the bill in case he should thereafter neglect to complete the services which had not then been rendered."

In McCoun v. Dorsheimer, Clarke, Ch. 144, on a bill in equity after a judgment and return of execution, it was held that an injunction would be granted to restrain the defendant from collecting the salary earned as postmaster in order that the same should be placed in the hands of a receiver. But as to future salary it could not be reached by a creditors' bill.

And in Campbell v. Genet, 2 Hilt. 290, it was said that on proceedings supplementary a salary not yet earned could not be reached; but a salary assigned to the official before the filing of the bill, though not payable, could be reached.

The surplus of the half-pay of a lunatic officer of the government having reached the beneficiary, and being in the hands of his committee and not needed for the lunatic's subsistence, may be applied with the sanction of the court for the payment of his debts. Elwyn's Appeal, 67 Pa. 367. In this case the court said: "It may be admitted that the half-pay of an officer of the government is not liable to be taken by creditors under any form of process—by levy, sale, attachment, or sequestration. The authorities cited are to this effect. Being intended as a means of subsistence, it will not be permitted to be diverted. . . . But when the half-pay has reached the beneficiary, and has lost its distinctive character, and when as money it is in a proper sense, as here, a distributable fund lying in the hands of the law, it is to be governed by the direction of the law. . . . The same reasons dispose of the claim set up under the $300 law. The allowance to the creditor here is the act of the court by the hands of its committee, and not a seizure by adverse process."

II. On the ground of public policy.

In the absence of statutory provisions it seems that, on the ground of public policy, the accrued salary of a public officer cannot be subjected to the claims of his creditors by garnishment or attachment. Unearned salary cannot be subjected. The reasons usually assigned are that it might cripple the public service; that it might drive the official out of office; that it might prevent him from earning a living; and that public interests and public convenience

Messrs. Kohn, Baird, & Spindle for appellees.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee William P. Johnson is, and has been for several years, clerk of the Jefferson county court, entitled to a salary, payable by the state, amounting to $5,000 per annum. The other appellee is his wife. Some time prior to the institution of this action the appellant obtained a judgment in the Jefferson circuit court against the said William P. Johnson for the sum of $3,313.12 with interest from August, 1897, upon which judgment execution was issued to the proper county, which was returned by the sheriff, in substance, "No property found." The object of this action is to enforce the collection of said judgment. The two principal funds or items of property sought to be subjected are a reasonable portion of appellee's salary and certain real estate in Jefferson county which is alleged to have been purchased and paid for to the extent that it has been paid for at all, by the said William P. Johnson, but that the same was conveyed to the wife, Emma Johnson, for the purpose of delaying, hindering, and defrauding the creditors of the said William P. Johnson. It is also alleged in the petition that William P. Johnson, Jr., a son of the said appellee, and a minor, is working for a salary of $2,000. The prayer of the plaintiff, in substance, is for an attachment against the property of said William P. Johnson, and that he be compelled to make a discovery of any money, choses in action, or legal and equitable interests, or any other property, and the amount would suffer. There are some exceptions to this rule, as in Kentucky, holding that salaries of municipal corporation officers may be attached. But in that state the salaries of state officers, jailers, and school teachers cannot be subjected to the claims of their creditors while in the hands of the public disbursing officer.

The fees of the surveyor general for the performance of his official duties are not subject to attachment. Sexton v. Brown, 72 Minn. 371, 75 N. W. 600. In this case the court said: "The decisions in those cases do not rest upon any question as to the character of the garnishee, or as to the source from which the officer receives his fees, but upon the ground that it is against public policy to permit the salary or compensation of a public officer for the performance of his official duties to be intercepted by garnishment or other legal process before the money reaches his hands, for the reason that it would tend to impair the efficiency of the public service."

And in Bank of Tennessee v. Dibrell, 3 Sneed, 379, it was held that the salary of state treasurer could not be garnished. In this case the court said: "Every consideration of policy would forbid it. No government can sanction it. It would be very embarrassing generally, and, under some circumstances, might prove fatal to the public service, to allow the means of support of the servants of the government to be intercepted in the hands of the distributing agents. If the funds of the government, thus specifically appropriated for the support and maintenance of its agents, were allowed to be devested by process of attachment in favor of creditors, or otherwise, from their legitimate object, the functions of the government might be suspended."

And the salary of an employee of a municipal corporation is exempt from garnishment on the ground of public policy. Tenn. Code, §§ 50, 3087, 3478, giving a remedy by garnishment and defining "persons" to include "corporations," is construed to mean private corporations, and not public or municipal corporations. Memphis v. Laaki, 9 Heisk. 511, 24 Am. Rep. 327.

In Stewart v. Taylor, 9 Lea, 352, holding that fees due a clerk and master of the chancery court do not pass to his widow as exempted property, the court said: "While it has been held, on ground of public policy, as well as for other reasons, that the salary of an officer, as well as fees accruing to an officer, were not subject to attachment, or process of garnishment, at the hands of his creditors, and the rule uniformly adhered to since the case of Bank of Tennessee v. Dibrell, 3 Sneed, 379, it has never been held that these fees or a salary came within the language or spirit of our law exempting certain specific articles from execution. These articles so exempted are deemed necessities for support and maintenance of the family of the citizen, and are exempted in view of a sound public policy. The articles so exempted are specifically enumerated in § 2107a, of the Code and subsequent sections, but no exemption of fees of office is found in their provisions. In fact, no such exemption, in the nature of the thing, would likely be found in such statutes, as they are not property, or liable as such to execution or attachment."

And the salary of deputy sheriff, who is paid a compensation for his services instead of fees allowed by law, is not subject to garnishment. Oliver v. Athey, 11 Lea, 149. In this case the court said: "The deputy sheriff is an officer provided for by law, and equally within its protection with any other. His services are necessary in carrying on the machinery of government in one of its departments, and his compensation, although received by way of a fixed salary instead of the fees allowed by law for specific services, or a part of them, is in lieu of the perquisites to which he would otherwise be entitled, and is equally necessary for his support, and the reason of the exemption on account of public policy is the same in the one case as the other."

In Baird v. Rogers, 95 Tenn. 492, 32 S. W. 630, it was said that the same public policy which protects a state from being harassed by litigants that seek to subject the fees due its officers or employees will also protect a municipal corporation from like imposition, and this rule of exemption may be invoked by the employee when his creditor seeks to reach his salary or emoluments.

The earned fees of a registering officer for a city election are not subject to garnishment. Sanger Bros. v. City of Waco, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 40 S. W. 549. In this case the court said: "Whether an officer's compensation be fees or salary, it is not collectible until the service is rendered; and if, when it falls due, it is subject to garnishment at the instance of creditors, the officer might not be free from the cares of making provision for his own support and that of his family during the term of office, because as often as his compensation fell due it might by garnishment proceedings be applied to the demands of creditors."

This case conflicts with Thompson v. Cullers (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 412, and is a later decision, but does not refer to that case. The difference in the cases is that in the Sanger Bros. case the city was garnished, while in the Thompson case an individual who owed the fees of same, and to disclose when and in what sums and how the salaries of himself and son are collected, and that so much of the said property be subjected to the satisfaction of plaintiff's claims as is necessary, and that the real estate and improvements be adjudged the property of said William P. Johnson, and that the same be subjected to the satisfaction of his debt, and that out of his salary he be required to provide for and pay this judgment, and for all proper and equitable relief, general and special. The answer of the appellees, after denying that either Johnson or any of his family are living upon or occupying the ground or premises described in the petition, states, in substance, that the title to the property was not placed in the said Emma for the purpose of delaying creditors, and that appellee William should not be required to set apart any of his salary for the payment of plaintiff's debt. The answer further avers, in substance, that the salary is paid to him for services as clerk of the Jefferson county court, and that he has no interest or right over any part of the salary paid to his son William P. Johnson, Jr., or that he exercises or ever has exercised any right to said salary, and that he would not have any right so to do. It is then further stated that, long before the giving of the note upon which the judgment was rendered, he was indebted to his wife in the sum of more than $20,000, and long before the transfer of the land; that he is now county clerk as aforesaid, and that under and by virtue of the laws of Kentucky the said salary is exempt from execution, attachment, or garnishment; that, in part satisfaction of his indebtedness to the said Emma, he did assign and transfer for weighing was garnished. But neither case places the decision on such ground, and neither case notices the constitutional provision set forth in Highland v. Galveston, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) § 623, p. 335. See subd. III., Statutory provisions.

And in Blair v. Marye, 80 Va. 485, it was said that the salary of an attorney general is of constitutional grant and of public official right, and is not liable to attachment nor to be garnished, and, upon principles of public policy, it has absolute immunity from detention for debt or counterclaim.

The salary of a police magistrate is exempt from attachment. Central Bank v. Ellis, 20 Ont. App. Rep. 364. In this case MacLennan, J., said: "But I also think that the police magistrate is a police officer connected with the administration of justice, whose salary is exempt from attachment, on the ground of public policy. He is appointed by the Crown during pleasure. His salary is fixed by the legislature. It is attached to the office, and its payment is made obligatory on the municipality, and is not matter of contract between the latter and the officer. I think any interference with such a salary would be an interference with the office, and with the efficient discharge of the duties connected with it, which might be detrimental to the public service; and that the case therefore comes within the rule of protection."

In Troy Laundry & Machinery Co. v. Denver, 11 Colo. App. 368, 53 Pac. 256, it was said: "It has been uniformly held that by reason of high considerations of public policy the salary of a public official, whether state, county, or municipal, was not subject to garnishment, not because of any exemption right to which the officer was entitled, but because the interests of the public demanded it."

In Mobile v. Rowland, 26 Ala. 498, holding that a city could not be garnished to subject the salary of a policeman, it was said: "Aside from this the city corporation, which is a government for the city, invested with certain attributes of sovereignty delegated to it by its charter, is entitled to fill its offices by a selection of suitable persons from among the whole community. This privilege would exist but in name, if those who depend upon their salaries for a livelihood could be deprived of such salaries by garnishment, and thus cut off from the means of subsistence. The result would be, that only those who were free from debt, or who could subsist without their salaries, could fill such offices, and the public service might suffer for want of persons to accept or hold them." A subsequent statute changed this rule. See subd. III., Statutory provisions.

In Montgomery v. Van Dorn, 41 Ala. 505, the case of Mobile v. Rowland, 26 Ala. 498, was distinguished, the court saying that the object of the statute of 1863 was to overthrow the doctrine of that case.

In McLellan v. Young, 54 Ga. 399, 21 Am. Rep. 276, it was said: "The salary of a public officer is, in no fair sense of the word, wages. Such salaries were not exempt under acts exempting 'wages.' They were not, in the technical sense, exempt at all, but for the convenience and protection of the public, the corporation was not liable to garnishment for the salaries of its officers. The protection was not to the officer, but to the public, and was intended to prevent confusion and petty litigation, and to secure to the public the faithful and diligent performance of official duties by its officers."

Fees and allowances due to a jailer cannot be attached in the hands of the sheriff. Webb v. McCauley, 4 Bush, 8. This was on the ground that it would be contrary to public policy, as such officials could not procure the necessary supplies unless they pledged their fees and charges against the county to secure them, and if they could be subjected it would result disastrously to the public interests.

In Keyser v. Rice, 47 Md. 203, 28 Am. Rep. 448, it was said that, "from considerations of public convenience, the courts have long since decided that attachments would not lie against the salaries of public or municipal officers."

But in Thompson v. Cullers (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 412, it was held that the earned fees of a cotton weigher were subject to garnishment. The court said: "It is clearly implied from these authorities and the others cited in appellant's brief that when the official services are performed, and the salary or fees earned and due, public policy does not prohibit their assignment. Greenhood, Pub. Pol. 151. As such policy does not prohibit their assignment, we see no reason why they should not be subjected by garnishment to the debts of the officer."

Sanger Bros. v. City of Waco, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 40 S. W. 549, supra, which is a later decision, conflicts with this case. See Roeller v. Ames, 33 Minn. 132, 22 N. W. 177. See also subd. I., Creditors' bills and supplementary proceedings.

III. Statutory provisions.

The following cases sustain an attachment or garnishment of an officer's salary on the ground that a municipal corporation is liable to be garnished, under the proper construction of a statute applying to corporations.

The wages of a "policeman" may be garnished the salary to be paid to him to her, the said Emma, and out of said salary so transferred the said Emma made the payments that have been made on the property, etc. It is also claimed that they have been occupying the same as a home, and only temporarily absent. The reply may be considered a complete traverse of all the matters relied on as a defense. Upon final hearing the court adjudged in favor of the appellees, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is the contention of appellee that under no state of case could he be required to set apart any part of his salary for payment of the debt in question. He also contends that he had received, many years before he incurred the debt sued on, a large amount of money from his wife, and that he had a right to pay the same to her, either by an assignment of the salary, or by having the land in question conveyed to her. The appellant contends that, after allowing the said appellee Johnson a sufficient amount of the salary to support himself and family in a style commensurate to his surroundings and social position, he should be required to set apart annually, or from time to time as his salary is paid, the surplus, to be applied to the payment of the judgment sued on. Appellant further contends that the money received by appellee from his wife was not an indebtedness of appellee, and that the payment for the real estate in question was in fact and law paid for by or with appellee's money, and therefore the real estate is liable or ought to be subjected to the payment of plaintiff's claim. It is further contended by appellant that the question involved as to the salary has never been passed upon by this court; that the

in the hands of the municipal corporation, and subjected to the payment of a judgment against such policeman, under Ala. act February 22, 1866 (Rev. Code, § 2895), providing that upon all judgments and decrees in any court of this state the plaintiff shall have process of garnishment against any municipal corporation, supposed to be indebted to the defendant, upon a compliance with the law in other cases of garnishment. Montgomery v. Van Dorn, 41 Ala. 505.

And the salary of a city marshal due from a city may be subjected to garnishment to the payment of a judgment, under the provision of Ohio Code Civ. Proc. § 458, providing that an action may be brought to subject to the payment of a judgment any claim or choses in action due or to become due to the judgment debtor, and all money, goods, or effects which he may have in the hands of any person, body politic or corporate. Newark v. Funk, 15 Ohio St. 462. But see Driscoll v. Kelly, 5 Ohio N. P. 243, on a later statute.

And the salary of a deputy sheriff is subject to attachment, under Mont. Code Civ. Proc. § 189, providing that all persons having in their possession or under their control any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, or owing any debts to the defendant, at the time of service upon them of a copy of the writ and notice, shall be liable to the plaintiff, and Gen. Laws, § 202, providing that the word "person" may be applied to bodies politic and corporate. Waterbury v. Deer Lodge County, 10 Mont. 515, 26 Pac. 1002. In this case, discussing the application of public policy to cases of this kind, the court said: "The debtor's earnings for thirty days prior to the levy of a writ are exempt from seizure. The servant of the county is thus secured in his support, if he earns it, and the county is not liable to lose the services of competent officers. Indeed, it has never been observed that a county has difficulty in obtaining employees to do its work, and the county may surely obtain as good service from those who pay their debts as from those who avoid such payment, and are protected in the avoidance by the unsatisfying doctrine of public policy."

In Wilson v. Lewis, 10 R. I. 285, where a salary due a police sergeant from a city was attached, it was held, under R. I. Rev. Stat. chap. 125, § 1, chap. 183, § 6, and chap. 853, § 2, authorizing corporations to be garnished, that a municipal corporation was not exempt from this process.

In the following cases it was held that the general attachment act was held not to exempt 54 L. R. A.

the salary of an officer after the payment to his agent, nor the fees of jurors:

Money received from the public treasury by an officer through an agent for services is subject to attachment in the hands of the agent. Kennedy v. Aldridge, 5 B. Mon. 141. In this case it was said: "The objection that the act authorizing the attachment and subjection of the debtor's choses in action does not include his debts due from the state does not therefore apply in this case, and we think the policy of securing the intended compensation to the public agents of the state cannot, without violating the provisions of the act just referred to, be carried farther than to protect from attachment the claim of the officer or agent upon the state. When, by his authority, it comes into the hands of an individual it is no longer a debt from the state, but becomes a debt from an individual, which cannot be properly distinguished from any other individual debt or demand, and is a chose in action, liable to be subjected to the debt of the person entitled to it."

In Webb v. McCauley, 4 Bush, 8, the case of Kennedy v. Aldridge, 5 B. Mon. 141, was distinguished, as in this case the money was, at the institution of the suit, in the hands of the agent of the county court, and not in the hands of Webb, and in the Kennedy case the money was paid by the state to the agent of its creditors.

Under N. H. Gen. Stat. chap. 230, § 28, providing that if it appears that the trustee had in his possession, at the time of the service of the writ on him, or at any time after, any money, goods, chattels, rights, or credits of the defendant he shall be adjudged chargeable therefor, the fees of a juror due him from a county are held to be moneys, rights, or credits, and are attachable on trustee process. Wardwell v. Jones, 58 N. H. 305.

In the following case the general attachment act was held not applicable to salaries of officers other than municipal:

Under Ala. Rev. Code, § 2948, authorizing money to be attached in the hands of an attorney at law, sheriff, or other officer, the salary of a tax assessor cannot be reached by garnishment. Pruitt v. Armstrong, 56 Ala. 306. In this case the court said that "the exemption the statute intends to remove is that which, under some circumstances, originated from the relation of the garnishee as a public officer. That he is a public officer does not relieve him from subjection to garnishment. The exemption to which the appellee is entitled originates from the character of the fund it is sought to condemn. . . . The compensation of the assessor, and the salary of the governor, and the decisions heretofore rendered where parties sought to garnish fees or salaries of officers have no application to the question involved in this case. It is not contended that the plaintiff could attach salaries in the hands of the state or its officers, and require the money to be paid directly to the plaintiff, but it is contended that the court may lawfully require the appellee to pay into court or to its receiver, in instalments, so much of the salary as is not necessary for his support as aforesaid. Many authorities are cited by appellant.

We are not aware of any decisions of this court in which the precise question here presented has ever been passed upon, nor do we find any statute expressly providing that officers' fees or salaries shall not be subjected to the payment of debts against them. But it is very earnestly contended for appellee that various decisions of this court announce the doctrine that it is contrary to public policy to so subject the fees or salaries of officers. But, as before intimated, the appellant contends that no such rule or doctrine is contained in any of the decisions in this court, and refers us to many decisions which, as he assumes, sustain his contention. We will now proceed to notice some of the authorities from states other than Kentucky relied on in support of appellant's contention: Pendleton v. Perkins, 49 Mo. 505, is cited. The court in that case held that, notwithstanding municipal corporations are exempt by statute from creditors' bills or garnishment, nevertheless money due the defendants in the city treasury might be subjected by proceedings in equity for the payment of plaintiff's claim. But from the opinion in this case we find compensation of all public officers, is free from seizure under legal process, not on any technical inquiry as to whether there is a legal remedy for its recovery, or the form of the remedy, but on high considerations of public policy."

In the following cases salary was held to be exempt under the exemption act:

The salary, under $500, of a municipal officer cannot be garnished, under Ga. act 1850 (Cobb, 1888, § 2), providing that all banks, banking companies, and other corporations in this state, except municipal corporations, shall be liable to be garnished for the salaries of its officers, in all cases where the salary exceeds the sum of $500. Holt v. Experience, 26 Ga. 118. In this case it was said that by proper construction of this act the salary would be exempt whether it amounted to $500 or not.

And the salary of an officer cannot be seized and sold for a debt, under La. Civ. Code, art. 1987, providing that there are also rights which are merely personal that cannot be held liable to the payment of debts. "These are the rights of personal servitude to money due for the salary of an officer, or wages or recompense for personal services. Wild v. Ferguson, 23 La. Ann. 752.

And under La. Civ. Code, art. 1987, the salary of a city assessor is exempt from execution, he being the officer of a political corporation. Chaudet v. De Jong, 16 La. Ann. 399.

In proceedings in aid of execution the wages or salary of a superintendent of a county infirmary, earned within three months,—he being the head of a family,—are "personal earnings," and, as such, exempt from execution if the same are necessary for the support of himself and family, within the meaning of Ohio Rev. Stat. § 5430, providing that every person who has a family, and every widow, may hold the following property exempt from execution, attachment, or sale for any debt, damage, fine, or amercement: "The personal earnings of the debtor,"—when it is made to appear that such earnings are necessary for the support of such debtor or of his or her family, except the debt is for necessities, and then only 90 per cent of the earnings are exempt. Driscoll v. Kelly, 5 Ohio N. P. 243.

In Catlin v. Ensign, 20 Pa. 264, it was said that Pa. act April 15, 1845, § 5, provides that the wages of any laborer, or the salary of any person in public or private employment, shall not be liable to attachment in the hands of the employer.

In Highland v. Galveston, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) § 623, p. 335, it was said that Texas Constitution, art. 16, § 28, provides that no current wages for personal services shall 54 L. R. A.

ever be subject to garnishment, and that in cases arising since its adoption a municipal corporation cannot be garnished for wages due an employee.

This case and the constitutional provision are not referred to in Thompson v. Cullers (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 412, and Sanger Bros. v. City of Waco, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 40 S. W. 549. See subd. II., On the ground of public policy.

But fees were held not to be wages in the following case:

In Porter v. Cobb, 4 Lea, 482, where a commissioner was appointed by the county court to partition land, and his fees were collected as costs and held by the sheriff, who applied the money to the payment of an execution in his hands against the commissioner, it was held that the same was not exempt under Tenn. Acts 1870-71 (Thompson & S. Code, § 2107a), providing there shall be exempt from execution, attachment, or garnishment $30 of the wages of mechanics or other laboring men. In this case, the case of Bank of Tennessee v. Dibreil, 3 Sneed, 379, to the effect that salaries of public officers are exempt, was held not to apply to costs taxed in favor of the commissioners for partition.

A county is chargeable in trustee process for compensation due to a messenger in charge of its courthouse, under appointment of the county commissioners at a fixed salary ordered to be paid from the county treasury. Adams v. Tyler, 121 Mass. 380. In this case it was said that the salary of a messenger having charge of a courthouse constituted a contract, and differed from the case of Williams v. Boardman, 9 Allen, 570, which held that a county was not chargeable as trustee for the fees of a jurymen, as that decision was on the ground that a juror's services were not rendered on any contract and the compensation is allowed by the court, and is neither goods, effects, or credits, within the meaning of the statute. The court further said: "The fact that the legislature, in adopting Rev. Stat. chap. 109, § 6, struck out a provision recommended in the commissioners' report, excepting counties, towns, parishes, and religious societies from liability to be summoned as trustees, is a plain manifestation of their intent that all those corporations should be so liable. That provision of the Revised Statutes is substantially re-enacted in Gen. Stat. chap. 142, §§ 1, 10."

IV. School teacher's salary.

A school teacher is not what is properly called a public officer, but his employment is in a public that the debtor was not an officer. And it seems that, even in the absence of such statute, it has been held that towns and cities could not be garnished for a sum due an officer as part of his salary. Fortune v. St. Louis, 23 Mo. 230; Hawthorn v. St. Louis, 11 Mo. 59, 47 Am. Dec. 141. The court further said: "Public policy forbids creditors from thus stepping in between the city and its public servants; and the statute, in seeking to prevent any future attempt in that direction, went much further, and included all kinds of liabilities, so that a debtor's funds, if in the hands of a municipal corporation, are placed beyond the reach of his creditors by statutory garnishment." The court, however, held in this case that the funds of the debtor were not exempt simply because the same are placed in the city treasury, or under the control of capacity, and he is treated in some cases as a public official, and in others he is not. The authorities are not uniform as to exemption of his salary from attachment and garnishment.

Where a school teacher's wages were garnished, it was held that it is not consistent with public policy to subject the stipends of persons in public employment to be suspended or reached in that way. It was further held, under Mich. Comp. Laws 1871, § 6508, providing that no person shall be adjudged a garnishee by reason of any money in his hands as a public officer for which he is accountable merely as such officer to the principal defendant, that the salary due from a school district could not be garnished. School Dist. No. 4 v. Gage, 39 Mich. 484, 33 Am. Rep. 421.

In Allen v. Russell, 78 Ky. 105, holding that the compensation of a common-school teacher cannot be attached on the ground that the officers of the state are not subject to garnishment, it was further held that "the commonwealth has undertaken to establish and carry on at public expense a system of common schools, and cannot permit the wages of teachers to such schools to be intercepted, whereby it may be deprived of their services, and the efficiency of the system may be impaired."

The salary of a teacher in the employ of the board of education of a city, payable at the expiration of each month, is not subject to garnishment, under Ga. Code, § 3564, providing that all journeymen, mechanics, and day laborers shall be exempt from the process and liability of garnishment on their daily, weekly, or monthly wages, except for those for provisions or board. Hightower v. Slaton, 54 Ga. 108, 21 Am. Rep. 273. In this case the court said the defendant was employed by the board of education as a teacher to promote the public interests as contemplated by the act of general assembly of the state, at a salary which was by the contract to be paid at the end of each month. "If their wages on which they and their families are dependent for support is liable to process of garnishment the public will be deprived of their services because they cannot afford to engage in a business, which must necessarily, if they perform their duty, occupy their whole time, and they cannot labor in their vocation without meat and bread and wherewithal to be clothed."

But in Bates v. Bates, 74 Ga. 105, it was held that a teacher's wages might be garnished for alimony, where the record did not show whether his wages were to be paid daily, monthly, or weekly. It was further held, as the defendant could have been imprisoned for nonpayment of alimony, and so deprived of all means of supporting himself, that this claim occupied a different position from an ordinary debt. A district-school teacher is not a public officer whose salary cannot be attached. Seymour v. Over-River School Dist. 53 Conn. 502, 3 Atl. 552. In this case the court said: "A teacher is not an officer in the ordinary sense of the word. He is not usually elected or appointed, but is employed—contracted with. He has duties to perform incident to his employment, but they are not official duties, and he is not under oath. We see no good reason why his salary should not be liable for his debts, in the same way as the compensation of others employed by the district."

porting himself, that this claim occupied a different position from an ordinary debt.

A district-school teacher is not a public officer whose salary cannot be attached. Seymour v. Over-River School Dist. 53 Conn. 502, 3 Atl. 552. In this case the court said: "A teacher is not an officer in the ordinary sense of the word. He is not usually elected or appointed, but is employed—contracted with. He has duties to perform incident to his employment, but they are not official duties, and he is not under oath. We see no good reason why his salary should not be liable for his debts, in the same way as the compensation of others employed by the district."

V. Officers of municipal corporations in Kentucky.

The salaries of officers of municipal corporations in Kentucky seem to be placed on a different footing from those of state officers, jailers, and school teachers. In that state the creditor may attach the salary due to an officer of a municipal corporation. This is on the ground that a city may be sued at law or in equity.

Salaries of officers of towns and cities may be attached and subjected to the payment of their debts, where the salary is earned and set apart. Speed v. Brown, 10 B. Mon. 108. But it was said that a bill in anticipation of future salary to become due for services to be rendered in future could not be sustained as it would result in expelling the debtor from public service. In this case the case of Divine v. Harvie, 7 T. B. Mon. 439, 18 Am. Dec. 194, which held that money due the auditor from the commonwealth could not be attached, was distinguished, on the ground that a city may be sued at law or in equity.

The salaries of officers of towns and cities may be attached and subjected to the payment of their debts by the coercive process of the law. But the salary of a state officer cannot be attached because the state, being a necessary party, cannot be sued. Rodman v. Musselman, 12 Bush, 354, 23 Am. Rep. 724. In this case the court said: "A town or city, being a municipal corporation, is as subject to suit for what it owes as is a private individual, and any fund due from it to a debtor is as subject to attachment or garnishment while in its hands as if it were a private individual. Nor do we believe that the coercive appropriation of the salary of an officer of one of our towns or cities to payment of his debts conflicts with public policy. The provisions of the 474th section of the Code are general, and apply to all debtors, case at bar. In Lyell v. St. Clair County, 3 McLean, 580, Fed. Cas. No. 8,621, the plaintiff sought to subject certain bonds, mortgages, and assets under the control of defendants for payment of two judgments at law recovered against them. The court below sustained a demurrer, but the supreme court reversed the judgment, and, after a discussion of the questions involved, from which it appears that under the statute of Michigan the county might be sued, said: "The county being made subject to a suit, no serious objection is perceived against reaching the rights in question by the ordinary exercise of chancery powers, independently of statutory provisions." It appears from the opinion in Furlong v. Thomssen, 10 Mo. App. 364, that the court held that a debt due by a municipal corporation to its creditor may, by a creditors' bill, be subjected to the satisfaction of judgment against the latter. In this case it appears that the debt due Thomssen was for erecting an engine house for the city. In Browning v. Bettis, 8 Paige, 568, it is, in substance, held that the salary or compensation to become due at a future time for the performance of services which had not been completed at the time of filing the bill could not be reached by a creditors' bill. But where all the services to entitle defendant to his salary or compensation had been rendered at the time of filing the complainant's bill, such salary or compensation may be reached by the creditor, although it had not become actually payable when the bill was filed. It seems that the defendant in this case was a census taker. It was decided in McCoun v. Dorsheimer, 1 Clarke, Ch. 144, that the unearned salary of an officer cannot be reached by creditors' bill, but so much of the salary as is earned and due at the time of the filing of the bill may be subjected. The same doctrine announced in the case supra is reaffirmed in Smith v. _____, 4 Edw. Ch. 653. The object there sought was to subject one quarter's salary of one of the judges of New York city. It may be inferred from the decision in Hadley

v. Peabody, 13 Gray, 200, that the supreme court of Massachusetts sustains the doctrine announced in the foregoing opinions. The supreme court of Arkansas decided in Riggin v. Hillard, 56 Ark. 476, 20 S. W. 402, that (we quote from the syllabus), "while a county is not subject to the ordinary process of garnishment, yet, in equity, when the interest of the public will not be injuriously affected, the claim of an insolvent creditor of the county may be subjected, by sale or compulsory assignment thereof, to the payment of his debts." The demand sought to be subjected was a debt due from the county to the defendant for repairing the courthouse. The court, in the opinion, said: "The courts commonly concur in holding that public policy forbids any interference between the county and its contractor under such circumstances if the work is still in progress, for the interference would tend to retard the occupancy of the building." The court, in discussing the fact that the county could not be sued, recognized the doctrine to be that a county was not subject to garnishment, and in referring to the case of Boone County v. Keck, 31 Ark. 387, said: "It was a suit directly against the county. The plaintiff's judgment debtor was not a party to it, and the only relief asked was against the county. In the case at bar the plaintiff's debtor is the party against whom relief is sought, and the county is not sued. Therein lies the cardinal difference between the cases. The complaint states a cause of action against Hillard, and shows a right in the plaintiff to subject the debt due by the county to the satisfaction of his demand. That can be accomplished under proper orders of the court,—as by a sale or compulsory assignment of the debt for the purpose of applying the proceeds to the satisfaction of any judgment which the plaintiff is entitled to recover." In Knight v. Nash, 22 Minn. 453, the supreme court of Minnesota held (quoting from the syllabus) that "a debt due from a municipal corporation to a judgment debtor, even though denied by the corporation, may be reached by a final or-and render all equitable estates liable to their provisions, unless the same are exempt by law from the payment of indebtedness. In the case of Speed v. Brown, 10 B. Mon. 109, this court decided that the salary of the marshal of the city of Louisville was subject to the payment of his debts, and that the same could be attached on the return of no property found, and applied to the payment of his judgment creditor. This decision was rendered in 1849, and has been acquiesced in without legislative or judicial change ever since, and must now be regarded as the law of this state. We see no sound public policy that this rule of law contravenes."

And the amount due by a city or set apart to the officer by the city's authority for services performed or about to be performed so that the officer has the right to demand and receive it, is a proper subject of garnishment and can be subjected to the satisfaction of debts due by the officer as any other chose in action; but wages or salary not due at the commencement of suit, but which may be earned by a city officer after the suit is commenced, cannot be attached or subjected to the payment of the officer's debts. Bridgeford v. Keenehan, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 268.

VI. Summary.

An attempt to subject officers' salaries to the claims of their creditors is met in three several ways: First, that the state or municipality is not subject to garnishment. This is a general rule and is not within the scope of this note. Second, that the salary is protected from garnishment on the ground of public policy. This is the general rule in the absence of statutory provision. Third, that the exemption of salary is within the statutory exemption. This is controlled by the construction placed upon the various statutory and Code provisions.

der upon disclosure, directing the transfer of the claim, and appointing a receiver to collect it for the benefit of the creditor. The rule that a debt due from a municipal corporation cannot be reached by process of garnishment has no application to an order of this character." The debt sought to be subjected in this case was not due as salary or fee. We fail to see that the case of Whidden v. Drake, 5 N. H. 13, has any application to the case at bar. The supreme court of Connecticut, in Bray v. Wallingford, 20 Conn. 416, held that a town is subject to the process of attachment in a suit brought against its creditor. The supreme court of Ohio, in Newark v. Funk, 15 Ohio St. 462, decided that salaries of officers of incorporated cities, due and unpaid, might be subjected by judgment creditors of such officers to the payment of such judgments, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Code provision referred to is substantially the same as the provision of the Kentucky Code in regard to the enforcement of judgments. 2 Shinn, Attachm. § 501, is cited by appellant, but the doctrine there announced does not seem to be different from that announced in the opinions supra.

This action is assumed to be authorized by § 439, Ky. Civil Code of Practice, which we deem it unnecessary to quote. The appellant refers us to numerous decisions of this court in support of his contention, which we have carefully examined, but deem it unnecessary to refer to in detail, but will only refer to such as we think necessary. It was held in Field v. Chipley, 79 Ky. 200, 42 Am. Rep. 215, that a contract by which the clerk of the Louisville chancery court transferred and assigned to a trustee, for the benefit of appellant, in consideration of a debt due him, all the fees and emoluments of his office in the future, until the debt was paid, with conditions to pay deputies, etc., was void. It is against public policy that such contracts should be enforced. That the auditor has, under the statute, the right to look to the clerk for taxes on suits collected by him. The trustee will not be recognized as the person to receive them. In Johnson v. Elkins, 90 Ky. 163, 8 L. R. A. 552, 13 S. W. 448, it was held that when pension money was invested in land the land was subject to the debts of the pensioner. This proposition has been so often and so recently decided that any further reference to the same is unnecessary. It may be remarked that it was decided by this court in Hudspeth v. Harrison, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 304, that pension money is exempt only until it reaches the hands of the pensioner. In Rodman v. Musselman, 12 Bush, 354, 23 Am. Rep. 724, it was held that salaries of officers of towns and cities may be attached and subjected to the payment of their debts; but the salary of a state officer cannot be attached, because the state, being a necessary party, cannot be sued. It is otherwise as to a town or city. Stone v. Mayo, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1559, 55 S. W. 700, is referred to. The opinion in this case holds 54 L. R. A.

that the auditor might withhold money due a circuit clerk on account of the clerk's official indebtedness on account of unconstitutional payment made to him as clerk during a former term of office; the action of the auditor being based upon § 4701, Ky. Stat. It was said in the opinion that there seemed to be no reasons of public policy which would preclude the auditor from so withholding the former indebtedness of the clerk to the commonwealth. It may be conceded that this court, in Teeter v. Williams, 3 B. Mon. 562, 39 Am. Dec. 485, in substance decided that the plaintiff, by the aid of the chancellor, could attach whatever might be due his debtor for labor already performed, and he might attach whatever might become due upon an existing contract for his future labor. But neither the creditor nor chancellor could compel him to work out his part of the contract, so as to earn the promised reward for the exclusive use of his creditor. In the case of Kennedy v. Aldridge, 5 B. Mon. 141, it appears that Robinson, by the authority of Kennedy, had drawn $50 as his compensation, as one of the commissioners of Garrard county, for taking in the lists of taxable property. The court below held that the money in Robinson's hands was subject to the attachment. In passing upon this question, this court said: "It is contended, on the authority of the case of Divine v. Harvie, 7 T. B. Mon. 439, 18 Am. Dec. 194, that the fund now in question, being the compensation payable by the state to a public officer or agent, should be protected until it reaches the hands of the officer or agent. But this case differs essentially from the one referred to, in the fact that in that case the money attempted to be appropriated to the satisfaction of the creditor's demand remained in the treasury, whereas in this it has been paid to the authorized agent of the person entitled to receive it from the state. The objection that the act authorizing the attachment and subjection of the debtor's choses in action does not include his debts due from the state does not, therefore, apply in this case." We have examined the case of Spced v. Brown, 10 B. Mon. 108, but the doctrine therein announced is in accord with other decisions noticed; hence we need not restate the same proposition.

The appellees cite numerous authorities in support of their contention, which we have examined at great length. It may be taken as well settled that in the case of jailers, school commissioners, and school teachers, their salaries should not be subjected to the claims of creditors, for reasons given in the several opinions. The opinions chiefly rest upon the ground of public policy,—that the salaries are necessary to enable those officers to discharge the duties resting upon them. It is not the contention of appellant that he can, by an ordinary attachment or garnishment, subject the salary of appellee, nor appropriate the whole of it to the payment of his claim. It is the contention of appellant that the proof in this case shows conclusively that $3,000 per annum is amply sufficient to support the appellee in the style in which he moves and sufficient for an ample support commensurate with his social position; and it is argued that a court of equity has the power, and that it ought, by appropriate orders, to compel the appellee to set aside from time to time a reasonable portion of his salary for the payment of plaintiff's claim. It may be conceded that there is some conflict of authority upon this question. It does not seem to have been directly passed upon by this court. Nor do we deem it necessary to now decide as to the power of a court of equity to make such orders as are contended for by appellant. Undoubtedly, one of the objects in allowing to officers fees or salaries is for their support, and to enable them to discharge the duties of office; but we are not inclined to the opinion that it was the intention of the lawmakers to limit such compensation to the actual necessities of life, but, rather, that it was intended to allow such officers compensation commensurate with the official duties and responsibilities devolving upon them. And inasmuch as most men desire to accumulate something, and the public commends such desire, we think it not unreasonable that the lawmakers intended that the officers might have like opportunities. Under our present Constitution, no officer except the governor is allowed a greater compensation than $5,000 per annum. This being true, we think public policy demands that the courts refuse to require any officer to set apart any part of his salary for the payment of his debts. The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed in respect to this question.

It is, however, earnestly contended for appellant that the real estate mentioned in the petition should be held subject to plaintiff's claim, while it is equally as earnestly contended for appellee that he has a right to assign his salary to his wife, or to have the land in question deeded to her, and especially so for the reason that he had received large sums of money from her in the past, and that he desired to pay the same. That he did receive such large sums of money from her is clearly proved in this case. We have already referred to the decision holding the assignment of fees to be void and against public policy. It has been repeatedly decided by this court that pension money received by a pensioner and invested in real estate can be subjected to the demand of an antecedent creditor, and it would be entirely inconsistent with such a rule to hold that officers' fees or salary invested in real estate should be exempt from antecedent debts, even if we were deciding—which we do not—that an officer's fees or salary are exempt by statute from the debts of the officer. It is further suggested for appellee that, even if the debt due his wife was barred by the statute of limitation, he had a right to waive that statute and pay the debt, which he undoubtedly did have, if such a debt existed, and its payment was not prejudicial to the rights of another. After a careful consideration of the law and facts, we have reached the conclusion that the relation of creditor and debtor did not exist between the appellees at the time of the purchase and conveyance of the real estate in question. It therefore follows that the conveyance to Mrs. Johnson was without consideration and void as to creditors, and that the court erred in refusing to subject the same to the payment of plaintiff's claim.

The judgment to that extent is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to adjudge the real estate subject to plaintiff's claim, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Lillie CAMPBELL

v.

SUPREME CONCLAVE IMPROVED ORDER HEPTASOPHS, Plff. in Err.

(.....N. J.....)

Suicide will not defeat recovery upon a contract of life insurance not procured by the insured with the intention of committing suicide, unless the contract so provides in express terms.

(Magie, Ch. J., and Van Syckel, Gummers, Hendrickson, Adams, and Vroom, JJ., dissent.)

*Headnote by COLLINS, J.

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that a policy of life insurance taken with the intent to commit suicide is void, although there is no provision in the policy against suicide, see Ritter v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 42 L. R. A. 583, Affirmed in 169 U. S. 139, 42 L. ed. 54 L. R. A.

ERROR to the Supreme Court at Circuit in Salem County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount pledged to be due on a mutual benefit certificate. Affirmed.

Statement by COLLINS, J.:

This cause was tried at the Salem circuit before the late Justice Ludlow and a jury. The declaration was upon a benefit certificate issued January 25, 1897, by a fraternal order incorporated in Maryland, to Dr. John G. Campbell, of Elmer, New Jersey, a member of a subordinate conclave located in that town, wherein it promised, upon satisfactory evidence of his death and surrender of the certificate, provided he should be in good standing in the order at the time of his death, and the certificate should not have been surrendered by him, and another certificate issued at his request, in accordance with the laws of the order, to pay to his wife, Lillie Campbell, out of its benefit fund, the sum of $3,000. Issue was joined on pleas—First, of non assumption; and, second, that on December 20, 1898, said John G. Campbell, being in sound mind, did terminate his life by suicide. But the entire controversy at the trial was under the second plea. There was evidence to warrant a finding by the jury that Dr. Campbell intentionally killed himself by a pistol shot just after his arrest on a charge of forgery, made as he was returning home from professional calls as a physician. The trial justice directed a verdict for the plaintiff after refusing various requests to charge presented by the defendant, the most comprehensive of which was as follows: "(5) That although the by-laws of the defendant, as also the benefit certificate sued on, are silent as to suicide, there is an implied condition in the contract that, if the event upon which the risk was assured—the death of the said Campbell—was brought about by his own deliberate act while in sound mind, there can be no recovery." Exception was duly sealed on the refusal of this request. If it was properly refused, the direction of verdict was right; otherwise, there should be a new trial.

Mr. Jonathan W. Acton for defendant in error.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It has been considered by some that benefit societies are sui generis, as respects the payment of death benefits to dependents of their members, and that the uniform denial of the defense of unexcepted suicide in suits to recover on their benefit certificates is to be placed on grounds peculiar to the character of such societies. There is no doubt that such defense has never been allowed. Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 337, and cases cited. But those societies have no such peculiar status. Their benefits stand on the footing of all death claims. I shall treat this case, therefore, as within the general range of life insurance. In the words of the author of a treatise on that subject published in the year 1891: "If performance by an insurer is, in general terms, conditioned on the death of the insured, there seems no valid reason why death by committing suicide should not be included; and such is the general doctrine." Cooke, Life Ins. § 41. Contrary judicial dicta will be found in a few decisions in England and in this country, but no direct adverse adjudication until the Ritter Case, hereinafter mentioned. The case of Supreme Commandery K. of the G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 46 Am. Rep. 332 (A. D. 1882), is sometimes cited as such an adjudication; but, on a careful reading of the report, it is evident that the opinion of the court, declared by Chief Justice Brickell with much ability from his standpoint, was not necessary to the decision of the cause. The application of the doctrine has always happened to be in cases where the insurance was effected for some designated beneficiary other than the insured; and, to that extent, no state court has departed from it, as will be seen on examination of the cases cited in the most recent publications. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1016; Joyce, Ins. § 2653; May, Ins. 4th ed. A. D. 1900, § 324, note a; 4 Berryman, Ins. Dig. (A. D. 1901) 1530 et seq. It should be understood, of course, that I have not been speaking of insurance procured with the intention of committing suicide. That, all courts concede, is voidable because of fraud. The Ritter Case arose in 1892, was decided in 1895, 42 L. R. A. 583, 17 C. C. A. 537, 28 U. S. App. 612, 70 Fed. 954, and affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 1898. Ritter v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 169 U. S. 139, 42 L. ed. 693, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 300. There were several policies in suit, all alike in tenor, and all payable to the insured, his executors, administrators, and assigns. The real contracts, as evidenced by the applications for them, excepted death by suicide within two years, which time had not elapsed; but by virtue of a statute of Pennsylvania, where the contracts were made, the trial court had ruled out the applications because not attached to the policies, which themselves expressed no such exception. The proof was plenary that the insurance was procured with the intent to commit suicide, but as the trial court had expressly charged the jury that there could in no case be recovery if the insured had taken his own life designedly while of sound mind, the general question was necessarily involved. The decision was that because the verdict established that Runk, the insured, had committed suicide while sane, his executor could not recover. The supreme court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, held (p. 160, 169 U. S. p. 700, 42 L. ed., and p. 307, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep.) that the death of the insured, "if directly and intentionally caused by himself when in sound mind, was not a risk intended to be covered, or which could legally have been covered, by the policies in suit." Diligent research has led to a discovery of no other reported case directly adjudging that suicide will bar recovery upon a policy not excepting it in express terms, and not procured with the intention of committing suicide, except the later one of Hopkins v. Northwestern Life Assur. Co. 94 Fed. 729, where a United States circuit court, being bound by the Ritter Case, extended, and, I think logically extended, the bar against recovery to a policy taken out by the insured for the benefit of his wife. The judgment was affirmed, however, upon other grounds. 40 C. C. A. 1, 99 Fed. 199.

I will consider first the proposition that sane suicide, though unexcepted in express terms, is not a risk intended to be covered by a life insurance contract. In the early life policies, death by suicide was excepted from the liability of the insurer; and in some cases this was expressed to be so, whether the insured was sane or insane at the time of the act. In a note to the case of Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Mann. & G. 639, decided in the year 1843, there appears a list of the varying forms of the exception as appearing in the policies customarily issued by eighteen of the leading companies of England. Adjudication in this country, contrary to that in England, that the condition of sanity was implied in a general exception of suicide, led to the common expression in subsequent policies of a contrary intent. Later, as such stringency was seen to be unwise, it was relaxed, and still later, as the outcome of contest over sanity showed any exception to be futile, and as such an exception discouraged insurance, it came to be omitted altogether, or made of very short duration. The history of insurance makes difficult the argument that the exception is not now expressed because necessarily implied. The contrary has been the course of evolution in the analogous case of death resulting as a punishment for crime. In an early English decision,—Amicable Society v. Bolland (Fauntleroy's Case) 4 Bligh, N. R. 194, A. D. 1830,—such a death was held to be an implied exception; but the effect of the raising of the question, notwithstanding its decision favorably to the insurer, was to lead to the general introduction into policies of an express exception. Chief Justice Brickell, of Alabama, was alive to this situation when he expressed a strong, though not deterrent, reluctance "to introduce, by construction or implication, exceptions into such contracts, which usually contain special exceptions." Supreme Commandery K. of the G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 447, 46 Am. Rep. 332, 337. Of course, the question is an open one, and the views of so influential a tribunal as the Supreme Court of the United States deserve most careful consideration. The reason for implying the exception is thus stated by Judge Harlan (109 U. S. 153, 42 L. ed. 698, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306): "In the case of fire insurance it is well settled that although a policy in the usual form, indemnifying against loss by fire, may cover a loss attributable merely to the negligence or carelessness of the insured, unaffected by fraud or design, it will not cover a destruction of the property by the wilful act of the assured himself in setting fire to it, not for the purpose of avoiding a peril of a worse kind, but with the intention of simply effecting its destruction. Much more should it be held that it is not contemplated by a policy taken out by the person whose life is insured, and stipulating for the payment of a named sum to himself, his executors, administrators, or assigns, that the company should be liable if his death was intentionally caused by himself when in sound mind. When the policy is silent as to suicide, it is to be taken that the subject of the insurance—that is, the life of the assured—shall not be intentionally and directly, with whatever motive, destroyed by him when in sound mind. To hold otherwise is to say that the occurrence of the event upon the happening of which the company undertook to pay was intended to be left to his option. This view is against the very essence of the contract." The conclusion stated is a plain non sequitur. Suicide is only one of many ways that may determine the event of death. Insurance rates are based upon an average expectancy of life derived from experience tables embracing suicide as well as all other causes of mortality. Many intelligent persons believe that suicide self-evinces a morbid state of mind, and insurers, in a large volume of business, may well offset the natural love of life against the infrequent impulse of self-destruction. The supposed analogy to other insurance is not new. In Moore v. Woolsey, 4 El. & Bl. 243, 254, Lord Campbell said, obiter: "If a man insures his life for a year, and commits suicide within the year, his executors cannot recover on the policy, as the owner of a ship who insures her for a year cannot recover on the policy if within the year he causes her to be sunk." The reasoning is specious and the analogy is false. It is quite right that wilful and unnecessary destruction of the subject of fire or marine insurance should at the same time destroy the insurer's liability. The courts therefore imply in such a case an exception from the general terms of the contract, because that must have been intended. But the case of life insurance is not parallel. Strict insurance is indemnity. Voluntary and unnecessary destruction of the property insured is inconsistent with the basis of the contract, but the basis of that which by a misnomer is called "insurance upon life" is altogether different. That is an arbitrary agreement to pay a fixed sum upon the happening of an inevitable event, to wit, the death of the insured, without regard to the value of his life or the loss sustained by the assured. That a contract of life insurance is not a contract of indemnity was decided in the exchequer chamber in 1854. Dalby v. India & L. Life Assur. Co. 15 C. B. 365, overruling Godsall v. Boldero, 9 East, 72. There is no force in any argument derived from contracts of indemnity. Another reason not expressly stated by Judge Harlan, but frequently assigned in judicial dicta for the implication declared by him, is that without it the insured would be deriving a benefit from his own wrongful act, which will never be presumed to be within the intention of contracting parties. For example, recovery on a life-insurance policy assigned by the insured to his creditor, who afterwards murdered him, has rightfully been denied. New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877. Granting the inherent wrongfulness of suicide, which is matter for the moralist rather than the judge, this doctrine fails when applied thereto. No one in this world can derive a benefit by his own death. By that final event all earthly profit ends for him to whom it comes. He is for this life equally beyond gain and loss, and as to him the rules that govern mundane intercourse become no longer applicable. Those who derive the benefit will have done no wrong. But it is said that suicide is a fraud on the insurer. To procure insurance with intent to commit suicide is a fraud on the insurer that should defeat recovery at the option of the insurer, and, with all the incidents of a rescission, will avoid the contract, even as against beneficiaries or assignees. Smith v. National Ben. Soc. 123 N. Y. 85, 9 L. R. A. 616, 25 N. E. 197. But to argue that suicide, not previously intended, is such a fraud as to defeat recovery, is to beg the very question of what is the contract; and the argument assumes that insurance rates are fixed upon a basis excluding death by suicide, while, as we have seen, the contrary must be the case, for the experience tables include all forms of death. Moreover, it would be next to impossible to fasten the fraudulent intent. The motives for suicide are difficult to fathom, and are usually complex. In the case in hand, Dr. Campbell doubtless took his life through overwhelming chagrin due to arrest on a criminal charge. It is highly improbable that he thought at all of his insurance. To submit to a jury in each case the intent of the act would be practically fruitless. A general imperative rule in all cases must be established, and such seems to be the view of Judge Harlan; for he says that intentional self-destruction, with whatever motive, is impliedly excepted from the contract. As a mere matter of construction, it is of no importance what rule is to govern future contracts; but, in view of the historical aspect of the subject, the reading into contracts of life insurance this unexpressed exception will be sure to work great hardship. Many policies are being carried by creditors or others interested without a formal assignment, or the possibility of compelling one, except by consent of the insurer. These persons have rightly felt secure against recklessness or malignity extending even to suicide, and their investments should not be imperiled.

Lastly to be considered is the proposition that intentional suicide when in sound mind is not a risk which can legally be covered by insurance. This rests upon a postulated public policy. Judge Harlan says: "A contract, the tendency of which is to endanger the public interests or injuriously affect the public good, or which is subversive of sound morality, ought never to receive the sanction of a court of justice, or be made the foundation of its judgment. If, therefore, a policy taken out by the person whose life is insured, and in which the sum named is made payable to himself, his executors, administrators, or assigns, expressly provided for the payment of the sum stipulated when or if the assured in sound mind took his own life, the contract, even if not prohibited by statute, would be held to be against public policy, in that it tempted or encouraged the assured to commit suicide in order to make provision for those dependent upon him or to whom he was indebted." We are not concerned with an express contract to pay in case of suicide, but with a normal life-insurance policy. Payment is to be made upon the event of death, and the risk of death by suicide, as applied to the volume of insurance, is almost infinitesimal. The real question is whether it is against sound public policy for the insurer to assume the risk. It is urged that parties may not contract for even a possible obligation resting on criminality. Doubtless such is the law. Amicable Society v. Bolland (Fauntleroy's Case), 4 Bligh, N. R. 194, rests upon that principle; and it has recent illustration in the state of Massachusetts, where the supreme court denied insurance because the death of an insured woman resulted from a criminal abortion. Hatch v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 120 Mass. 550, 21 Am. Rep. 541. But suicide is not criminal in New Jersey. Punishment is of the essence of crime, and suicide is not punishable here. Blackstone defines a crime or misdemeanor to be "an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it." 4 Rl. Com. 5. A recent writer more tersely says, "A crime is an act or omission [or commission] punishable as an offense against the state." McClain, Crim. Law, § 4. At common law suicide was both criminal and felonious, although the punishment, except that of anticipatory dread, was of necessity visited upon the innocent, unless insensate clay can be said to have been punished by the burial in the highway and the driven stake. But in this country, generally, there is neither forfeiture of goods nor other penalty attached to suicide, which is therefore "little more than the shadow of a crime." Patterson v. Natural Premium Mut. L. Ins. Co. 100 Wis. 118, 42 L. R. A. 253, 75 N. W. 980. This case decides that suicide does not fall within the usual exception in a life-insurance policy of death resulting from a violation of law. The opinion of Winslow, J., well merits study on all the phases of the subject now sub judice. It is a model of terse, logical reasoning, but, like most judicial utterance since the Ritter Case, which is evidently disapproved, it is confined to cases where the insurance is payable to a beneficiary. In New York, also, it has been held that death by suicide does not result from violation of law, although by an exclusive penal Code an unsuccessful attempt to commit suicide is there a crime, while suicide is not. Darrow v. Family Fund Soc. 116 N. Y. 537, 6 L. R. A. 495, 22 N. E. 1093. In New Jersey neither suicide nor attempt to commit suicide has, since 1796, at least, been criminal. This results from the enactment in that year that no conviction or judgment for any offense against the state shall make or work forfeiture of estate. Paterson's Laws, p. 221, § 75, continued to the latest revision of our criminal procedure act (P. L. 1898, p. 919, § 153).

As to the abstract immorality of suicide generally, opinions may differ, but all will admit that in some cases it is ethically defensible. Else, how could a man "lay down his life for his friend?" Suicide may be self-sacrifice, as when a woman slays herself to save her honor. Sometimes self-destruction, humanly speaking, is excusable, as where a man curtails by weeks or months the agony of an incurable disease. It will not do to resort to the argument that in such cases there is no "felonious intent." As to direct suicide, all that the common law required to make one a felo de se was that he should be of years of discretion and in his senses, and should mean to kill himself. 4 Bl. Com. 189; Hale, P. C. 411. Extenuation could only be considered by the King, who would "execute judgment in mercy." Judge Harlan has not yet yielded to this argument; for, "with whatever motive" self-destruction is accomplished, it, in his view, defeats recovery. Inquiry into an intent, formed after procuring insurance, to defraud the insurer by suicide, has seemed to me impracticable. Inquiry into any other evil intent seems just as impracticable. On whom would rest the burden of proof, and how could complex motives be unraveled? Some general rule must control this question of public policy. Cases cannot be individualized. As to the public good requiring the discouragement of suicide, there may be also two opinions. The paternal theory of government does not here prevail. The common law condemned suicide, according to Hale and Blackstone, ubi supra, not only for religious reasons, but for the temporal one that the King has an interest in the preservation of all his subjects, and doubtless the same is true of an organized commonwealth and its citizens; but I cannot see that the public good is more concerned to prolong a life that may be worthless to the public than to secure to creditors their just demands, or to afford a maintenance to wife and children. Insurers may guard their interests in their contracts. I know no public policy more useful than that which holds contractors to performance. That opinions of what is sound public policy upon this subject are not all alike is shown by that which has been declared in the great state of Missouri by its legislature. For many years no defense of suicide in a suit to collect life insurance has been permitted unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court or jury at the trial that the insured contemplated suicide at the time of application for the policy, and any contrary provision in a policy is made void. Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5855. If it be public policy to interfere with contracts in order to discourage suicide, then ought the contract of a creditor insuring the life of his debtor, or a wife insuring the life of her husband, to be defeated by the suicide of the insured, for the same motive of self-destruction for the benefit of the assured will be impelling in such cases as in a case where the contract is directly with the insured; yet it has never been suggested that one having an insurable interest in another's life may not at his own cost himself contract insurance on that life, or take an assignment of an existing policy, without the risk of forfeiture by the suicide of the insured. Indeed, it has been held otherwise even in England, where suicide is criminal. Cook v. Black, 1 Hare, 390; Moore v. Woolsey, 4 El. & Bl. 243, 254. The fact that the insured pays the premiums and purchases insurance for a designated beneficiary, or for the benefit of his estate, can make no difference in his mental attitude. He can gain nothing by his death, and normally his estate will go either to his creditors or to his widow and next of kin. I see no sensible reason to affirm the contract in one case and disallow it in the other. I have said that no adjudged case has permitted suicide as a defense against a beneficiary other than the insured. This is true, with one exception, even where the decision in the Ritter Case has been recognized as sound or controlling. Judge Harlan himself was very careful to go no further than the case required. The exception to which I have alluded is the Hopkins Case, above cited, but to my mind the extension in that case was logical. What difference does it make whether a man contracting insurance designates in the contract the beneficiary, or leaves that designation to the law or his last will and testament. The contract is with him, and it is no more consistent with public policy that he should be allowed to contract that his suicide should not forfeit the right of a beneficiary named in the policy to receive the insurance money, than that he should be allowed to contract that such suicide should not forfeit the right of those who otherwise would receive it as creditors, distributees, or legatees of his estate. The decisions, since the Ritter Case, denying suicide as a defense to silent policies, must, logically, either reprobate that case, or distinguish it only on the ground that, as against a beneficiary named, the exception of the death of the insured by suicide cannot be constructively implied.

I conclude that in no case should the suicide of an insured person defeat recovery upon a contract of life insurance not procured by him with the intention of committing suicide, unless the contract so provides in express terms. Presumably the contract in this case was consummated in New Jersey, but if we look to Maryland, the state of the defendant's incorporation, for the law which is to govern, it will be found no different. In a very recent decision of the court of appeals of that state, in a controversy with this same defendant, after full consideration of both the grounds of objection to recovery that I have been discussing, the same conclusion, and for substantially the same reasons, has been reached. Supreme Conclave, I. O. of H. v. Miles, 92 Md. 613, 48 Atl. 845.

The direction of verdict for plaintiff was correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

Garrison, J., concurring:

The opinion of Mr. Justice Collins holds that to procure insurance with intent to commit suicide is a fraud on the insurer that should defeat recovery, but that suicide with an intent to defraud the insurer, if formed after getting the insurance, is not such a fraud as should defeat recovery. I think that the same result should follow in either of the above instances of fraud. The burden of proving the fraudulent intent in either event is upon the insurer. This burden was not borne at the trial. My failure to concur in the opinion of the court, therefore, does not lead to my dissent from the judgment of affirmance pronounced by it.

Magie, Ch. J., and Van Syckel, Gum-mere, Hendrickson, Adams, and Vroom, JJ., dissent.

Van Syckel, J., dissenting:

This is an action by Lillie Campbell, the beneficiary named in a certain benefit certificate issued by the plaintiff to her late husband, John G. Campbell, by virtue of his having become a member of the said subordinate conclave, a fraternal organization located in this state. Neither the benefit certificate nor the by-laws of the order contained any provision whatever with reference to suicide. On the trial of the cause there was testimony tending to show that John G. Campbell committed suicide, and also that he was irresponsible mentally at the time of his self-destruction. At the conclusion of the testimony the court directed the jury to render a verdict for the plaintiff, although the defendant requested the court to charge the jury that, if the said Campbell committed suicide while he was of sound mind, there should be a verdict for the defendant. The bill of exceptions and the assignment of errors present the question whether the request of the defendant was properly refused.

Campbell named the plaintiff, who was his wife, as the beneficiary on the certificate, but he had the right at any time to change the beneficiary without her consent. It seems clear, therefore, that the plaintiff had no vested interest in the certificate, and so the cases hold. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Burkhardt, 110 Ind. 189, 10 N. E. 79, 11 N. E. 449; Hellenberg v. District No. 1 of I. O. of B. B., 94 N. Y. 581; Knights of Honor v. Watson, 64 N. H. 517, 15 Atl. 125. The case, therefore, turns upon the question whether the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict if Campbell, while of sound mind, committed suicide. In the recent case of Ritter v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. reported in 169 U. S. 139, 42 L. ed. 693, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 300, this question is discussed with much ability. Mr. Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "It is contended that the court erred in saying to the jury, as in effect it did, that intentional self-destruction, the assured being of sound mind, is in itself a defense to an action upon a life policy, even if such policy does not in express words declare that it shall be void in the event of self-destruction when the assured is in sound mind. But is it not an implied condition of such a policy that the assured will not purposely, when in sound mind, take his own life, but will leave the event of his death to depend upon some cause other than wilful, deliberate self-destruction? Looking at the nature and object of life insurance, can it be supposed to be within the contemplation of either party to the contract that the company shall be liable upon its promise to pay, where the assured, in sound mind, by destroying his own life intentionally precipitates the event upon the happening of which such liability was to arise? . . . If a person should apply for a policy expressly providing that the company should pay the sum named if or in the event the assured at any time during the continuance of the contract committed self-destruction, being at the same time of sound mind, it is reasonably certain that the application would be instantly rejected. It is impossible to suppose that an application of that character would be granted. If experience justifies this view, it would follow that a policy stipulating generally for the payment of the sum named in it upon the death of the assured should not be interpreted as intended to cover the event of death caused directly and intentionally by self-destruction whilst the assured was in sound mind, but only death occurring in the ordinary course of life. . . . In the case of fire insurance it is well settled that although a policy in the usual form, indemnifying against loss by fire, may cover a loss attributable merely to the negligence or carelessness of the insured, unaffected by fraud or design, it will not cover a destruction of the property by the wilful act of the assured himself in setting fire to it, not for the purpose of avoiding a peril of a worse kind, but with the intention of simply effecting its destruction. Much more should it be held that it is not contemplated by a policy taken out by the person whose life is insured and stipulating for the payment of a named sum to himself, his executors, administrators, or assigns, that the company should be liable if his death was intentionally caused by himself when in sound mind. When the policy is silent as to suicide, it is to be taken that the subject of the insurance, that is, the life of the assured, shall not be intentionally and directly, with whatever motive, destroyed by him when in sound mind. To hold otherwise is to say that the occurrence of the event upon the happening of which the company undertook to pay was to be left to his option. That view is against the very essence of the contract. There is another consideration supporting the contention that death intentionally caused by the act of the assured when in sound mind—the policy being silent as to suicide—is not to be deemed to have been within the contemplation of the parties; that is, that a different view would attribute to them a purpose to make a contract that could not be enforced without injury to the public. A contract the tendency of which is to endanger the public interests, or injuriously affect the public good, or which is subversive of sound morality, ought never to receive the sanction of a court of justice, or be made the foundation of its judgment. If, therefore, a policy taken out by the person whose life is insured, and in which the sum named is made payable to himself, his executors, administrators, or assigns, expressly provided for the payment of the sum stipulated when or if the assured, in sound mind, took his own life, the contract, even if not prohibited by statute, would be held to be against public policy, in that it tempted or encouraged the assured to commit suicide in order to make provision for those dependent upon him, or to whom he was indebted. Is the case any different in principle if such a policy be silent as to suicide, and the event insured against—the death of the assured—is brought about by his wilful, deliberate act when in sound mind?" Justice Harlan fortifies his conclusions by reference to many cases cited and discussed in his opinion. I concur in the views he has so forcibly expressed. Death, in its commonly understood acceptation, does not include death by one's own hand. Additional words must be used to convey the fact that it was death by self-destruction. It is not necessary for the defense in this case to impart additional words into this contract, or in any respect add to its terms. In property insurance the recognized defense that the assured wilfully set fire to the subject of the insurance does not write any new condition in the policy. Its correct construction as written forbids recovery upon it. So the reasonable and just interpretation of the language used in the benefit certificate in this case precludes the idea that the death of Campbell by his own hand while of sound mind was the death to which the insurance applied. Such insurance, if expressed in the certificate, I think, could not be a legal basis of action; and, if unexpressed, it can have no greater legal value. In my judgment, the Ritter Case was decided in accordance with the correct rules of interpretation, and with well-recognized legal principles. It is a general rule that a man cannot make a profit or gain an advantage by his own wrongful act, and a right of action to a third person who had no vested interest in the contract should not be permitted to arise out of the wrongful act of the insured. Recovery in this case is, to some extent, an encouragement of suicide.

My conclusion is that the questions whether the assured committed suicide, and whether he was of sound mind at the time, should have been submitted to the jury. The trial court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff, and therefore the judgment should be reversed. The Judges who voted to reverse concur in this opinion.

Samuel B. TUTTLE and Wife

v.

ATLANTIC CITY RAILROAD COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.

*1. A woman, seeing a car which had been derailed while a flying drill was being made coming out of the limits of a freight yard and across a public street at great speed towards the place where she was standing, in fright ran for safety, and fell, injuring herself. Held, that she was entitled to recover damages for such injury.

*2. Where one by negligence puts another under a reasonable apprehension of personal physical injury, and, in a reasonable effort to escape, the latter sustains physical injury, a right of action arises to recover for the physical injury and the mental disorder naturally incident to its occurrence.

ERROR to the Supreme Court at Circuit in Camden County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Willard Morgan and Charles V. D. Jelline, for plaintiff in error:

There was no imminent danger, and the case should, for that reason, have been taken from the jury.

Jewett v. Paterson R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 431, 41 Atl. 707.

It was plaintiff's duty to look carefully. She acted on impulse. Nor was her fright, resulting in the giving out of her knee, the proximate, reasonable, or natural result of the car crossing the street.

Ewing v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 147 Pa. 44, 14 L. R. A. 666, 23 Atl. 340.

The accident, if at all, was occasioned by fright.

Ward v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. (N. J. L.) 47 Atl. 561; Mitchell v. Rochester R. Co. 151 N. Y. 107, 34 L. R. A. 781, 45 N. E. 354.

The weakness of the knee was the result of a nervous shock caused by fright of an anticipated event which never happened. It resulted from the constitution and circumstances of the individual. Damages, therefore, are too remote.

Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 225.

The damage must be the natural and reasonable result of the defendant's act,—such a consequence as, in the ordinary course of things, would flow from the act.

One may be bound to anticipate and guard against the probable consequences to ordinary people, but to carry the rule of damages further imposes an undue measure of responsibility upon those who are guilty of unintentional negligence. The general rule limits damages in such cases to the natural and probable consequences of the acts done.

Vroom, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of error in this cause brings up the record of a suit brought in the supreme court and tried at the Camden circuit court. The defendant, the Atlantic City Railroad Company, maintained a freight yard on the south side of Mechanic street, in the city of Camden; and on the 25th day of September, 1899, while a flying drill was being made, one of the cars was derailed, and dashed across Mechanic street over two curbstones and two trolley tracks, and broke through the front of the house opposite No. 293, belonging to a Mrs. Brennan. At the time of the accident, Mrs. Tuttle, one of the plaintiffs, was on the sidewalk near the Brennan house, and, looking, she saw the car coming across the street at full speed. Becoming frightened at the noise, she started to run, and, when three or four doors below, fell, and injured her left knee. At the close of the plaintiff's case a motion for a nonsuit was made on the part of the defendant upon the ground that, if any negligent conduct had been proved on the part of the defendant by reason of this car having gotten away from where it belonged, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in going away from a place of safety to a place of insecurity; that she was at a safe distance from the car, and there was no occasion for her to remove from it. The testimony, however, of the plaintiff was that she was in front of Mrs. Brennan's door, or had just passed it, when she saw the car coming over; and it was further disclosed by the testimony that this car, in coming across the street was not running on any track. Is it reasonable, even, to suppose that the plaintiff could have had any means of knowing the direction the car would take? She was rightfully on the street, and the unusual sight of a car crashing across the street at full speed precluded any possibility of reflection as to the best thing to do. Acting under the impulse of fear, she ran, and, just as the car crashed into the Brennan house, she fell. The motion to nonsuit was denied, and the trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs. The real question in issue in the case and to be determined by the jury was whether the plaintiff Mrs. Tuttle, seeing the car approaching at great speed across this street, was justified in running to escape from what she supposed was an imminent danger. In the case of Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 189, 10 L. ed. 120, which was an action brought to recover damages sustained by the wife of the plaintiff by the upsetting of a stage coach in which she was a passenger, the question was whether the stage was upset by the negligence of the driver or by the act of the plaintiff and his wife in rashly and improperly springing from it. The court held that, "if the want of proper skill or care of the driver placed the passengers in a state of peril, and they had at that time a reasonable ground for supposing that the stage would upset, or that the driver was incapable of managing his horses, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, although the jury may believe from the position in which the stage was placed from the negligence of the driver the attempt of the plaintiff or his wife to escape may have increased the peril, or even caused the stage to upset, and although they also find that the plaintiff and his wife would probably have sustained little or no injury if they had remained in the stage." And in the case of Jones v. Boyce, 1 Starkie, 493, which was an action against a coach proprietor for so neg-ligerly conducting the coach that the plaintiff, an outside passenger, was obliged to jump off the coach, in consequence of which his leg was broken, Lord Ellenborough held: "To enable the plaintiff to sustain the action, it is not necessary that he should have been thrown off the coach. It is sufficient if he was placed by the misconduct of the defendant in such a situation as obliged him to adopt the alternative of a dangerous leap, or to remain at a certain peril. . . . On the other hand, if the plaintiff's act resulted from a rash apprehension of danger, which did not exist, and the injury he sustained is to be attributed to rashness and imprudence, he is not entitled to recover." The doctrine is concisely stated in 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 89: "If one is placed, by the negligence of another, in such a position that he is compelled to choose instantly, in the face of grave and apparent peril, between two hazards, and he makes such a choice as a person of ordinary prudence placed in such a position might make, the fact that, if he had chosen the other hazard, he would have escaped injury, is of no importance." The contention of the defendant company was that the plaintiff was in a safe place, and that, while it was true that the sight of a car coming as this one did was unusual, still that there was nothing attendant upon it which should lead one in a safe position precipitately to leave it. The counsel for the defendant at the trial requested the judge to charge that, "if the jury believe that Mrs. Tuttle was at a safe location before the injury complained of, and was afterwards injured by removing from such safe place, she cannot recover; but this matter was correctly disposed of in the charge that 'safe place' is a term which is not easy to define. To charge that in this case she was 'in a safe place' would be to charge that the circumstances which brought about this fright and terror under which she seems to have acted were not sufficient to warrant her in removing from that spot, and seeking another, which, in her judgment,—and perhaps a mistaken judgment,—she might have deemed safer. There is hardly enough evidence in this case to know whether it was exactly safe where she stood. It turned out afterwards to have been a safe place. But who could tell beforehand how many splinters from this car would fly in all directions, how many cobblestones or other things would fly around? You do not know, when you see a car coming, just what the end will be, and would naturally seek, possibly, a safer place than you think you occupy, although, after it is all over, you may find that where you stood was a safe place." This is not a case involving the question whether an action can be sustained for mental anguish or injury unaccompanied by injury to the person. That this would not afford a ground of action is well settled. In Canning v. Williamstown, 1 Cush. 451, it was held that there could be no recovery for risk and peril which caused fright and mental suffering, but those elements could be considered when there was bodily injury, however slight. And in Vic- torian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 222, where, by a negligent act of the defendant, a collision with a railway train at a local crossing became imminent, but actual collision was avoided, nervous shock or mental injury, caused by fright at the occurrence, was held to be too remote a consequence of the defendant's act to be a ground of damage. Mr. Justice Gummere, in Ward v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. (N. J. L.) 47 Atl. 561, clearly states the rule when he says: "It seems to be universally conceded that mere fright, from which no subsequent physical suffering results, affords no ground for action;" and he subsequently holds that, "where personal injury, as well as fright, is produced by the wrongful act, the rule is entirely settled that the jury is entitled, in fixing the damages, to consider the mental agitation as well as the physical injury." This harmonizes with the decisions in Consolidated Traction Co. v. Lamberton, 59 N. J. L. 297, 36 Atl. 100, and Buchanan v. West Jersey R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 265, 19 Atl. 254. It is not perceived that the question of recovery for peril causing mere fright unaccompanied by physical suffering is in the remotest sense presented in this case. The injury sustained by the plaintiff and for which recovery is sought, was not the result of fright, but was due to the falling down of the plaintiff and the injury to her knee. She was placed in peril by the negligent act of the defendant, and in her effort to escape from danger she fell, and was injured. Does it require any stretch of imagination to believe that everyone in the neighborhood of this derailed car was frightened? And it would be extraordinary, indeed, if they attempted to escape, and were injured, that they should be without remedy. I think the point decided in Buchanan v. West Jersey R. Co. governs this case. There a woman was lawfully on the railroad platform of the defendant. A piece of timber projected from one of the cars of a train so as to reach the platform, and, in order to avoid being struck, she was obliged to throw herself upon the platform. By reason of the shock to her nervous system, her health was seriously impaired. A verdict in her favor was sustained by the supreme court, Beasley, Ch. J., saying: "The suit was not on the single ground that the plaintiff had been frightened. There was a basis for the action in the carelessness of the company which compelled the plaintiff to throw herself upon the platform, as such carelessness leading to that result was per se actionable. The fright was an incident to such cause of action, and a mere aggravation of the tort." See also Vandenburgh v. Truax, 4 Denio, 464, 47 Am. Dec. 268. In the case under consideration the negligence of the defendant in permitting the derailling and escape of the car is too plain for argument, and it was such negligence as caused the plaintiff in error to attempt to escape the peril by running, and in so doing she fell, and was injured. The true rule governing cases of this character may be stated as follows: That if a defendant, by negligence, puts the plaintiff under a reasonable apprebension of personal physical injury, and plaintiff in a reasonable effort to escape sustains physical injury, a right of action arises to recover for the physical injury and the mental disorder naturally incident to its occurrence.

The case below was properly submitted to the jury, and the judgment below should be affirmed.

Lillian B. TAYLOR, Impleaded, etc.

(.....N. J.....)

- *1. The written promise of a married woman domiciled in New Jersey, to pay a sum of money to the order of her husband, signed by her at her domicile, and carried by him, with her acquiescence, to New York, and there indorsed, and delivered in exchange for other notes of like import, is a contract made in the state of New York; and the capacity of the wife to bind herself by a contract of suretyship is to be determined by the law of that state.
2. Such a contract, if valid in the state of New York, may be enforced against the married woman in this state, although such contract, if made here, would be void.
3. The statute of New Jersey that regulates the right of married women to make contracts of suretyship is not a declaration of a public policy that closes the courts of this state to rights of action arising in other jurisdictions where the law is different.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Bergen County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Garrison, J.:

This action was brought in the circuit court upon a note, of which the following is a copy:

$422.29. Englewood, N. J., Oct. 10, 1898.

Three months after date I promise to pay to the order of W. Bernard Taylor four hundred twenty-two 29/100 dollars, at 44 Broad St., New York City; value received.

Lillian B. Taylor.

Indorsed: "W. Bernard Taylor, 44 Broad St."

The note was signed by Lillian B. Taylor

NORM.—As to what law governs in determining married woman's capacity to make contract, see Ruhe v. Buck (Mo.) 25 L. R. A. 178, and note; Polson v. Stewart (Mass.) 86 L. R. A. 771; Freeman's Appeal (Conn.) 87 L. R. A. 452; and Walling v. Christian & C. Grocery Co. (Fla.) 47 L. R. A. 608.

at the time and place of its date, she being then the wife of the payee. She signed it at her husband's request, and solely for his accommodation, and delivered it to him without any express limitation on the use he might make of it. The husband at once took the note to New York city, and there transferred it, with his indorsement, to the plaintiff, to take up two similar notes held by him, and then past due, aggregating, with interest, the amount of this note; which two notes the defendant had signed under the same circumstances, and which her husband had transferred to the plaintiff in the same manner for cash. The plaintiff knew that the payee and maker were husband and wife, but had no further notice, outside of the notes themselves, of the circumstances under which they had been signed.

The husband and wife have been during all the time above referred to, and still are, domiciled in New Jersey.

Since 1892 the statutes of New York have provided that "a married woman may contract with her husband or any other person, to the same extent, with like effect, and in the same form as if unmarried, and she and her separate estate shall be liable thereon, whether such contract relates to her separate business or estate or otherwise, and in no case shall a charge upon her separate estate be necessary." Laws 1892, chap. 594, § 1.

Deeming the case one of doubt and difficulty, the Bergen county circuit court certified the foregoing facts to the supreme court for its advisory opinion on the question whether, on those facts, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against Lillian B. Taylor for the sum mentioned in the note and interest.

The supreme court, after hearing argument, advised the circuit court that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment against Lillian B. Taylor upon the note in suit. 46 Atl. 567. Judgment in accordance with this advisory opinion was thereupon entered by the circuit court against the plaintiff, who, by writ of error, removed that judgment into this court.

The fact of the promissory note being signed in New Jersey, where the defendant claimed her domicile, does not affect the legality of the contract based upon it, as it only came into existence upon its delivery in the state of New York. It was a contract, in form, between husband and wife, but could not be enforced until the right of some third party intervened.

The contract entered into was a contract of the state of New York, and not of New Jersey, and the fact of the note being signed in New Jersey, where the defendant claims her domicile, does not affect the enforcement of the contract in the courts of this state.

Mr. George Whitefield Betts, Jr., for defendant in error:

The defendant, Lillian B. Taylor, and her husband, being domiciled in the state of New Jersey, her capacity to contract with her husband, or to act as surety or accommodation maker or indorser of a note, is governed by the laws of the state of New Jersey, in an action brought in this state.

The status of a married woman and her capacity to carry on business in a foreign state are determined by the law of her domicile.

The enforcement of the note against the defendant, being matter of remedy, should be governed by New Jersey law as the law of the forum.

Garrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The note in suit was not a New Jersey contract. The parties to it in this state were husband and wife. By force of § 14 of our married women's act, there is in this state no law to enable husband or wife to contract with each other, excepting as at common law. 2 Gen. Stat. p. 2015; Woodruff v. Clark, 42 N. J. L. 198; Turner v. Davenport (N. J. Eq.) 47 Atl. 766.

Hence the written promise of the wife to pay a sum of money to the order of her husband, signed by her and delivered to him in the state of New Jersey, did not constitute a contract. When, therefore, the note left this state no legal contract was in existence. Rahway Nat. Bank v. Brewster, 49 N. J. L. 231, 12 Atl. 769. In New York the above-mentioned feature of the common-law rule has been expressly superseded by an enabling act that empowers a married woman to contract with her husband to the same extent and in the same form as if unmarried.

The husband, therefore, having in his possession, in the state of New York, his wife's note, intrusted to him under the circumstances certified in this case, had the means of making for her a contract of suretyship that would be valid by the law of the place where it came into legal existence and where it was to be performed. By his indorsement and delivery of the signed note, the wife was as effectually bound to the payee as if she had personally executed the note in the state of New York.

Where a note is signed in this state, but is passed away, and comes first into legal existence in the state of New York, in contemplation of law it was made in the latter jurisdiction. Campbell v. Nichols, 33 N. J. L. 82. The note, therefore, is a contract made in the state of New York, upon the facts certified, without reference to the legal rule that a note made payable at a particular place is to be treated in all respects as if made at that place, for which abundant authority is cited in the brief of the plaintiff's counsel.

To the next proposition of the plaintiff, vis., that such a contract, made in New York, and valued by its laws, will be enforced by the courts of New Jersey, two objections are raised: First. That the incapacities of a wife under the common law, if not removed by the statute law of her domicile, follow her wherever she goes; so that, if at home she be unable to bind herself as surety, she may nowhere bind herself by such a contract. Secondly. That the retention in our law of so much of the common law as prevented married women from becoming sureties is a declaration by the legislature of a public policy to which the courts should give effect by refusing to enforce obligations of this nature incurred by its citizens in other states where this disability no longer exists.

Both of these points are taken in the brief of counsel for the defendant, and each of them receives some support from the opinion delivered in the supreme court, although the actual decision of the case is rested upon the second ground, vis., that of public policy.

It will be necessary, therefore, to consider each of these propositions. The first claim is that the capacity of a married woman to make a contract of suretyship is governed by the law of her domicile, and not by the law of the place where the contract is made and where it is to be performed; in other words, that capacity to contract is governed by the law of domicile, and not by the lex loci contractus. The discussion of this question by the civilians and in early judicial writings occupied much space, and received the closest attention from Mr. Justice Story as one in which the doctrines of the civil law could not be made to harmonize with the commercial rule upon the subject. It is rarely worth while to search back of Story upon such a question, especially if he have decided against the civil-law rule. In his Commentaries upon the Conflict of Laws, after a comprehensive review of the authorities, Judge Story reached the conclusion that, in regard to the incapacities incident to coverture and other personal disabilities to contract, "the law of the domicile of birth or the law of any other acquired and fixed domicile is not generally to govern, but the lex loci contractus aut actus,—the law of the place where the contract is made or the act done." Story, Conf. L. § 103.

In the course of his consideration of this and kindred questions, Mr. Justice Story quotes so frequently from the civilians that upon a hasty reading the opinions of those jurists may be taken for his own; but there can be no question as to the commentator's final summary, vis., that, "although foreign jurists generally hold that the law of the domicile ought to govern in regard to the capacity of persons to contract, yet that the common law holds a different doctrine, namely, that the lex loci contractus is to govern." Story, Conf. L. § 241.

With respect to another American commentator,—Chancellor Kent,—it is both interesting and important to observe that while, in some parts of the text of his Commentaries, he seems to favor the arguments of the foreign jurists, yet in his later notes he unequivocally states the rule to be: "The state and condition of the person according to the law of his domicile will generally, though not universally, be regarded in other countries as to acts done, or rights acquired, or contracts made in the place of his native domicile; but as to acts, rights, and contracts done, acquired, or made out of his native domicile, the lex loci will generally govern in respect to his capacity and condition." 2 Kent, Com. 233, note c.

To the same effect is the opinion of Chief Justice Gray of Massachusetts delivered in the case of Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241, where, after considering the whole question, he decides that "the validity of a contract [even as regards the capacity of the parties], is to be determined by the law of the state in which it is made."

I have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the capacity of Mrs. Taylor to enter into a New York contract in New York was governed by the laws of New York, notwithstanding her domicil was in New Jersey; and that the contract into which she there entered was valid, and binding upon her.

If we pass to the reason assigned in the advisory opinion, we shall see that it rests upon the doctrine of our courts that a contract valid elsewhere will not be enforced if it is inconsistent with the public policy of the jurisdiction the aid of whose tribunals is invoked for the purpose of giving it effect.

The decisive portion of the opinion of Mr. Justice Gummere is in these words: "When the legislature has declared the policy of the state in relation to a given subject-matter, it is the duty of the court to give effect, so far as possible, to that policy;" citing Felt v. Felt, 59 N. J. Eq. 606, 47 L. R. A. 546, 45 Atl. 106, 49 Atl. 1071, and Union Locomotive & Eng. Co. v. Erie R. Co. 37 N. J. L. 23. There can be no doubt as to the duty of our courts under the condition thus predicated. The question in the case is whether the legislation referred to in the opinion is a declaration of public policy. Briefly summarized, that legislation confers upon married women rights to contract as if unmarried, save as to contracts of suretyship, from which no benefit is obtained for their separate use. 2 Gen. Stat. p. 2017, § 26.

In my judgment, this and kindred acts of legislation, constituting together our married women's act, and passed under the titles of "An Act for the Better Securing of the Property of Married Women," and "An Act to Amend the Law Relating to the Property of Married Women," are to be regarded as regulations rendered necessary by the abrogation of the principles of the common law concerning coverture; and that what is indicated by this legislation as a whole is the abandonment of a public policy upon the subject, and the future regulation of it by acts of legislative discretion.

The distinction between regulative legislation and the adoption of a principle of public law is too important to be lost sight of. To declare, as the common law did, that the welfare of society required that wives be incapable of making contracts, is an illustration of the adoption of a principle which, so long as it was adhered to, constituted a rule of public policy. When, however, civilized states became satisfied that the welfare of society was not best served by the maintenance of this principle it was abandoned by the recognition of its opposite, viz., that married women possessed capacity to contract. The questions that then arose, viz., what contracts may they make, and what may they not? while calling for the exercise of legislative discretion based upon considerations that affected a large class of individuals, did 54 L. R. A.

not, either in theory or in fact, involve any principle upon which the general welfare of the body of citizens of the state was assumed to rest. With the abandonment of the political principle the matter was broken up into discretionary exercises of legislative regulation in the course of which different bodies, or the same legislative body at different periods, might lay down varying rules without destroying that comity that is so essential to commercial confidence and intercourse. Thus, in the case certified it appears that the state of New York, having abandoned the principles of the common law, as we ourselves have done, has gone further in its enabling legislation; or, what is the same thing, has retained less of what the common-law rule compelled; but equally and in either case the only principle involved has been abandoned. The respective regulations of the subject equally rest upon the common ground that women have a capacity to make contracts, subject to legislative control. If this be so, comity requires that we mutually give effect to these discretionary acts by recognizing the validity of the resulting contracts, and enforcing them in our courts, even when they are in opposition to our own declared discretion upon the subject. This, as I read in the case of Wright v. Remington, 41 N. J. L. 51, 32 Am. Rep. 180, has been categorically decided in our supreme court. In that case a wife signed two notes as surety for her husband in Illinois, where the common law had been abrogated to that extent. Suit was brought in our circuit court to enforce these contracts against the wife. Upon a case certified the supreme court held that comity required the enforcement of the notes in question.

In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Reed said: "There can . . . be no question but that the contract was valid by the law of Illinois. It is therefore the duty of the courts of this state to recognize and enforce it, unless it appears injurious to the interests of the state or of our citizens. But nothing approaching this result can be deduced solely from the fact that the foreign statute confers upon a married woman the power to make a contract of suretyship. . . . Whatever may be our opinion of the policy of legislation beyond our state, we are bound by the principles of comity to recognize its validity, unless it clearly contravenes the principles of public morality, or attacks the interests of the body of the citizens of our state."

Objection upon this point was apparently not renewed upon the writ of error in this court, for the judgment was here affirmed without again referring to it. Remington v. Wright, 43 N. J. L. 451.

This case, upon the point now in controversy, states the correct rule of law so definitely that it should have been followed in the supreme court.

If, as was suggested upon the argument, the device of providing a place of performance in a foreign jurisdiction, or even of making the actual contract in a place where the wife was empowered to contract directly with her husband, should be urged as a ground for sustaining such a contract here, or for enabling the husband to sue thereon in our courts of law, a different question would be presented. It may well be that such a proceeding would run athwart the settled policy of our law with respect to the supervision exercised by equity over the engagements of married persons, which is retained in our system of jurisprudence by the 14th section of the married women's act. With respect to this question, no opinion is expressed.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the Circuit Court, entered in accordance with the advisory opinion of the Supreme Court, is reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York ex rel.
John P. LEARY, Appt.,
v.

Charles H. KNOX et al., Resp'ts.

(166 N. Y. 444.)

1. Promotion of a police officer for acts of personal heroism is not prohibited by a constitutional provision that promotions shall be made, when practicable, upon competitive examination.
2. A statute authorizing municipal authorities to promote police officers for personal heroism is not repealed by a general statute regulating appointments and promotions in the civil service, which provides that the statute shall not take from any policeman any right or benefit conferred by law or existing under any lawful regulation of the department in which he serves.

(Parker, Ch. J., and Landon and Vann, JJ., dissent.)

(April 16, 1901.)

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of a Special Term for New York County granting a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel respondents to certify upon the pay roll of relator that he had been promoted from patrolman to roundsman in the department of police of the city of New York. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. James, Schell, & Elkus, for appellant:

At the time the relator was appointed patrolman on the New York police force details or permanent assignments of patrolmen to duty as roundsmen could be made for heroic and meritorious services, without a competitive examination.

Laws 1882, chap. 410; Laws 1883, chap. 354; Laws 1884, chap. 410; Laws 1894, chap. 354; Laws 1895, chap. 569.

NOTE.—The above case seems to be one of first impression as to the effect of the constitutional provision in question upon the right to promote a police officer for personal heroism, without any competitive examination.

For constitutionality of civil service laws, see People ex rel. Akin v. Kiple (III.) 41 L. R. A. 775, and cases in footnote thereto.

The New York city consolidation act (Laws 1882, chap. 410, § 271) provided: "Promotions of officers and members of the police force shall be made by the board only on grounds of meritorious police service and superior capacity, and shall be as follows: Sergeants of police shall be selected from among patrolmen assigned to duty as roundsmen. . . ."

This section unquestionably gave the police board the power to promote for heroic and meritorious service.

People ex rel. Schell v. Knox, 48 App. Div. 477, 62 N. Y. Supp. 940.

At the time of, and prior to, the relator's appointment to the force the civil service laws did not require a competitive examination before the promotion or assignment of patrolmen to duty as roundsmen.

Laws 1883, chap. 354, § 8; Laws 1884, chap. 410, § 2; Laws 1895, chap. 569, § 3.

Subsequent legislation fully protected the relator's rights to be promoted from the position of patrolman to that of roundsman for heroic and meritorious service, without a competitive examination.

Laws 1897, chap. 378, § 274.

Civil service rules cannot affect relator's right to promotion, because the laws pursuant to which said rules were prepared expressly provided: "The authority by this section conferred (i. e., to make rules, etc.) shall not be so exercised as to take from any policeman . . . any right or benefit conferred by law or existing under any lawful regulation of the department in which he serves."

People ex rel. Schell v. Knox, 48 App. Div. 477, 62 N. Y. Supp. 940.

Messrs. James M. Ward, Theodore Connolly, and Terence Farley, with Mr. John Whalen, for respondents:

A consideration of the legislation affecting the police department in this city before consolidation, and the various civil service statutes of this state, will demonstrate that no promotion can be made for heroic conduct, without an examination.

The civil service statutes constitute a general system of statute law applicable to appointments and promotions in every department of the civil service of the state, with such exceptions only as are specified in the statute itself.

A man's "superior capacity" cannot be determined without a mental examination, and thus the necessity of a civil service examination before a promotion can be made.

People ex rel. Sweet v. Lyman, 157 N. Y. 368, 52 N. E. 132.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator, on the 21st day of January, 1897, was appointed a patrolman on the police force of the city of New York, and after the new charter went into effect, on the 1st day of January, 1898, he continued to serve in that position as a member of the police force of the present city. On the 1st day of June, 1900, the police board, by a resolution duly passed and approved by the mayor, promoted him from the position of patrolman to that of roundsman because of meritorious and heroic conduct in the performance of his duties as such patrolman. The heroic or meritorious act for which this promotion was made was exhibited on the occasion of the fire which destroyed the Windsor Hotel on the 17th of March, 1899. It appears from the moving papers that on that occasion he went to the second floor of the burning building, and rescued four women who were imprisoned in the fire escape. Going up to the fifth story, he met a man with his clothes on fire, and extinguished it, and then passed the man down the ladder to the street. Next he found a woman on the fifth floor of the hotel, helpless and badly burned, and, with the assistance of a brother officer, he placed her upon his back, and at the risk of his life carried her to the second floor, and then down a burning staircase, in safety to the street.

It may be assumed that the determination of the police board, promoting the relator by reason of this meritorious and heroic conduct in the performance of his duty, is a promotion from a lower to a higher grade in the police force, at least in the sense that the relator became entitled, if the promotion was legally made, to a larger salary. It appears from the moving papers that the treasurer of the police department refuses to pay the relator the salary of roundsman without a certification by the respondents as commissioners constituting the municipal civil service commission of the city of New York, on the ground that such a certificate is required by § 19 of chapter 370 of the Laws of 1899. The court at special term, upon the relator's application, granted a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the respondents to forthwith certify upon the pay roll of the relator that he was promoted to the position of roundsman according to law and the rules made in pursuance of law, and was entitled to pay as a roundsman from the 1st day of June, when promoted, at the rate of $1,500 per annum. The appellate division, by a divided court, 64 L. R. A.

reversed the order, and from that decision this appeal has been taken.

The question in the case involves the construction of various statutes existing prior to the enactment of the new charter, some of the provisions of the charter itself, and at least one general statute subsequently enacted. It is quite possible that a very strict construction of these numerous statutes would justify the decision of the court below. But we think that the system of statute law upon which the relator's rights depend should not be subject to any narrow or illiberal construction. The various statutes should receive a fair construction, and the intention of the legislature, when ascertained, should, of course, control. It is clear beyond dispute that at the time the relator entered the service as a policeman, and for many years before, the police board possessed and exercised the power of promoting individual policemen for special and exceptional acts of heroism in preserving human life. The board attempted to exercise that power in this case upon a state of facts as to which there is no dispute, and leaves no doubt as to the character and merit of the service which the relator performed. The policy of the statute in conferring power upon the police board to promote a member of the force for special and particular acts of heroism was to furnish inducements for the performance of duty, even when confronted with great personal danger. The possibility of obtaining such rewards and honors was held out to every individual entering the service as a means of promoting its efficiency. It is analogous in some sense to the inducements which the government furnishes to the soldier who, in the discharge of his duty, is distinguished for bravery or some particular heroic act. When a policeman or a soldier has by his conduct earned the promotion or the reward, he ought not to be deprived of the benefits by any narrow or literal construction of the law governing the case. There is at least one important point involved in the controversy that is clear beyond any dispute, and that is that formerly the police board, with the approval of the mayor, was clothed with the power to do all that it has done in this case; that is, to determine that the relator merited promotion by reason of his conduct on the occasion referred to, and to award the promotion.

The only other question involved is whether this power has been abolished or modified in such a way that the police board is disabled from acting except in conjunction with the municipal civil service commission, or has the power which it formerly exercised been taken away or divided between the board, the mayor, and the civil service commission? If it has, then it was necessary that the relator, in order to obtain the promotion and the increase in his salary, should have satisfied, not only the police board and the mayor, but also the civil service commission, that he was entitled to the promotion. But a special and local statute conferring power upon the police board to promote a policeman for particular and exceptional acts of gallantry is not to be deemed repealed or modified by a subsequent general law relating to the civil service generally. The various statutes with respect to promotions in the civil service are no broader than the Constitution itself. That enacts that appointments and promotions in the civil service shall be made, when practicable, upon competitive examination. The fact is clearly recognized that in some cases where promotion is merited a competitive examination would be impracticable; and it is very evident that this is such a case, since it is obvious that no examination could be devised which would present the conditions to furnish a test of the comparative heroism of a policeman engaged in the attempt to rescue persons from a burning building. In this case the right to promotion depended upon some meritorious or heroic act. That act alone is the only test which is practicable to apply to the relator's right to promotion. It may be that in such cases the applicant would not be able to meet any educational test whatever, but that circumstance ought not to interfere with the right of promotion which the law held out to him at the time that he entered the service as a reward for acts of exceptional courage or bravery in the performance of duty. We do not think that either the Constitution or the various statutes regulating appointments and promotions in the civil service has any application to this case. The general legislation on that subject was not intended to affect or modify a statute which authorized the police board to promote the relator as a reward for his conduct on the occasion of the burning of the hotel. It is well settled that a special and local statute, providing for a particular case or class of cases, is not repealed or modified by a subsequent statute, general in its terms, provisions, and application, unless the intent to repeal or alter is manifest, although the terms of the general act would, but for the special law, include the cases provided by the latter. Re Central Park Comrs. 50 N. Y. 493; McKenna v. Edmundstone, 91 N. Y. 231; Davis v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 165 N. Y. 159, 58 N. E. 891. This principle would control this case even if the subsequent statutes regulating appointments and promotions in the civil service were general and sweeping in the language employed, and contained no exceptions or reservations applicable here. But in all the statutes regulating the civil service is to be found an important exception, which, it seems to me, takes this case out of their operation, and leaves the law with respect to the power of the police board to promote the relator substantially where it was originally. The last of these enactments is to be found in § 10 of chapter 370 of the Laws of 1899. That section, after providing for the classified service in cities, contains the following provision: "The authority by this section conferred shall not be so exercised as to take from any policeman or fireman any right or benefit conferred by law, or existing under any lawful regulation of the department in which he serves." The city charter contains a provision substantially identical. These provisions of the general law regulating the civil service disclose an intention on the part of the legislature to except from the general rules therein enacted just such a case as this. All rights or benefits conferred by law referred to were not necessarily such rights as had vested in the individual, but the language is broad enough to embrace rights or benefits not then in possession or enjoyment, but in expectancy, under any law which entitled him to special honors or rewards for some particular meritorious act while in the service. The power of the police board to make promotions for such exceptional conduct is not at all inconsistent with the general scope and purpose of the civil service regulations. Both enactments can stand, and each can be made to perform the office which the legislature intended in enacting it. The subsequent legislation does not affect the original law conferring the power of promotion upon the police board and the mayor in such cases, since the latter statutes do not, in terms or by any reasonable implication, interfere with that power. On the contrary, these statutes disclose an intention on the part of the legislature to make such a case as this an exception to the general rule, and hence it is not within the general scope or purpose of the civil service regulations. These views are confirmed by an examination of a recent case in the supreme court. People ex rel. Schelpp v. Knox, 48 App. Div. 477, 62 N. Y. Supp. 940. In that case the various statutes relating to the question were considered, and the conclusion of the court commends itself to us as a fair and reasonable exposition of the law.

It follows that the order of the Appellate Division should be reversed, with costs, and that of the special term affirmed.

Bartlett, Haight, and Martin, JJ., concur.

Landen, J., dissenting:

The question presented by this appeal is whether the relator, under his appointment and service as patrolman before the charter of Greater New York took effect, and his continuance in service under that charter, and until his alleged promotion from patrolman to roundsman, June 1, 1900, was then eligible to such promotion by the board of police because of meritorious police service, without passing the civil service examination required by §§ 288 and 304 of the charter of Greater New York (chap. 378, Laws 1897), and by chapter 370, Laws 1899, known as the "White Civil Service Act." Section 288 of the present charter provides that promotions in the police force shall be made by the police board, as provided in § 304, on grounds of seniority, meritorious police service, and superior capacity. Section 304 provides that "promotions from the lower grades to the higher grades shall be on the basis of seniority, of merit and of excellence, as shown by competitive examination. The police board shall transmit to the civil service commission the record of each candidate for promotion." Section 15 of the civil service act of 1899 provides: "Promotions shall be based upon merit and competition and upon the superior qualifications of the person promoted as shown by his previous service, due weight being given to seniority. For the purposes of this section an increase in the salary or other compensation of any person holding an office or position within the scope of the rules in force hereunder beyond the limit fixed for the grade in which such office or position is classified, shall be deemed a promotion. No promotion, transfer, or reinstatement shall be made from a position in one class to a position in another class unless the same be specially authorized by the state or municipal commission."

The relator claims exemption from examination for this promotion under § 10 of the act of 1899. This section provides for the creation of the municipal civil service commission, the making and enforcement by the commissioners of rules for the classification of offices, and for appointments and promotions therein and examinations therefor, and provides: "The authority by this section conferred shall not be so exercised as to take from any policeman or fireman any right or benefit conferred by law, or existing under any lawful regulation of the department in which he serves." Substantially the same provision is contained in civil service act 1883, § 8, as amended by chapter 410, Laws 1884, and in subsequent acts, and in § 125 of the charter of Greater New York. But no right or benefit is conferred or exists until vested by appointment, and unless made by the appointing power, while yet in possession of the power, it can only be made by the new body to which it is transferred, and then only within the new limitations of that power. If this were not so, then as to the relator the former statutes as to the power of the police board to promote him would be irrepealable. Suppose the relator were eligible to election by popular vote to the office of roundsman, and then the law should be changed making the office appointive upon competitive examination, it could not be supposed that he had been deprived of any existing right or benefit conferred by law. The relator had a capacity to take a right or benefit from the police board, but the board, before attempting to confer it, lost the power to do so. If he had secured promotion before a change in the law, its rights or benefits would not be impaired by the change. The provision protected his title to whatever he had acquired, and whatever he could as of his own right by virtue of that title, without a further appointment, promotion, or test, acquire. It did not embrace a future promotion which rested in the power and discretion of others, especially when their power was subject to be devested by law. This distinction seems to have been overlooked in People ex rel. Schellpp v. Know, 48 App. Div. 477, 62 N. Y. Supp. 940. It can be shown, I think, that, before the White act, the assignment, detail, or transfer of a patrolman to duty as a roundsman was not in legal sense a promotion, but a mere detail to particular police service. People ex rel. Buckley v. Roosevelt, 5 App. Div. 168, 39 N. Y. Supp. 78; Consol. Act, § 271; Charter Greater New York, § 292. The appellant rests his case upon promotion, not detail.

But passing this question, and assuming that before the passage of the White act the detail or assignment of a patrolman to permanent duty as a roundsman was in legal sense a promotion, I think that the civil service laws and rules in force at the time of the relator's appointment as patrolman precluded his promotion without the test of a competitive examination. This is satisfactorily shown in the majority opinions of the learned appellate division in People ex rel. Grady v. Know, 54 App. Div. 334, 66 N. Y. Supp. 984. This case was argued in the appellate division with that case, and decided upon the opinions therein given. 54 App. Div. 634, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1142. It should be noticed that in the Schellpp Case the former Brooklyn charter permitted promotion "on account of any gallant or meritorious deed in the discharge of his duty." The consolidation act and the charter of the Greater City of New York provided for promotions on grounds of "meritorious police service and superior capacity." A "gallant or meritorious deed" is a personal specific act; it speaks for itself, and in its nature excludes competitive examination. "Meritorious police service" admits of competitive examination, is not specific, and opens the door to favoritism. Thus the Schellpp Case is unlike this case. While we applaud the services of the relator, we should, nevertheless, advise him to seek his promotion through legal methods, instead of making a breach in them through which the unworthy can pass.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for New York County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, when a lad of twelve years, through the negligence of the defendant in running over him with one of its horse cars, and inflicting injuries which resulted in the loss of his right leg. Upon the trial the theory of the plaintiff was that he started to cross East Houston street, in the city of New York, when a horse car of the defendant was approaching from the west, about 75 feet away. He had about 16 feet to go in order to get entirely across the track. Going southerly in a diagonal direction, in order to reach a point further east on the opposite side of the street, where he was called by an errand, his back was partly towards the approaching car. He thought he had time to cross in safety, but after crossing the north rail he was knocked down by one of the horses on the south side of the track and run over by the car. The horses were galloping at full speed under the whip of the driver, and after running over the plaintiff the car went nearly three blocks before it stopped. The theory of the defendant was that the plaintiff was not in front of the horses at any time, and was not crossing the street, but was trying to catch on to the car near the middle, and that after several efforts he fell under the car, the rear wheels of which passed over him. The conflict in the evidence was irreconcilable for several witnesses were called to sustain the theory of either party. Among them, on the part of the plaintiff, one Klein was sworn, who testified that he was standing on the front platform with the driver, who was whipping his horses, which were running at full speed. He first saw the plaintiff when he was from 12 to 15 feet in front of the horses, between the two rails, and about to cross the south rail. He told the driver to look out for the boy, but the reply was, in substance, "Mind your own business." On the cross-examination he was asked if before the former trial of the action he tried to induce a woman to swear that she saw him on the front platform and that she refused, but he denied it. On the redirect examination he testified that he knew one Kaufmann, who had been to his house five or six times during the week then past; the first time being on Saturday, a week before. He was asked to state what Kaufmann said to him on that day, but it was excluded. The witness was then withdrawn, and Kaufmann, being put upon the stand by the plaintiff, testified that he was employed by the defendant as an investigator; that his duties were "to see to the witnesses and take statements and to interview witnesses,"—those who "expect and those who are" witnesses; and that he had been acting in this case for the defendant. The plaintiff thereupon resumed the examination of Mr. Klein, and asked him to state the conversation that he had with Kaufmann on the Saturday in question; but the defendant's objection as incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted. After the witness had testified that he had a conversation with Kaufmann on the occasion mentioned in reference to the testimony that he was to give upon the trial, he was asked these questions: "What conversation did he have with you in reference to the testimony you were to give upon the trial of this action? Did Harry Kaufmann make any offer to you of money or any other thing in reference to the testimony you were to give upon the trial of this action?" Each of these questions was objected to upon the ground above stated, the objections were sustained, and the plaintiff excepted separately to each ruling.

The jury found for the defendant and after affirmance by the appellate division, one of the learned justices dissenting, the plaintiff came here.

Messrs. Nathan, Leventritt, & Perham, for appellant:

The court erred in excluding evidence of attempts on the part of defendant to suborn plaintiff's witness. The evidence sought to be introduced was in the nature of an admission by the defendant that it had no defence. It was an admission by conduct, and receivable for that reason.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Evidence tending to show that a party to an action tried to bribe a witness to give false testimony in his favor, although collateral to the issues, is competent as an admission by acts and conduct that his case is weak and his evidence dishonest. It is somewhat like an attempt by a prisoner to escape before trial or prove a false alibi, or by a merchant to make way with his books of account, except that it goes further than some of these instances; for, in addition to reflecting on the case, it reflects upon the evidence on that side of the controversy. "Where it appears that on one side there has been forgery or fraud in some material parts of the evidence, and they are discovered to be the contrivance of a party to the proceeding, it affords a presumption against the whole of the evidence on that side of the question, and has the effect of gaining a more ready admission to the evidence of the other party." 1 Phillpotts, Ev. (Cowen & H. Notes) 627. It is not conclusive, even when believed by the jury, because a party may think he has a bad case when in fact he has a good one, but it tends to discredit his witnesses and to cast doubt upon his position. It is for the consideration of the jury, after ample opportunity for explanation and denial, under proper instructions to prevent them from giving undue attention to the collateral matter to the detriment of the main issue. The leading authority in support of such evidence is an English case, decided after careful argument by counsel and upon full discussion by the judges. Moriarty v. London, O. & D. R. Co. L. R. 5 Q. B. 314. It is also sustained by the cases in this state relating to the subject, some with and some without discussion. Cruikshank v. Gordon, 118 N. Y. 178, 187, 23 N. E. 457; Gray v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 165 N. Y. 457, 459, 59 N. E. 262; Mather v. Parsons, 32 Hun, 338; Gulerette v. McKinley, 27 Hun, 320; Adams v. People, 9 Hun, 89. It is received even in criminal actions. People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509; Gardiner v. People, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 155, 205; Donohue v. People, 56 N. Y. 208. The same rule prevails in other states, without exception, so far as we have been able to discover. Egan v. Bowker, 5 Allen, 449; State v. Nocton, 121 Mo. 537, 551, 26 S. W. 551; Heslop v. Heslop, 82 Pa. 537, 539; Snell v. Bray, 56 Wis. 156, 162, 14 N. W. 14; Lyons v. Lawrence, 12 Ill. App. 531; People v. Marion, 29 Mich. 31; Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 316, 52 Am. Dec. 711. The elementary writers sanction it,—some notwithstanding they concede it to be collateral, and others upon the ground that, as it relates to good faith or the intent of a party, it is a material fact, and has a direct bearing on the issue. 1 Taylor, Ev. 9th ed. 242; 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 196; Wharton, Ev. § 1265; 1 Starkie, Ev. 437; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 503.

It is claimed, however, that such evidence is not admissible against a corporation without proof of some corporate act expressly authorizing an agent to tamper with witnesses. This is equivalent to claiming that such evidence cannot be received against corporations at all, because, in the nature of things, proof of express authority would be impossible. A corporation can act only through agents, and where a branch of its business, whether broad or narrow, is intrusted to an agent, without any restriction, whatever he does which directly relates to that part of the corporate business and tends to promote it is binding upon the corporation. Under such circumstances he has control of the method of action, and that which he does, whether morally right or wrong, within the general scope of the matter intrusted to him, in legal effect is done by the corporation itself. Having authority to accomplish a certain result, with no limitation as to the means to be employed, his acts, so far as they directly contribute to that result, even if unlawful, are corporate acts. They are done for the corporation by an agent clothed with general authority to effect a certain purpose, which they aid in attaining. Any admission made by him through acts done to carry on his branch of the business, and which reasonably tend to advance it, is regarded in law as made by the corporate body which authorized him to act for it with reference to the subject of his employment. Kaufmann was employed to look up and "see to" witnesses for the defendant, so as to enable it to defeat the plaintiff's claim, among others. He was to find witnesses, if possible, who would swear to such a state of facts as would prevent a recovery against the defendant. The method of doing this was left to his judgment and discretion. If he adopted a method not contemplated by the defendant, still it is responsible for what he did, in the line of his employment, to promote its interest. In order to promote its interest, he saw fit, as we must now assume, to use the power intrusted to him by trying to bribe the most important witness for the plaintiff to testify falsely in favor of the defendant. He was employed "to see to the witnesses," and this was his manner of seeing to them. He was to procure evidence, the method not being specified, and he tried to get it by an unlawful method. The subject was left to his judgment, and he acted according to his judgment. The scope of the business intrusted to him included whatever he thought best to do in order to get the right kind of witnesses. He was not working for himself, but for the defendant; and, as he represented it with reference to the subject of witnesses, his conduct not only tended to show that its case was weak, for witnesses are not bribed unless it is thought necessary, but to cast a doubt upon the testimony of the other witnesses who were looked up by him and sworn by the defendant. It indicated, as the result of his investigation for the defendant, that honest witnesses could not be procured who would swear to a defense. If he could not make a mere admission as such, he could do an act which had the effect of an admission. His declaration tions dum feroet opus were acts. Those acts, if shown, would have reflected upon the integrity of the defendant's case as presented in court through the medium of witnesses, and would have tended to prevent the verdict which was rendered in its favor. They would have afforded "a presumption against the whole of the evidence" for the defendant, which has served it so well. It has had the benefit of what he did with reference to the other witnesses, unaffected by the cloud which the evidence offered would have cast upon them. He was acting in the course of his employment, for he was employed to procure witnesses. The power of the corporation was intrusted to him with reference to that subject, to be used as he saw fit. His acts related solely to that subject, and were done by him, as its agent, wholly for its benefit. If this evidence would have been admissible against an individual defendant who had employed Kaufmann as he was employed, it is admissible against this corporate defendant. If an honest man by mistake employs a dishonest one to look up witnesses for him, and the latter, through excess of zeal, resorts to bribery, although it was never thought of by his employer, it is better, for cleanliness and purity in the administration of justice, that the facts should be shown, with the fullest opportunity for explanation, than to exclude all evidence of the evil acts upon the ground that they were not authorized, because authority may properly be inferred from the nature of the employment. In such a case all doubt should be resolved, if possible, in the interest of clean evidence and the exposure of foul practices.

There are but few authorities which bear directly upon this branch of the subject. We have the general rule that a principal is liable to a third person in a civil action for the fraud or other malfeasance of his agent perpetrated by the latter in the course of his employment, although the act was ultra vires, and the principal did not authorize, justify, or know of it. Palmeri v. Manhattan R. Co. 133 N. Y. 261, 16 L. R. A. 136, 30 N. E. 1001; Fifth Avenue Bank v. Forty-second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co. 137 N. Y. 231, 19 L. R. A. 331, 33 N. E. 378; Jarvis v. Manhattan Beach Co. 148 N. Y. 652, 31 L. R. A. 776, 43 N. E. 68; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. T. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588, 43 Am. Rep. 185. As was said in an important case in England: "If the agents employed conduct themselves fraudulently, so that if they had been acting for private employers the persons for whom they were acting would have been affected by their fraud, the same principles must prevail where the principal under whom the agent acts is a corporation." Ranger v. Great Western R. Co. 5 H. L. Cas. 86, 87. So this court has declared that "where authority is conferred to act for another, without special limitation, it carries with it by implication authority to do all things necessary to its execution; and when it involves the exercise of the discretion of the servant, or the use of force towards or against another, the use of such discretion or force is a part of the thing authorized, and when exercised becomes, as to third persons, the discretion and act of the master, and this although the servant departed from the private instructions of the master, provided he was engaged at the time in doing his master's business and was acting within the general scope of his employment. . . . In most cases where the master has been held liable for the negligent or tortious act of the servant, the servant acted, not only without express authority to do the wrong, but in violation of his duty to the master." Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 129, 133, 21 Am. Rep. 597. So far as this rule rests upon estoppel, it does not apply to the question before us, but so far as it rests upon public policy or convenience, it has some bearing; for the interest of the public is promoted by the exposure of corrupt acts intended to turn the course of justice.

The authorities directly in point, so far as they have been called to our attention, with one exception, support the theory that the evidence in question should have been received. In the leading case evidence was admitted to show that a clerk in the employ of the defendant, a railroad corporation, offered money to a witness for the plaintiff to influence his testimony in favor of the company. It was the duty of the clerk to look up and arrange the evidence in cases where the company had been sued by persons injured, without special directions, and with general authority to use his own judgment. It expressly appeared that he had no authority "to deal with a witness in any way," and that if he had used money to suborn a witness he would have been instantly discharged. The court, referring to the authority of the clerk, said: "He was empowered generally to perform that duty, without special directions. That part of the business of the company was placed in his charge, with general authority to use his judgment in its performance. His acts, therefore, were the acts of the company, within the scope of his employment. His legal authority, of course, but extended to lawful acts. So it is true of all agencies, as they are not appointed for the purpose of committing wrongs or the performance of illegal acts, except in rare cases. Few actions would be maintainable if a recovery could be had only in cases where express authority is given, or the agent is required to commit the wrong. . . . In this case the clerk was in the exercise of a corporate power, engaged in the performance of a duty delegated to him by the company, and in the performance of that duty he attempted the use of illegal means for the accomplishment of a legal end, and for the benefit of the company. He did not attempt to suborn the witness for the benefit of himself, but for the benefit of the company, not with the consent of his superior, but in the course of legitimate and authorized business of the company. He was unquestionably employed by the company, was acting for it, and did 54 L. R. A.

the act to promote its interest. He was engaged in performance of a duty for the company. He did the act as a part of the duty, although unauthorized. We are therefore of the opinion that he performed the illegal and unauthorized act while acting in and as a part of his employment, and we must hold the company is responsible for the act. For that reason, we hold that the evidence was admissible." Chicago City R. Co. v. McMahon, 103 Ill. 485, 42 Am. Rep. 29. In Snell v. Bray, 56 Wis. 156, 14 N. W. 14, a man who expected to be sued requested a friend to write to an acquaintance, but did not authorize him to attempt to influence her testimony if she was called as a witness on the other side. The friend wrote to this person, warning her not to aid the other party or testify in the action; and it was held that the letter was properly received in evidence, as an admission by conduct, although it was written before the action was commenced. In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Rambo, 8 C. C. A. 6, 16 U. S. App. 277, 59 Fed. 75, it was said that "it was competent for the plaintiff to introduce evidence in rebuttal tending to show that the authorized agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company had been engaged in suborning witnesses to testify falsely. Such evidence was relevant on the main issue, as tending to show an admission by its conduct that it had a bad case, needing false and perjured evidence to support it." In Green v. Woodbury, 48 Vt. 5, it was held that evidence was not admissible to show that a constable employed to subpoena witnesses and assist in the defense of a town had offered inducements to one of the plaintiff's witnesses to keep away from the trial, when it did not appear that any other officer or agent of the town was cognizant of, authorized, or approved the act. The rule laid down by the supreme court of Illinois in the case cited is the better calculated to advance justice by keeping its channels pure. It tends to prevent perjury and fraud, and to strengthen the confidence of the people in the courts. Upon principle, as well as according to the weight of authority, proof of Kaufmann's attempt to bribe Klein to swear falsely for the defendant should have been received.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Parker, Ch. J., and Bartlett and Martin, JJ., concur.

Landen, J., dissenting:

When the servant in the act of executing his master's business does wrong to the injury of another the master is liable, although he had not authorized the wrong. But when such unauthorized wrong of the servant does no injury to any one the master should not be punished for his servant's sin. That is this case. There is much authority the other way. It rests in great part upon the praiseworthy desire to punish the attempt upon the purity of justice. But this will not justify imputing to the innocent the wrong of the guilty. Some evidence tending to support the inference of permission or acquiescence on the part of the master should be given. I advise affirmance.

PEOPLE of the State of New York ex rel.
Clinton H. SMITH, Appt.,
v.

Edward M. HOFFMAN et al., Respts.

(166 N. Y. 462.)

1. A military examining board provided by the Constitution and statutes to determine the moral character, capacity, or general fitness for office of officers of the militia, and having within its jurisdiction the powers of a court-martial, and upon whose findings the governor may dismiss an officer from the service, is a judicial body whose determination may be reviewed by a common-law writ of certiorari.
2. The appeal which, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2122, will preclude review by writ of certiorari, means one that can be brought, argued, and heard as matter of right, and not a secret review of a judgment, as of that of a military examining board, the existence of which cannot be known to the defeated party until after the review has been made and the judgment executed.
3. No implied exception from the provisions of a statute authorizing the use of the common-law writ of certiorari when not expressly forbidden by statute can be made in case of the decisions of state military tribunals in proceedings for the discipline of militia officers in time of peace, on the ground that if civil courts were permitted to interfere with the judgment of military courts the discipline of the militia might be injured.
4. The governor is not a proper party to a writ of certiorari to review a determination of a military examining board as to the fitness of a militia officer for his office.

APPEAL by relator from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Albany County dismissing a writ of certiorari to review the action of a military examining board in consequence of which relator was dismissed from the National Guard of the State. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alexander S. Bacon, for appellant: The words "findings," "decision," "examination," and "testimony," contained in § 64, indicate the judicial character of the board. These alone are sufficient.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For eighteen years the relator was a member of the National Guard, and for some time prior to June 6, 1900, was major of the 71st regiment thereof. On the 10th of May, 1898, as a member of that regiment, he entered the service of the United States for the Spanish war, and on the 15th of November following he was honorably discharged from such service, but still held his commission as major in the National Guard. Subsequently there appeared in several daily papers published in the city of New York an elaborate statement, signed by two captains of said regiment, which gravely reflected upon the conduct of the relator as an officer while in the service of the United States during the Cuban campaign. The statement, in effect, charged him and another officer with cowardice and inefficiency at the assault on San Juan Hill, July 1, 1898. On the 10th of December, 1898, at his request, a court of inquiry was convened to investi-sses City, M. & B. R. Co. (Miss.) 66 L. R. A. 510.

As to exceptions to the rule that certiorari will not lie where there is an appeal, see State ex rel. Hamilton v. Guinotte (Mo.) 50 L. R. A. 787, and note.

gate the charge, express its opinion upon the evidence, and report what further action, if any, was necessary. The court examined many witnesses, made a full statement of the facts, and reported that the conduct of the relator during said campaign "was neither military nor officer-like, and that the same was to the prejudice of good order and military discipline." It recommended that he should be tried by court-martial, if there was "jurisdiction to try officers of the National Guard for offenses committed while in the service of the United States;" otherwise, that he should be ordered before an examining board "to determine his capacity and fitness for the service, and that the evidence taken by this court be referred to such board for its information." The report was referred by the commanding officer of the National Guard to the judge advocate, who, after reviewing the evidence, reported that it sustained the findings of the court. He further reported that a court-martial could not be ordered to try the relator for violating "a duty which at the time the offense was committed was owing to the United States," but that there was jurisdiction to order him before a board of examination. The commanding officer forwarded these reports to the adjutant general, with his approval, and recommended that the relator be ordered before a board of examination accordingly. The governor approved "the proceedings, findings, and recommendation of the court of inquiry," and, "pursuant to the provisions of § 64 of the Military Code," ordered the relator "before a board of examination to examine into his moral character, capacity, and general fitness for service in the National Guard as a commissioned officer." The board was to meet May 17, 1899, but, owing to the delay caused by an alternative writ of prohibition issued at the instance of the relator and finally dismissed, it did not meet until May 10, 1900. People ex rel. Smith v. Doyle, 28 Misc. 411, 59 N. Y. Supp. 959, 44 App. Div. 402, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1088, 162 N. Y. 659, 57 N. E. 1122. The relator was notified to appear before the board, and at the time and place appointed he appeared with counsel, whereupon, as stated by him in his petition, and not denied by the respondents, the proceedings were as follows: After the members of the board and the stenographer had been sworn, the relator stated: "I wish to be represented by my counsel, Colonel Alexander S. Bacon, of New York. He is here to represent me." Gen. Oliver, who spoke for the board, thereupon stated in open session that the relator could not be represented by counsel. The relator said, "If the board has counsel, I think I ought to have counsel;" and Gen. Oliver replied, "Very well; it will be entered on the minutes that you requested counsel, and that your request was denied." The orders convening, adjourning, and reconvening the board were then read, and the recorder produced the stenographer's minutes taken before the court of inquiry, and offered them in evidence. The relator said: "If that is to be used as evidence on this examination, I object. You have not allowed me counsel, and I am not a lawyer, but I know that this is something that ought to be objected to as being incompetent. As I understand it, it is not acceptable as evidence before any court or board." The room was then cleared to consider the objection, the relator and stenographer being sent outside. In about fifteen minutes an orderly informed the relator "that he was wanted at the board room." Upon trying to enter the room he was met by the recorder, who said, "Major, the board has adjourned," and, when asked to what time, replied, "I do not know, but you will be notified." The relator then asked if he should return to New York or remain in Albany, and the recorder replied, "I cannot tell, but you will receive notice." He inquired if he might go before the board to make a short statement, and the recorder went inside to consult the board, but immediately returned, saying, "No; the board is adjourned and cannot hear you. Anything you wish to say can be said at the next session, of which due notice will be sent you." The relator thereupon returned to the waiting room, and an orderly brought him his hat and coat, which had been left in the room where the board was sitting. He received no notice of any subsequent session, and the board never met again to his knowledge. No further proceedings were had, unless in secret session, and he never had any opportunity to be heard, except as stated. The next he knew about the matter was on the 6th of June, 1900, when he was served with a general order, issued by command of the governor and signed by the adjutant general, which, after reciting that the board had reported adversely, discharged him from the military service of the state.

The office held by the relator was of some pecuniary value, but owing to his discharge he is no longer entitled to the income therefrom. He claims that he has been deprived of property without due process of law, and that a shadow has been cast upon his name through the judgment of a military board, pronounced without a hearing or an opportunity to be heard. The only question before us is whether the civil courts can listen to his appeal; for thus far they, also, have refused to hear him, not in the exercise of discretion, but for the supposed want of power. It is claimed on the one hand that a board of examination appointed pursuant to § 64 of the Military Code is a judicial body composed of officers acting as judges, whose action can be reviewed by a writ of certiorari; and, on the other, that it is simply an agency created to advise the governor, as commander in chief, in respect to the fitness of a commissioned officer to remain in the service, and that its proceedings are not open to review by the civil courts. The board is not a permanent body, and has no inherent power, but only such as is conferred by the Constitution and statutes, to which we must turn in order to discover the nature of its functions.

Article 11 of the Constitution relates to the state militia, and § 6 thereof provides that no commissioned officer shall be removed from office during the term for which he shall have been appointed or elected, unless by the senate on the recommendation of the governor, stating the grounds on which such removal is recommended, or by the sentence of a court-martial, or upon the findings of an examining board organized pursuant to law, or for absence without leave for a period of six months or more. The provision relating to an examining board is new, and has been in force only since January 1, 1895, when the revised Constitution went into effect. The Military Code is an elaborate statute, consisting of 12 articles and many sections, providing for the organization and government of the militia of the state. Laws 1898, chap. 212; Laws 1899, chap. 240; Laws 1900, chap. 746. The fourth article relates to commissioned officers, and § 64, which is a part thereof, is as follows: "The governor may, whenever he may deem that the good of the service requires it, order any commissioned officer before a board of examination, to consist of not less than three nor more than five general or field officers, which is hereby invested with the powers of courts of inquiry and courts-martial, and such board shall examine into the moral character, capacity, and general fitness for the service, of such commissioned officer, and record and return the testimony taken and a record of its proceedings. If the findings of such board be unfavorable to such officer and be approved by the governor, he shall be discharged from the service. No officer whose grade or promotion would in any way be affected by the decision of such board, in any case that may come before it, shall participate in the examination or decision of the board in such case. Failure to appear when ordered before a board constituted under this section shall be sufficient ground for a finding by such board that the officer ordered to appear be discharged." A board of examination is not one of the four military courts created, eo nomine, by article 7, called "courts of inquiry," "general courts-martial," "garrison courts-martial," and "delinquency courts," but it has the powers of the two courts first named, with the same organization and method of procedure. While its jurisdiction is different, it has the same power, so far as its jurisdiction extends, just as the county court has the power of the supreme court upon the trial of an action that it can try at all. A court of inquiry may be ordered "to examine into the nature of any transaction of or accusation or imputation against any officer or soldier." It has power to take evidence, make findings of fact, and, when required, to express an opinion thereon. § 92. General courts-martial have power to try commissioned officers for eighteen classes of offenses relating to their conduct in the military service, such as disobedience of orders, neglect of duty, and the like; and by their judgment an officer may be dismissed from the service, fined, or reprimanded. § 95. "Each military court" has "the same power to compel by subpoena, by subpoena duces tecum, and by attachment the attendance of witnesses both civilian and military and the production of books, papers, and documents, and to punish for contempt a witness duly subpoenaed for nonattendance or refusal to be sworn or testify or to produce books, papers, and documents as is possessed by the supreme court of this state." Commissions and subpoenas may be issued "in behalf of the people of this state, and on application in behalf of any person to be tried by such court." § 108. Any member of the court may be challenged and the members are sworn "in the presence of the accused, . . . faithfully try and determine according to evidence the matter before him, . . . and that he will duly administer justice according to the established rules of law for the government of the military forces of the state." § 109. Said courts are empowered to issue process, including writs and warrants, to the sheriff of any county, or a constable of any town or city, who are required to execute the same. § 110. They may commit to the common jail of the county in which their sessions are held any person guilty of disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior in open court. § 111. A judge advocate is required to attend courts of inquiry and general courts-martial, and "in all the courts provided by this chapter the accused shall have the right to the assistance of counsel." § 112. They keep a record of their proceedings, and pronounce sentence, which is delivered to the officer ordering the court, who may approve or disapprove thereof, reconvene the court, and send back its findings or sentence for revision. §§ 114, 115. The members are protected from prosecution on account of the imposition or execution of any sentence, or the execution of any warrant, writ, or process issued by the court. § 116.

Thus it is apparent that a board of examination, which is expressly given the powers of courts of inquiry and courts-martial with reference to the questions intrusted to it for decision, has the general powers of a court, with the right to investigate questions of fact relating in part to rights of property, to decide those questions upon the evidence taken, and pronounce a judgment. It is not clothed with arbitrary discretion to act without evidence or against law, but is a body of military officers of high rank, each sworn to faithfully try and determine according to evidence, and to administer justice according to law. These functions are not ministerial, executive, or legislative, but judicial in character. The words "testimony," "findings," and "decision," as used in § 64, indicate a trial before a judicial body, and the provision for judgment by default on failure to appear shows that the accused officer has a right to be heard. The action of the board is upon a question arising between the people and the officer ordered before it, and results in a judgment based upon evidence. The power, the procedure, and the result are appropriate only to an impartial tribunal, exercising judicial power; for the statute is carefully drawn to secure disinterested men, who are to decide the issues according to the testimony. "When . . . the law requires a judicial determination to be made, such as the decision of a question of fact, . . . the duty is regarded as judicial. . . . People ex rel. Harris v. Land Office Comrs. 149 N. Y. 26, 31, 43 N. E. 418. The power to hear a controversy and decide it is a judicial power, and, whether exercised by a court or by a board of examination, the members act as judges, as we think the members of the board in question acted, both in form and in fact. It was not their duty to advise the governor, but to make an adjudication, which was essential in order to enable him to remove the relator from office. An officer may be removed by the sentence of a court-martial, or upon the findings of an examining board; the former executing itself, and the latter requiring an executive order. Const. art. 11, § 6. With all his power as commander in chief, the governor cannot remove a commissioned officer of the National Guard in time of peace without the findings of an examining board, except for absence without leave, although the senate may remove upon his recommendation. When judgment of removal is pronounced by a court-martial, it takes effect, ex proprio vigore, upon the simple approval of the governor, without further action on his part. The Constitution surrounds every commissioned officer with these safeguards against the exercise of arbitrary power, and protects him until he is adjudged guilty either of an offense cognizable by a court-martial, or of a want of moral character, capacity, or general fitness for the service, cognizable by a board of examination. Section 64 does not relate to the retirement or discharge of officers upon reaching a certain age, or becoming disabled, unfit, or incompetent, and thereby incapable of performing their duties. Such cases, depending on physical condition rather than on moral character, are provided for by § 63, which requires that a surgeon shall aid in the investigation there provided for. The order for the trial of the relator was specifically made under § 64, which, as well as the order itself, limits the investigation and decision to moral character, capacity, and general fitness for the service. The board was required to take the evidence offered by the people and the relator, and, after hearing both sides, determine the question submitted to them by the order under the statute. We regard their powers, duties, and determination as judicial in nature, although there may be wide latitude of procedure, so far as form is concerned. As an examining board has the same power to try and decide as a court-martial, although for different offenses, and its judgment may be the sole authority for the removal of a commissioned officer elected or appointed for life, if the judgment of a court-martial can be reviewed upon certiorari the determination of a board of examination can be reviewed in the same way.

It is well established that the judicial determinations of inferior tribunals and officers acting judicially under the authority of a statute may be reviewed under a common-law writ of certiorari, which is issued to correct errors of law affecting the property or rights of the parties, and to test the validity of official action judicial or quasi-judicial in character. People ex rel. Steward v. New York Railroad Comrs. 160 N. Y. 202, 54 N. E. 697; People ex rel. Loughran v. New York R. Comrs. 158 N. Y. 421, 428, 53 N. E. 163; People ex rel. Burnham v. Jones, 112 N. Y. 597, 20 N. E. 577; People ex rel. Corwin v. Walter, 68 N. Y. 403, 408. Unless military tribunals are excepted from the general rule, their judicial determinations are subject to review by means of this ancient and important writ. They are not expressly excepted either by the Military Code or the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 2120 of the latter provides that the writ may be issued either when expressly authorized by statute, or when authorized by the common law and not expressly forbidden by statute. The limitations placed by the next two sections upon the power thus conferred do not apply to the case in hand; for the determination in question was not made in a civil action or proceeding, and cannot adequately be reviewed by appeal. No appeal is authorized by the Military Code, and the judgments of all military tribunals are kept secret until published in orders as approved, modified, or disapproved by the officer directing the investigation. Military Code, §§ 113, 114. The appeal mentioned in § 2122 of the Code of Civil Procedure means one that can be brought, argued, and heard as a matter of right, and not a secret review of a judgment, the existence of which cannot be known to the defeated party until after the review has been made, and in such a case as this not until after the judgment has been executed.

It may be claimed, however, that the determination of military tribunals, although not expressly excepted from the provisions of the Code relating to the right of certiorari, are impliedly excepted, because, if civil courts were permitted to interfere with the judgments of military courts, the discipline of the National Guard might be injured. There is force in this argument, which is confirmed to a certain extent by the decisions of the Federal courts relating to the regular army, and by some, but not by all, writers on military law. The subject, however, is treated with reference to a standing army, rather than the militia of the various states. Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How. 65, 81, 15 L. ed. 838, 844; Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. 2, 18 L. ed. 281; Johnson v. Sayre, 158 U. S. 109, 39 L. ed. 914, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 773; 1 Winthrop, Military Law, 55; De Hart, Militia Law, 226; Maltby, Courts-Martial, 151, 158; O'Brien, Military Laws, 222; Davis, Military Laws, 6. There is a conflict of authority between the courts of the different states as to the rights of the civil courts to review the judgments of military tribunals. Durham v. United States, 4 Hayw. 54; State v. Davis, 4 N. J. L. 311; Ex parte Dunbar, 14 Mass. 393; Re Contested Election, 1 Strobb. L. 190; 4 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 40. The courts of England review such judgments, but cautiously, as the subject requires. Grant v. Gould, 2 H. Bl. 69, 101; Re Mansergh, 1 Best & S. 400;

1 Winthrop, Military Law, 57; Re Poe, 5 Barn. & Ad. 681.

Confining the discussion to times of peace, as in time of war military necessity may sanction the temporary exercise of almost any power to save the state, there is a wide distinction between the regular army of the nation and the militia of a state when not in the service of the nation; for discipline which is ample for the latter will not answer for the former. A member of the state militia belongs to civil life, has a civil avocation, and only occasionally engages in the exercise of arms. A member of the United States army, on the other hand, has no employment except that of a soldier, and arms constitute the business of his life. Hence more rigid rules and a higher state of discipline are required in the one case than in the other. Moreover, the state militia is organized by statutes of the state, and the legislature, under the limitations of the Constitution, has power to regulate the entire subject, to invest boards of examination with such authority, and to give the civil courts such power to review as it sees fit. When, therefore, the legislature issued a general command upon the subject of reviewing the action of inferior judicial tribunals and officers acting judicially, and made certain exceptions thereto, the matter was exhausted, and the courts have no power to add an exception relating to any tribunal which the legislature is presumed to have had in mind. The part of the Code of Civil Procedure under consideration went into effect on the 1st of September, 1880, and nearly fifty years before the judgment of a court-martial was reviewed and affirmed under a writ of certiorari. Rathbun v. Sawyer, 15 Wend. 451. By one of the early decisions of the court of appeals after its reorganization in 1870 the same power was exercised without question. People ex rel. Underwood v. Daniell, 50 N. Y. 274. The strongest case upon the subject, however, occurred a year later, when this court not only reviewed, but reversed, the proceedings of a court-martial of the National Guard. People ex rel. Garling v. Van Allen, 55 N. Y. 31. In that case the relator, upon his trial before a court-martial, was virtually, though not absolutely, denied the right to defend by counsel; and its judgment was reversed by this court, upon certiorari, because the right to defend by counsel before a military court in this state is guaranteed by the bill of rights, as embodied in the Constitution of 1846, although not in that of 1821. Id. 37. These decisions had been made before either the Code of Procedure or the Military Code was passed, and others of like character were made after the former but before the latter was enacted. People ex rel. Spahn v. Townsend, 10 Abb. N. C. 169; Re Brackett, 27 Hun, 605; People ex rel. Skinnell v. Rand, 41 Hun, 529. Those statutes, therefore, must be read in the light of the common law as it existed at the date of their passage, which authorized a writ of certiorari to issue to military tribunals organized under the militia statutes of the state for the purpose of reviewing their decisions. The legislature is presumed to have known the common law, and to have made its enactments with reference to the decisions of the courts, yet, when providing general rules to govern the issuance of this great writ, although it excepted the action of certain tribunals from review, it did not except the action of military tribunals. Even when the Military Code was passed, no provision was made to exempt judgments of the tribunals created thereby from review by the civil courts according to the law and practice prevailing at the time. Under these circumstances, an exception should not be implied by the courts, but left to the legislature, in its wisdom, to express, if it sees fit.

We thus reach the conclusion that the supreme court has power to issue a writ of certiorari to review the determination of a board of examination appointed under § 64 of the Military Code, and that the order dismissing the writ under consideration for want of power was erroneous. If the courts below see fit to dismiss the writ in the exercise of their discretion, they have the power to do so, but otherwise it is their duty to require a return, and proceed thereon according to law. People ex rel. May v. Maynard, 160 N. Y. 453, 55 N. E. 9. The review authorized does not substitute the judgment of the civil court for that of the military court upon the evidence or the merits, but inquires into jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the exercise of authority in relation to the subject-matter according to law, the violation of any rule of law to the prejudice of the relator, and the like. Code Civ. Proc. § 2140.

It is suggested that there is no power to issue a writ of certiorari to the governor, but it is unnecessary to pass upon that question. While it was done in a recent case, the point does not appear to have been raised. People ex rel. Leo v. Hill, 126 N. Y. 497, 27 N. E. 789. In view of a later decision, there is grave doubt whether the courts could compel the governor to make a return. People ex rel. Broderick v. Morton, 156 N. Y. 136, 41 L. R. A. 231, 50 N. E. 791. The writ in the case before us, however, although issued to the governor, among others, was not served upon him, and he is not a proper party. The writ should be directed to the body or officer whose determination is to be reviewed, or to any other person having the custody of the record or other papers to be certified, or to both, if necessary. Code Civ. Proc. § 2129. The adjutant general is the custodian of the record and report of an examining board, and hence he was properly made a party. Military Code, § 15. The determination of the examining board was to be reviewed, and hence the members thereof were proper parties; but the action of the governor was not to be reviewed, and he should not have been made a party. His action was executive, while theirs was judicial. As he could not have removed the relator except upon their "findings," a reversal of their determination would render the order of removal void, because there would be nothing to justify it, and this would leave the relator still in office. While we cannot touch the person of the governor, we can pass upon the effect of his acts, and decide whether they are valid or invalid.

The order appealed from should be reversed, with costs, and the matter remitted to the courts below for further proceedings.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

John G. BRAGAW

v.

SUPREME LODGE KNIGHTS AND LADIES OF HONOR, Appt.

(128 N. C. 354.)

1. The financial secretary of a subordinate lodge of a benefit society, who is designated by the supreme lodge to receive and forward assessments from certificate holders, is for that purpose the agent of the supreme lodge, so that the standing of certificate holders will not be affected by his failure to forward assessments paid him.
2. A provision in the constitution of a benefit society, that members shall become such subject to the power of the corporation to change its by-laws, cannot be construed into liberty to change at will the contract of insurance it has made with each member.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Beaufort County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a mutual benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John L. Bridgers and Charles F. Warren, for appellant:

The relations which local and subordinate lodges of such societies shall bear to the supreme lodge or directory, and to the members of the order, are proper matters for regulation in the by-laws of the society. Where the by-laws on the subject are plainly and clearly drawn, it is not difficult to determine these relations.

Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. § 276.

The subordinate lodge is the agent of the supreme lodge unless otherwise contracted; the provisions of the by-laws of 1889 make it otherwise.

1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. §§ 11, 118, 144; Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. La Malta, 95 Tenn. 157, 30 L. R. A. 838, 31 S. W. 493.

Payment to a subordinate lodge, where such lodge is made the agent of the supreme lodge to receive and transmit assessments, is a sufficient payment to prevent a forfeiture.

NORM.—As to forfeiture of benefit certificate by default of subordinate lodge, see Murphy v. Independent Order S. & D. of J. of A. (Miss.) 50 L. R. A. 111, and note.

As to power of beneficial insurance association to change, amend, and repeal by-laws, see, 54 L. R. A.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. note 1, p. 1101. The converse should be true where it is not the agent of the supreme lodge.

By the terms of its charter, constitution, and laws the defendant had the power to make, alter, amend, or repeal its Constitution, laws and by-laws.

A contract of membership in a mutual association is always made with reference to, and always includes, the constitution and by-laws, of which every member is bound to take notice.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1081.

The adoption of the by-law was for the evident purpose of imposing upon the members who had elected the financial secretary of the lodge responsibility for his acts in collecting and remitting assessments.

The members of the association are bound by the by-laws and all subsequent amendments thereto.

Bacon, Ben. Soc. §§ 91a, 185; Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. § 114; Bauer v. Samson Lodge K. of P. 102 Ind. 262, 1 N. E. 571; Fugure v. Mutual Soc. of St. Joseph, 46 Vt. 382; Simoral v. Dubuque Mut. F. Ins. Co. 18 Iowa, 319; Coles v. Iowa State Mut. Ins. Co. 18 Iowa, 425; Coleman v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 18 Mo. App. 189; *Osoeola Tribe No. 11 I. O. of R. M. v. This by-law adopted in 1889 simply defines the relations between the members of the subordinate lodge and the officers of that lodge elected by them. It does not tend to impair vested rights, either by diminishing the value of the certificate payable to plaintiff, or by increasing the assessments upon that certificate, or by an arbitrary classification of members of the order.

The by-laws were a material part of the contract,—not only those in force at the time the contract was entered into, but those subsequently enacted.

The contract is made with reference to the constitution and by-laws, and they are parts of it, and the member is supposed to know them.

Messrs. Small & MacLean and S. C. Bragaw, for appellee:

A contract by which one party promises to make a certain payment upon the destruction or injury of something in which the other party has an interest is a contract of insurance, whatever may be the terms of payment or the consideration, or the mode of estimating or securing payment of the same to the insured in case of loss.

Organizations similar to the defendant are insurance companies with fraternal features.

The benefit certificate in question constituted a contract between the defendant and the assured, in which her rights were vested.

The financial secretary was the agent of the defendant, the supreme lodge, and not the agent of the individual members.

The by-laws must be: (1) Reasonable; (2) they must not disturb the vested rights, or impair the contract, or impose additional obligations upon the member.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was duly incorporated in Kentucky in 1878 as "The Supreme Lodge Knights and Ladies of Honor." It organized a subordinate lodge (Pamlico Lodge, No. 715) in Washington, North Carolina, in 1883, and in September of that year issued a policy for $1,000 to Annie C. Bragaw, in which policy her husband, the plaintiff, John G. Bragaw, was the beneficiary. The relief-fund (or insurance) department of the organization was a separate and distinct feature from its social and fraternal features. At the date the Bragaw policy was issued (September, 1883) the constitution and by-laws which had been adopted in 1881 were in force. They were amended in several material particulars in 1889, but it is not shown that notice of these amendments was given to the subordinate lodges, nor to the assured or the beneficiary in this policy. It is not denied that the assured paid all the assessments which were demanded or of which she had any notice from the date of her policy or certificate down to the date of her death, and that the same were paid to the financial secretary of the subordinate lodge, who was admittedly the proper and only official to whom these payments could be made. His receipts for payments made by her up to her death, in 1895, were in evidence. Notice of death was given as required. The defendant declined to pay the claim upon the ground that the assured had failed to pay assessments Nos. 256 and 257, and because the subordinate lodge had been suspended for nonpayment of these two particular assessments. There is no evidence that Annie C. Bragaw in any particular failed to comply with any law, rule, or regulation of the order. The defense is that the subordinate lodge did not hold regular meetings, and that the secretary failed to remit collections and was suspended. The plaintiff testified that his wife paid all the assessments made on her from the date of the certificate or policy until her death; that these payments were made to the financial secretary of Pamlico Lodge, No. 715. These payments included the assessments Nos. 256 and 257. But the defendant excepted upon the ground that the true question was whether the assessments had been paid to the supreme lodge. This presents the main point involved in this case; i. e., whether the financial secretary, for the purpose of collecting money upon policies of insurance, was the agent of the supreme lodge or of the assured, the individual members. There is another feature of this association, —social and fraternal. In all matters of that kind, and in matters of purely local nature, the financial secretary, who was chosen by the subordinate lodge, was its agent. But in this matter of insurance there are only two parties to the contract. One is the insurer, the supreme lodge, which alone is incorporated, and which receives the premiums and contracts to pay the policy. The other is each individual assurer, who pays his premiums to the financial secretary, whom the supreme lodge has designated as the proper person to whom to pay the premiums, and whose duty it is to forward the money thus received to the supreme lodge. The subordinate lodge cuts no figure in the insurance. It is not incorporated. It has no legal entity. It receives no money for insurance, and contracts to pay no policy. The fact that the supreme lodge designates to receive the money, when paid by the assured, one whom the subordinate lodge has elected financial secretary, is purely a matter of convenience, but does not affect the legal proposition that such officer is thereby made the agent of the supreme lodge for the purpose of notifying the assured (who are called members) of the assessments when made from time to time, collecting the same, and forwarding the money to the supreme lodge.

In their brief the learned counsel for the defendant say: "The subordinate lodge is the agent of the supreme lodge, unless otherwise contracted. The provisions of the by-laws of 1889 make it otherwise." The by-laws in force at the date of the policy contained no words making it otherwise. In 1889 the following amendment to the by-laws was adopted: "Sec. 14. In receiving money from members in payment of relief-fund assessments, and in all acts performed in complying with the relief-fund laws of the order, the subordinate lodge and its officers are the agents of the members, and not the agents of the supreme lodge." It is not shown that the assured had any notice of or assented to this amendment. A provision that one should become a member, subject to the power of the corporation to change its by-laws, cannot be construed into liberty to change at its will the contract of insurance it has made with each insurer. The company and the assured occupy two entirely different relations. In one it is a company, and the other party one of its members. In that relation the by-laws or constitution can be amended at will of the majority, if done in the legal and prescribed mode. The other relation is that of insurer and insured, and this contract relation cannot be altered save by the consent of both parties, and the party alleging that the consent was given must show it. Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 126 N. C. 971, post, 605, 36 S. E. 352.

But, passing that by, suppose the company had the power to enact the above by-law without the assent of the assured; it could not have the effect contended for by the plaintiff. The subject has been so recently and thoroughly discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and with such a wealth of authority from the supreme courts of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Kansas, Wisconsin, Texas, and other states, that it is unnecessary to do more than refer to that case, which is Supreme Lodge E. of P. v. Withers, 177 U. S. 260, 44 L. ed. 782, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611, filed April 9, 1900. It is there held, in a unanimous opinion of the court, affirming both the circuit court and the circuit court of appeals (32 C. C. A. 182, 59 U. S. App. 177, 89 Fed. 160), with an able and exhaustive discussion of the above authorities by Mr. Justice Brown, as follows: The failure of the secretary of a local, subordinate lodge of the Knights of Pythias to transmit to the general board of control, within the time specified by the general laws of the order, moneys paid to him in due time by a member, will not be ground for forfeiture of the policy of such member, since the secretary's negligence is not chargeable to the member, but is that of an agent of the order, notwithstanding a provision in the general laws of the order to the effect that he is to be regarded as the agent of the member and not of the order, where the general laws also require the member to pay dues to such secretary only, and provide that he shall transmit at certain specified times all moneys collected by him, and that the local branch or lodge shall be responsible to the supreme lodge for all such moneys collected by the secretary. This will render futile or irrelevant all the other exceptions taken; for if the secretary of the subordinate lodge is the agent of the supreme lodge, as far as the contract of insurance goes (here called the "Relief-Fund Department"), inasmuch as it is not controverted that Mrs. Bragaw paid every assessment, to the date of her death, to one who in law was the agent of the supreme lodge, it becomes immaterial whether the subordinate lodge was suspended or not, and whether notice of suspension was given; for, as she was in no default, her contract with the defendant that the latter would pay her beneficiary (the plaintiff) $1,000 at her death cannot be forfeited, either by the misconduct of the secretary as agent of the defendant, or by the failure of other members of the lodge (if any) who held like policies to pay their assessments. The suspension of the subordinate lodge could not affect her contract rights. The supreme lodge having sent her notice of the assessments through the secretary, with the unrevoked order to pay to him, such payment is binding on the supreme lodge. In the case above cited it is said: "To invest him [the secretary] with the duties of an agent, and to deny his agency, is a mere juggling with words. Defendant cannot thus play fast and loose with its own subordinates. Upon its theory the policy holders had absolutely no protection. They were bound to make their monthly payments to the secretary of the section [local lodge] who was bound to remit them to the board of control [supreme lodge]; but they [the assured] could not compel him to remit, and were thus completely at his mercy. . . . The reports are by no means barren of cases turning upon the proper construction of this so-called 'agency clause,' under which the defendant seeks to shift its responsibility upon the insured for the neglect of . . . [the secretary] to remit on the proper day. In some jurisdictions it is held to be practically void and of no effect, in others it is looked upon as a species of wild animal lying in wait and ready to spring upon the unwary policy holder, and in all it is eyed with suspicion and construed with great strictness. We think it should not be given effect when manifestly contrary to the facts of the case or opposed to the interests of justice. . . . The object of the clause is, in most cases, to transfer the responsibility for his acts from the party to whom it properly belongs to one who generally has no knowledge of its existence." As in this case, the supreme lodge knew at once wheth-

or the secretary remitted for assessments or not; but the assured who, upon receipt of notices of assessment from the supreme lodge, paid them to the secretary as directed, had no means of knowing whether he forwarded the money to the supreme lodge or not. The above decision has more recently been followed, with copious citations, in Murphy v. Independent Order, S. & D. of J. of A. 77 Miss. 830, 50 L. R. A. 111, 27 So. 624, in which it is held: "Under a by-law of the beneficial association declaring that officers of subordinate lodges shall be the agents of the body that elects them, and not of the grand lodge, the grand lodge cannot escape liability on a certificate of membership by reason of the failure of the subordinate lodge to do its duty in paying assessments to the grand lodge." Among the precedents cited in both of above cases is Schunck v. Gegenseitiger Wittwen und Waisen Fond, 44 Wis. 375, in which, under such a formidable nomenclature, is found the following sound reasoning: The subordinate lodge "acts for and represents the defendant in making the contract with the member, unless we adopt as correct the idea . . . that the member, by some one-sided arrangement, makes a contract with himself through his own agent." In another case also there cited (Young v. Grand Council A. O. of O. 63 Minn. 506, 65 N. W. 933) it is said: "The assured did all she could. It cannot be that a wilful failure of these officers [of the subordinate lodge] can cause a failure of appellant's rights she not being in fault. On the same general line is our late decision in Doggett v. United Order of G. C. 126 N. C. 477, 36 S. E. 26, where it is held: "Where according to the constitution and laws of the society, notice and proofs of death are to be furnished by officers of the subordinate commandery or lodge of which the deceased was a member, they are the agents for that purpose of the supreme commandery, for whose action the beneficiary plaintiffs are not responsible." "Demand having been made, the certificate shown, and the death of assured proved, a prima facie case was made out for the plaintiff." Doggett v. United Order of G. C. 126 N. C. 477, 36 S. E. 26. In addition it has here been shown, without contradiction, that the assured for twelve years (from the date of her policy, in 1883, down to her death, in 1895) paid to one who was the agent of the supreme lodge every assessment laid upon her and called for by the defendant, said supreme lodge. There is no evidence in rebuttal of these facts. This renders it unnecessary, as already said, to consider in detail the other exceptions, whose decision is either involved in what has been said, or they have been made irrelevant. There were some errors committed in favor of appellant, but these need not be discussed.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION, Appt.

(126 N. C. 971, 128 N. C. 465.)

1. The contract evidenced by a certificate of membership in a mutual benefit society cannot, after the holder has paid large sums thereon, be altered by resolutions of the society without the holder's consent so as to place him in a class and assess that class in a manner different from the rule applied to newer members, the result of which is to destroy the value of the contract.
2. The rule that the damages for breach of a contract insuring a life are the premiums paid prior to the breach, with interest thereon from the date of each payment, is applicable to contracts in mutual benefit associations.

On rehearing.

3. A mere general consent by a member of a mutual benefit society that the constitution and by-laws may be amended applies only to such reasonable regulations as may be within the scope of its original design, and does not authorize changes which will destroy the value of his contract.

(June 9, 1900.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Craven County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful cancellation of a life-insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. John W. Hinesdale, for appellant:

To ascertain the contract between the association and its members, regard must be had to the nature of the association and the relations which exist between it and them. The contract is contained in the laws under which it was created, its charter, its constitution and by-laws, rules and regulations and all amendments thereto, and the member's application and certificate of membership.

May, Ins. 3d ed. § 548; Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 51; Joyce, Ins. § 340; Biddle, Ins. §§ 42, 43, 44; Bliss, Ins. § 426.

The charter or articles of incorporation and the laws of New York form a part of the contract.

Messrs. George Burnham, Jr., James E. Shepherd, and Sewell Tyng also for appellant.

Mr. William W. Clark for appellee.

Douglas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful cancelation of a policy of insurance. The record comprises over 500 pages, with a large number of insertions, amounting in the aggregate to perhaps 600 pages of printed matter. The case was fully and ably argued at length, and we have been favored with well-prepared and exhaustive briefs; and yet we see but one simple point essential to the determination of the case: Can a mutual association, by whatever name it may be called, or whatever may be its purposes, enter into a contract with one of its members, and, after receiving large sums upon said contract, alter its essential terms, without the consent of the member, so as practically to destroy its value? We think not. The plaintiff became a member of the plaintiff association in 1883, and received a policy in the form of a certificate of membership, wherein it was expressly agreed that assessments should "be made upon the entire membership in force at the date of the last death for such a sum as the executive committee may deem sufficient to cover said claims; the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member as per table indorsed" on said certificate. It appears from the findings of fact that the plaintiff paid all demands made upon him up to the year 1898, and call No. 96. This last call he refused to pay on the ground that it was exorbitant and contrary to the express terms of his policy. It seems that by successive resolutions, none of which were amendments to its constitution, the association has placed in a separate class all members who entered prior to 1890, and requires them to pay on the basis of the age attained by each at the date of each assessment, while other members continue to be assessed only as of their age of entry. That the result of such discrimination is injurious to the plaintiff clearly appears from the 16th, 18th, 21st, and 22d findings of fact, as follows: "(16) . . . That since the last resolution of 1898 the plaintiff and all who joined said company prior to 1890, and who held policies similar to plaintiff's were assessed at their full attained age, at rates applicable to such age, whereas persons who became members since 1890, and who held policies under what is styled the 'Ten-Year Class' and the 'Five-Year Class,' are only assessed at their age of entry; and plaintiff is thereby assessed at a higher amount than if the entire membership were assessed at rates of their attained ages." "(18) That call number 96, made on plaintiff in 1898, and pursuant to the resolutions of said year, is larger in amount than it would have been had all the members of the association been assessed at their full attained ages." "(21) That the present value of plaintiff's policy, assuming that the rates were properly established and the members lawfully classified, was, at the time he ceased to be a member of said company, only a nominal sum, as by said classification and rating the amount of policy discounted to such time would not exceed the present value of premiums which would be due and payable for the period of plaintiff's expectancy (22) That if the entire membership of the company had been rated and assessed at their attained ages, and no distinction made among the classes, then the present value of plaintiff's policy would be more than the present value of the premiums, and the policy have a substantial present value; but there are no data given from which said damage can be estimated or even approximated." Upon his findings of fact, the court below concluded, as matter of law, that the assessment made in pursuance of the resolutions of 1898 was "in violation of defendant's constitution and excessive and invalid;" that the defendant, having ceased and refused to recognize the plaintiff as a member on account of his having refused to pay such excessive and invalid assessment, had broken its contract, and had become liable to the plaintiff in damages, to be measured by "the amount of premiums and dues paid by plaintiff prior to call 96, with interest thereon from date of each payment." Judgment was rendered accordingly. In it we see no error. All that we decide in the present case is that the defendant has violated its contract with the plaintiff in a material matter, whereby the plaintiff, having suffered substantial injury, is entitled to substantial damages. We do not decide that a mutual insurance company, or any other kind of insurance company, cannot issue policies of divers kinds and classes, if so authorized by its charter; nor do we decide that a member of a purely mutual association is not bound by all reasonable by-laws and changes lawfully made therein. We are not considering the enforcement of a contract inequitable on its face, but the violation of a lawful contract by attaching thereto, without the consent of the plaintiff, conditions which utterly destroy its value. It is evident that, if the resolution of 1898 is binding upon the plaintiff, he would in any event be eventually forced out of the company by the constantly increasing premiums.

There is one fact that does not clearly appear from the record, and upon which counsel themselves seem to differ, which, while not essential to the determination of this case, seems worthy of notice: On the hearing it was contended that the defendant association had the right to subsequently rearrange its members into classes, so as to make each class bear the burden of insuring its own members. If by that the association claims the right to place all its members who entered before 1890 into a distinct class, entirely separate from the other members, and make them raise exclusively among themselves enough to pay all the death claims that may occur among their own number, we cannot admit the right, unless such was the understanding when the original contract was made. What would be the result? Suppose certain men start a mutual association, and support it through all its infant struggles into a vigorous and enlarged growth. In course of time the new members would naturally outnumber the old ones. Suppose they should say to the old members: "You are getting old, and therefore your insurance is more costly than ours. We will place you in a class by yourselves, and make you insure each other without any help from us. It is true you have borne the heat and burden of the day and we are resting in the shade of the tree you have planted, but that makes no difference to us. Insure yourselves or leave." Of course, as one by one died off, the burden would be greater upon the survivors, as a death claim of $1,000 bears more heavily upon twenty men than it would upon 100. Finally two would be left. When one died, the other would have to pay his entire policy, and then pay his own policy at his own death. Would this be insurance, and could it be said that any claim which would lead to such a result is sound in principle? It may be that the association has provided for such cases, but it is apparent that if any class of men is set apart, and no new blood permitted to enter, it will eventually die out. If a man voluntarily goes into such a contract with his eyes open, we are not inclined to help him; but his valid, existing contract cannot be changed into such a contract without his consent. Whatever may be the power of a mutual association to change its by-laws, such changes must always be in furtherance of the essential objects of its creation, and not destructive of vested rights.

It is admitted that the measure of damages followed by the court below is the established rule in this state. Braswell v. American L. Ins. Co. 75 N. C. 8; Lovick v. Providence Life Assn. 110 N. C. 93, 14 S. E. 506; Burrus v. Life Ins. Co. 124 N. C. 9, 32 S. E. 323. But it is contended that this rule was established purely in contemplation of old-line companies, and was not intended to apply to mutual associations. Whatever may have been the inception of the rule, we see no better one to adopt, and, as at present advised, must follow our own precedents.

* The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Douglas, J., on June 4, 1901, handed down the following response:

This case is before us on a rehearing, being originally reported in 128 N. C. 971, 36 S. E. 352. We have again given it careful consideration, and have been forced to the same conclusions announced in our former opinion. It seems useless to again discuss the principles involved, as they are few and simple, as the case is viewed by us. The plaintiff had a contract of insurance with the defendant, which the latter seems to have violated in its most essential features, with the result of having destroyed its value to the plaintiff. But it is said that the plaintiff made such contract of insurance with a mutual insurance association, of which he was a member, and by virtue of such membership; and that he is therefore bound by all such rules and regulations as may be thereafter lawfully adopted. "Lawful adoption" may mean much or little. Rules may be adopted under the forms of law that might nevertheless be so unreasonable and inequitable as to be clearly beyond any possible contemplation of law. In any event, such rules can never have any greater force than the law that authorizes their adoption; and, if this has the effect of impairing the obligation of a contract, it is void by constitutional inhibition. But it is said that the plaintiff, upon entering the association, agreed, expressly or impliedly, that changes might be made in its constitution and by-laws, and is bound thereby. We have no evidence that he agreed that such changes might be made as were made, and we have no idea that he ever intended to place it within the power of the association to break his contract at pleasure, or render it utterly valueless by subsequent stipulations or regulations adopted without his consent. A mere general consent that the constitution and by-laws may be amended applies only to such reasonable regulations as may be within the scope of its original design. We must again repeat what we said in our former opinion: "Whatever may be the power of a mutual association to change its by-laws, such changes must always be in furtherance of the essential objects of its creation, and not destructive of vested rights."

It is urged by the defendant that, if the plaintiff is entitled to any relief, it is not by recovery of the premiums he has paid, but by mandamus for reinstatement. This remedy is not demanded by the plaintiff, nor does it seem practicable to us. It is true, we might issue the mandamus to a foreign corporation having its general offices in New York; but how to make such a mandamus effective is a different question, the solution of which is not at all clear to us. Moreover, in the present instance the plaintiff, Strauss, is now dead. Much stress has been laid upon the fact that the supreme court of Minnesota, in Ebert against this defendant (81 Minn. 116, 83 N. W. 506), while agreeing with us upon the main question of the right of recovery, differs with us as to the measure of damage. We are much impressed with the views of the court upon that point, which have much to commend them as theoretical propositions; but we are equally impressed with the frank admission of the court as to the difficulty of their practical application. Our own rule, even in our own minds, falls short of theoretical perfection; but, after most careful consideration, we are unable to find a better. The impaired health of the insured, or his having passed the insurable age, would present complications practically insurmountable in the actual trial of an action. Moreover, the defendant claims that the plaintiff's insurance has cost more than he has paid in, and therefore his recovery would be nothing. The plaintiff would have no means of disproving the alleged cost of his past insurance, the proof of which would be exclusively in the possession of the defendant. He might cross-examine the defendant's witnesses, or demand its books and papers; but, if he got them, what could he do with them? It seems to have taken the defendant several years to find out that the plaintiff's insurance was costing more than his premiums, and this it did only with the assistance of the insurance commissioner of New York and expert actuaries. With or without such assistance, what chance would the average juror have of mentally digesting five hundred pages of insurance statistics? All actions must be capable of a practical determination, with a reasonable certainty of substantial justice; and rules of law must be adjusted to that end, even if, in exceptional cases, they fall short of the full measure of ideal right. A distinguished jurist has said: "Indeed, one of the remarkable tendencies of the English common law upon all subjects of a general nature is to aim at practical good, rather than theoretical perfection; and to seek less to administer justice in all possible cases than to furnish rules which shall secure it in the common course of human business." Story, Eq. Jur. [11th ed.] § 111, p. 109. The rule we have followed is not new. It was laid down by Chief Justice Pearson in Braswell v. American L. Ins. Co. 75 N. C. 8, and has been uniformly followed in this state for the past twenty-five years. But it is said this rule was intended to apply to "old line" companies, and not to mutual associations. Where is the essential difference in principle or in its practical result? Both companies pay back only what they have received, with legal interest thereon, and neither company is permitted to retain anything for the cost of past insurance. If the mutual association receives less, it pays back less. If the old line company collects more than the actual cost of insurance, it pays back that much more, and loses its surplus, as well as its cost of insurance. As we see no reason to change our former judgment, the petition to rehear is denied.

Petition dismissed.

*1. A written assignment of a real-estate mortgage, the execution of which is acknowledged before a notary public of another state, is entitled to be read in evidence

*Headnotes by YOUNG, J.

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that at least forty-two days must intervene between the first publication of a notice of mortgage foreclosure and the day of sale, see Finlayson v. Peterson (N. D.) 83 L. R. A. 532.

under the provisions of § 5696, Rev. Codes, without further proof, when the certificate of acknowledgment attached thereto is authenticated by the signature and official seal of such notary. It is not necessary to have attached thereto the certificate of an officer of a higher rank to the official character and signature of such notary.

2. A notice of mortgage foreclosure sale by advertisement, which is published six times, once in each week, for six successive weeks before the sale, is a sufficient compliance with § 5848, Rev. Codes, regulating the publication of notices. McDonald v. Nordyke Marmon Co. 9 N. D. 290, 83 N. W. 6, followed.

3. In this state a power of sale inserted in a real-estate mortgage is a power coupled with an interest, and is not revoked or suspended by the death of the mortgagor, and when so exercised, and redemption is not made as provided by law, is effective to cut off the rights of redemption of the heirs of such deceased mortgagor.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Traill County in favor of defendants in an action brought to quiet title to real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. W. Ames, for appellant:

McDonald v. Nordyke Marmon Co. 9 N. D. 290, 83 N. W. 6, is a complete disposal of the controversy on the point of notice.

The instrument shows itself to have been duly acknowledged, and this alone entitles it to be received in evidence.

Rev. Codes 1895, § 5696; Anglo-American Land, Mortg. & Agency Co. v. Hegwer, 7 Kan. App. 689, 51 Pac. 915; Wilkins v. Moore, 20 Kan. 538; Webb v. Holt, 113 Mich. 338, 71 N. W. 637; Cameron v. Culkins, 44 Mich. 531, 7 N. W. 157; Webb, Record of Title, 66.

The significance of an acknowledgment is "that the grantor personally appeared before the officer, and in his presence signed, sealed, and delivered the instrument, and then acknowledged the same before him."

A defense on the ground that the instruments were executed under duress, undue influence, etc., cannot be sustained, except on perfectly clear, convincing, and satisfactory evidence.

Mr. M. A. Hildreth, for respondents:

This action cannot be maintained against the heirs of Ingeborg G. Emmons.

A foreclosure by advertisement where one of the mortgagors had died did not cut off the period of redemption, nor set the statute running as against the heirs of the deceased.

Plaintiff brings an action in ejectment, and the foundation of that action is that it is a remedy to recover an estate. It must stand upon the strength of the plaintiff's title, and not upon the weakness of the defendants'.

Young, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover the possession of real estate and to quiet and confirm the title thereto. The real estate in controversy comprises 160 acres, situated in Traill county. The defendants are in possession under claim of title. Plaintiff alleges that he is the owner of said land, and that defendants have no right, title, or interest therein. The case was tried to the court without a jury. No evidence was offered by the defendants. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, at the request of defendants' counsel and on his motion, findings of fact and conclusions of law were made adverse to plaintiff's claim of title. Judgment was thereafter entered declaring certain transfers, upon which plaintiff bases his claim of title, void and of no effect. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and requests a review of the entire case in this court.

It is a stipulated fact that on December 1, 1885, Gunder G. Emmons was the owner of the land in controversy, and it is from this common source that both parties to this action claim the title they rely upon. Plaintiff sets forth his claim of title as follows: He alleges that on December 1, 1885, Gunder G. Emmons and Ingeborg G. Emmons, his wife, executed and delivered a mortgage covering said land to one Hiram D. Upton, to secure their joint note for $700, payable to said Upton, of even date with said mortgage; that on June 1, 1894, said Upton assigned said note and mortgage to one R. C. Alexander, by an instrument in writing; that said mortgage contained a provision authorizing the mortgagee, his heirs and assigns, in case of default in payment of said debt or interest thereon, "to sell said premises at public auction, and convey the same agreeable to the statutes in such case made and provided;" that pursuant to a default in payment of the debt so secured, the said Alexander foreclosed said mortgage by advertisement, causing the notice of sale to be published in a weekly newspaper "six times, once in each week, for six successive weeks," which notice so published fixed the time of sale on June 13, 1896, at 2 o'clock P. M.; that on said date said premises were sold to R. C. Alexander, and a sheriff's certificate of sale duly issued to him; that thereafter, to wit, on June 18, 1897, no redemption having been made, a sheriff's deed was duly issued to the said Alexander, the purchaser at said sale; that thereafter, to wit, on June 21, 1897, the said Alexander conveyed said premises to the plaintiff by executing and delivering to him a warranty deed therefor. All of the instruments above referred to were duly recorded in the proper office.

It is apparent that, if the foreclosure proceedings and the several conveyances are valid, plaintiff's title is perfect, and he is entitled to the relief he demands. The defendants do not claim title or right of possession by virtue of any conveyance. Their rights, if any they have, rest solely upon the fact that they are the heirs at law and next of kin of Ingeborg G. Emmons, who died prior to the foreclosure proceedings hereinbefore referred to. At the time of the execution of the mortgage, and up to the time of her death, she occupied the land in question with her husband as their homestead, and since her death the defendants have continued to so occupy it. One of the defendants, Peter Emmons, is still in his minority. The facts placed in issue by the answer are few, and require but brief mention.

The execution of the mortgage by Ingeborg G. Emmons is denied; also the assignment of the note and mortgage from Upton to Alexander. An examination of the evidence transmitted to this court leaves no doubt in our minds that the mortgage was executed by her, and that it was assigned to Alexander by Upton, as alleged in the complaint. The execution of the mortgage is satisfactorily shown by the testimony of one of the persons who witnessed its execution, and by the certificate of the notary public attached thereto, certifying to the acknowledgment of its execution by the mortgagors before such notary public. The transfer of the note and mortgage to Alexander is established by the introduction in evidence of the original written assignment executed by Upton and duly acknowledged by him before a notary public, which acknowledgment is certified to by the notary public over his official signature and seal. Objection was made to the admission of this instrument on the ground that it is incompetent, and that no foundation was laid for its introduction. The particular ground of objection is that, the instrument having been executed and acknowledged in New Hampshire before a notary public of that state, it is necessary to have attached thereto the certificate of some other officer of that state of higher official rank, certifying to the official character and signature of such notary public, before the same can be held to be an acknowledged instrument, within the meaning of the statutes of this state. The objection is not well taken. Sections 3573, 3575, 3576, Rev. Codes, authorize the proof or acknowledgment of instruments to be made before a notary public, within this or any other state or foreign country. The authentication of the certificate of acknowledgment taken by a notary public is prescribed by § 3586, Rev. Codes, which provides that the certificate shall be authenticated by the signature and official seal of the officer. Aside from these express statutory provisions, it is a well-settled rule of law that "courts take judicial notice of the seal of a notary public, and it proves itself prima facie by its appearance upon the certificate." Green v. Gross, 12 Neb. 117, 10 N. W. 459, and cases cited on page 124, 12 Neb., and page 461, 10 N. W.; Hoadley v. Stephens, 4 Neb. 431; Galley v. Galley, 14 Neb. 174, 15 N. W. 318; Southerin v. Mendum, 5 N. H. 420. The assignment was accordingly acknowledged, within the meaning of § 5696, Rev. Codes, and, under the authority of said section, was entitled to be read in evidence without further proof. No further facts are in dispute. The questions which remain for consideration relate to the alleged invalidity of the foreclosure proceedings, and the legal effect of the foreclosure, if valid, upon the rights of the heirs of Ingeborg Emmons, deceased.

It was urged at the trial in the district court that the entire foreclosure proceedings were void, and that the sheriff's deed issued to Alexander pursuant thereto, and the deed of the latter to plaintiff, conveyed no title, for the reason that "the publication of the notice of mortgage sale is insufficient to comply with the statutes in this, to wit, that the publications occurred on May 7, 1896, May 14, 1896, May 21, 1896, May 28, 1896, June 4, 1896, and June 11, 1896, and the sale took place on June 13, 1896, being a period of only thirty-seven days." The foregoing quotation from the language of the order of the trial judge correctly states the facts as to the publication of the notice and date of sale, and gives the sole ground relied upon by the trial court in rendering the judgment appealed from. The case was decided before our decision was announced in the case of McDonald v. Nordyke Marmion Co. 9 N. D. 290, 83 N. W. 6, wherein for the first time a construction was placed upon § 5848, Rev. Codes, which governed the publication of the notice of mortgage sale now under consideration. In that case the statute now in force, namely § 5848, was distinguished from the antecedent provisions found in § 5414, Comp. Laws, under which Finlayson v. Peterson, 5 N. D. 587, 33 L. R. A. 532, 67 N. W. 953, was decided and was construed to only require a publication of the notice of sale six times, once in each week for six successive weeks, prior to the date of sale, instead of a period of forty-two days, as under the former enactment. In McDonald v. Nordyke Marmon Co. 9 N. D. 290, 83 N. W. 6, we said: "Under the present law, the notice is required to be published before the sale 'six times, once in each week, for six successive weeks.' When this is done, there need be made no perplexing computations of days or weeks." No reasons are advanced by counsel for respondents, and none have occurred to us, for questioning the entire soundness of that construction. It follows, therefore, that the trial court was in error in holding the foreclosure proceedings invalid. The notice was published in strict conformity to the statute governing such publication.

It is also earnestly urged by respondents' counsel that, notwithstanding the regularity and validity of the foreclosure proceedings, they are ineffectual as against minors and heirs of the mortgagors, because it is a foreclosure by advertisement, and they are not parties to the record, and that it does not, therefore, cut off their right to redeem. This contention is based upon the theory that the power of sale contained in the mortgage authorizing the mortgagee, his heirs and assigns, to sell the land described in the mortgage, pursuant to the statute regulating the manner of exercising the right so conferred, was merely a naked power, one not coupled with an interest, and that it was therefore revoked by the death of Ingeborg Emmons, one of the mortgagors, and that, therefore, as to the heirs of said Ingeborg Emmons, the foreclosure is without effect. A large array of cases is presented by counsel as supporting this position. All but two of them relate to foreclosure by action wherein necessary parties were omitted. It is, of course, well settled that such persons are not cut off by such a foreclosure and upon elementary principles. None of these cases have reference to the effect of a statutory foreclosure under a power of sale, and are not in point. Johnson v. Johnson, 27 S. C. 309, 3 S. E. 606, and Wilkins v. McGehee, 86 Ga. 764, 13 S. E. 84, however, squarely hold that a power of sale in a real-estate mortgage cannot be exercised after the death of the mortgagor, and that a sale made thereafter does not cut off the rights of the heirs at law of the mortgagor. The express ground of these decisions is that the power of sale in those states is not a power coupled with an interest, and is therefore revoked and rendered incapable of execution by the death of the mortgagor. In holding that the power of sale was not coupled with an interest, and so expired at the death of the mortgagor, it would appear that the courts in the cases just cited were largely controlled by the fact that in those states there was "no statute recognizing or declaring the effect or providing a method for the execution of the power. It could be executed only as any other power of attorney in the name of the principal." But, however that may be, the almost unanimous voice of authority is the other way. 2 Perry, Tr. § 602A, states that "it is a universal rule that a power coupled with an interest is irrevocable, and, as a power of sale inserted in a mortgage, . . . is a power coupled with an interest, it cannot be revoked by any act of the grantor or donor of the power. Not even the death or insanity of the grantor or donor will annul the power or suspend its exercise. The debt remains, the right or lien on the property remains, and the power is coupled with them." The doctrine just stated, that neither death nor disability will suspend or terminate the power, is supported by the following cases: Conners v. Holland, 113 Mass. 50; Varnum v. Meserve, 8 Allen, 158; Hudgins v. Morrow, 47 Ark. 515, 2 S. W. 104; Beatie v. Butler, 21 Mo. 313, 64 Am. Dec. 234; Jones v. Tainter, 15 Minn. 512, Gil. 423; Encking v. Simmons, 28 Wis. 272; Meyer v. Kuechler, 10 Mo. App. 371; Van Meter v. Darrah, 115 Mo. 153, 22 S. W. 30; Berry v. Skinner, 30 Md. 567. In support of the doctrine that the power of sale is a beneficial power coupled with an interest, see Jencks v. Alexander, 11 Paige, 624; Wilson v. Troup, 2 Cow. 195, 14 Am. Dec. 458; Anderson v. Austin, 34 Barb. 319; King v. Duntz, 11 Barb. 191; George v. Arthur, 2 Hun. 406; Cole v. Moffitt, 20 Barb. 18. In this jurisdiction the doctrine of these cases has been recognized, and to some extent embodied, in the following sections of the statute: Section 4710 declares that the power of sale in a mortgage is a trust; and § 3419 declares that it is a part of the security, and vests in the person entitled to the security. Section 3403 distinguishes it from a simple power of attorney to convey real property in the name of the owner. Section 4350, which provides that the power of an agent shall be terminated by revocation, death, or incapacity, expressly excepts powers coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency. Section 5844 provides that "every mortgage of real property containing a power of sale may, upon default being made in the conditions of such mortgage, be foreclosed by advertisement," etc. That no limitation is in fact placed upon the exercise of the power is also made plain by § 5857, which directs that the surplus, if any, at the sale shall be paid to the mortgagor, his representatives or assigns, which plainly contemplates a sale after the death of the mortgagor. These several sections are identical in language with §§ 4354, 2829, 2813, 4007, 5424, 5411, Comp. Laws, which were construed by the supreme court of South Dakota in a learned and exhaustive opinion written by Kellam, J., in Reilly v. Phillips, 4 S. D. 604, 57 N. W. 780, which was a case involving the precise questions under consideration and upon facts almost identical. In that case the widow and heirs of a deceased mortgagor made the same claim that is set up by these defendants. That court, after a careful investigation, reached the conclusion that "both under our statute or without it the power of sale is one so coupled with an interest that it survives the death of the grantor." We fully agree with this conclusion, and approve the following language as directly applicable and controlling in this case: "She [the deceased mortgagor] could leave no more to her heirs than she herself had at the time of her death. Their rights must be measured by hers. They took her place, and might only do with respect to the property what she might do. The rights of the heirs having accrued subsequent to the mortgage, they are subordinate to it,—not only to the lien of the mortgage, but to the power of sale which it conveyed as a part of the security. . . . By the statute of our state no notice of sale is required to be served upon anybody. General notice to all interested is given by publication. There are no parties to the proceeding, as in an action for foreclosure; and yet the proceeding, where authorized by a power of sale in the mortgage, was, without question, intended to take the place of a foreclosure by action, and to have the effect of an old foreclosure in equity. The statute having made no provision for service of notice of the sale either upon heirs or others interested in the mortgaged property, such service, if made, would be entirely voluntary on the part of the mortgagee, and could add nothing to the legal effect of the sale. This court cannot add to the statute another provision requiring that express notice shall be given to minor heirs or their guardian in order to make the foreclosure sale effective against them. If, as the law stands, a foreclosure would be good with such actual notice, it is good without it."

It follows from what we have already said that the foreclosure in question was regular and valid, and that the defendants, having failed to redeem within the time allowed by law, have no right, title, or interest in said premises, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment confirming his title to said real estate, and enjoining said defendants from asserting any claim or demand thereto, and giving possession thereof to the plaintiff. The district court is accordingly directed to enter an order vacating its judgment heretofore entered, and to direct the entry of a judgment in plaintiff's favor for the relief to which he is entitled, as above stated.

Counsel for respondents, in his oral argument, and also in his brief filed in this court, requested that, in the event of an adverse decision, the case be sent back to the district court for a new trial. Section 5630, Rev. Codes, under which this case was tried and the appeal taken, among other things provides that this court may, "if it deem such a course necessary to the accomplishment of justice, order a new trial of the action." Just how broad a discretion is intended to be given by the language quoted is a matter of much doubt. But it is clear that the power so conferred should not be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, but only upon substantial grounds. Such grounds do not exist in this case. It is true the respondents did not introduce any evidence in the district court, for the reason, as appears, that the court held with the views of respondents' counsel, which were presented at the close of plaintiff's case, namely, that the notice of sale was insufficient, and the foreclosure proceedings void. The opportunity existed, however, for presenting testimony, if respondents so desired. There is not in this case even the suggestion of a possibility of establishing facts which would alter the conclusions we have already announced. Under such circumstances, it certainly would not be in furtherance of justice to grant the request, and the same is denied.

Judgment is reversed, and the District Court will enter judgment as heretofore directed.

All concur.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Ann J. SANDS'S ADMINISTRATOR et al., App'ts.,
v.

John H. DURHAM.

(98 Va. 392.)

A partner who, not being in arrears to the firm upon dissolution of the partnership and exhaustion of the social assets, pays judgments subsequently recovered against it on partnership debts, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of creditors whose judgments he has satisfied against the real estate of his copartner in the hands of a subsequent purchaser, to the extent to which his payments exceed his proportional

NOTE.—Right of partner who pays firm debt to subrogation against copartner.

 - c. Death of partner.

Where a debt for which all the partners are equally liable is paid during the continuance of the partnership by one of the partners the right of subrogation does not exist in his favor, according to the weight of authority,—at least until the partnership account has been settled and a balance shown to be due him.

Thus, where one partner has paid a firm debt part of the liability as shown by a settlement of the partnership account.

(June 28, 1900.)

A PPEAL by the representatives of Ann J. Sands, deceased, from a decree of the Circuit Court for Giles County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce subrogation to the rights of creditors of a co-partnership against the property of one of the partners, in favor of another partner who had paid more than his share of the claims against the estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Wysor & Gardner for appellants.

Messrs. W. J. Henson and S. W. Williams, for appellee:

Copis v. Middleton, Turn. & R. 229, holds he is not entitled to be subrogated against his copartner until an accounting has been had between them. Fessler v. Hickernell, 82 Pa. 150.

And where money is borrowed from a bank by a firm for use in the firm business, and a part is so used by one partner and the balance loaned or misapplied by the other partner, and the bank obtains a judgment which it collects from the former partner, he cannot be substituted to the rights of the bank in the judgment until there has been an accounting by him for the profits of the firm business, his proper remedy being by action for account render, or by a bill in equity for an accounting. Baily v. Brownfield, 20 Pa. 41. The court says in this case that it is not the law that a partner who pays a partnership debt may be substituted to the rights of the creditor as against his copartner; and that, where money is borrowed for use in the firm business, it becomes a partnership fund, and, no matter how the partners stand on the security given to the lender, they are accountable to each other as partners, and the relation of principal and surety can have no place between them.

And where the separate real estate of one partner is sold to pay a judgment for a firm debt, a subsequent individual judgment creditor of such partner is not entitled to be substituted as plaintiff in such judgment so as to enable him to proceed against the other partner without showing that the latter was indebted to the partner whose realty was sold, as he is not entitled to any greater rights than such partner himself would have; and the latter's only remedy would be by an action of account render against his copartner, in which case the partnership accounts would have to be brought into view and stated and settled by auditors appointed for the purpose, and, unless it appeared on the settlement that there was an indebtedness to the partner whose land was sold from his copartner, there would be no right to contribution. Sterling v. Brightbill, 5 Watts, 229, 30 Am. Dec. 304.

And where three of four partners execute a note to raise money for use in the firm business, and the fourth indorses it, and a judgment for its amount is obtained against the makers and a separate judgment therefor against the indorser, and the latter has the former judgment transferred to a third person who knows of the relations of the judgment debtors between themselves, and the indorser himself pays the amount of the judgment, both judgments are thereby satisfied, as one partner cannot, after a firm obligation is paid, keep it alive against his copartners, either in his own name or that that a payment by one jointly bound with another, even if it is by a surety jointly bound with his principal, extinguishes the obligation, and that there can be no subrogation.

By the Virginia court of appeals, in Powell v. White, 11 Leigh, 309, the doctrine of Copis v. Middleton was thoroughly examined and repudiated.

See also Wheatley v. Calhoun, 12 Leigh, 205, 37 Am. Dec. 654.

The doctrine of Powell v. White, known as the Virginia doctrine, was sustained by the United States circuit and Supreme Court in Lidderdale v. Robinson, 2 Brock. 160, Fed. Cas. No. 8,337, and 12 Wheat. 594, 6 L. ed. 740, and has ever since been followed in Virginia.

The following cases hold that the remedy may be by way of subrogation:

Sells v. Hubbell, 2 Johns. Ch. 394; Dahl-

of a third person, unless, perhaps, under special circumstances to the extent of the sum which may be found due to him from his copartners on an accounting with them. Booth v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 74 N. Y. 228, Affirming 11 Hun, 258.

A firm creditor who receives from one partner less than the full amount of the debt in compromise cannot authorize the partner paying the same to keep the debt against the firm alive and enforce it by action in such creditor's name against the other partner. Le Page v. McCrea, 1 Wend. 164, 19 Am. Dec. 469.

After the satisfaction of a judgment for a firm debt by one of the partners sued, who takes an assignment of the judgment from the creditor, he cannot, on the doctrine of subrogation, charge under such judgment the bill of the other partner. Hinton v. Odenheimer, 57 N. C. (4 Jones, Eq.) 408. The court says in this case that partners are not entitled to the equities accorded to sureties; that they all stand alike to the creditor, being all principal debtors and equally liable primarily for the debt, both in law and in equity; and that there is no reason why payment of the firm debt by one partner should be considered in equity as anything but payment simply, or why a judgment for it should be kept on foot to enable one of the partners to charge the other, much less to charge the bill of the other.

Where one partner purchases outstanding notes or accounts of the firm it operates as a payment ordinarily, and gives him no right against his copartners except to demand an accounting and contribution. Coleman v. Coleman, 78 Ind. 844. The court says in this case that under supposable circumstances it may be that a partner who had taken assignments of the firm obligations to himself would be permitted to keep them alive and enforce them against his copartners for their contributory share of the sums paid by him for the purpose of giving him the benefit of securities incident to the debt when necessary to justice between the partners without injury to any creditor, but that under no circumstances should he be permitted to enforce such obligations for more than the amount paid by him in taking them up.

And where a firm indorses a note, and one member pays the note with his own money, taking back the note and holding it until the dissolution of the firm, he cannot then transfer the note so as to make the firm liable on its indorsement, as it was legally extinguished by his payment thereof; and the fact that the debt to secure which the note was given had been paid by him out of his own funds gave him no lien gren v. Duncan, 7 Smedes & M. 280; Booth v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 74 N. Y. 228.

If subrogation is refused on the ground that payment by a coprincipal is an extinguishment of the debt, and leaves no right of subrogation, it would overrule the following Virginia cases:

Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. (Va.) 428; Wheatley v. Calhoun, 12 Leigh, 264, 37 Am. Dec. 654; Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 537; Sheldon, Subrogation, § 169; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 234.

As to our proper proportion of these judgments we are principal, and as to our co-partner's proportion we are sureties.

Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 319; Clevinger v. Miller, 27 Gratt. 740; 1 Collyer, Partn. 170.

Subrogation is enforced in favor of sureties and others who are required to pay in order to protect their own interest.

or claim on the note, but only made the firm liable to him for the amount paid, to be adjusted in the settlement of the partnership account. Dana v. Conant, 80 Vt. 240.

But Klipp v. McChesney, 66 Ill. 460, holds that one member of a firm may purchase from the payee a note given by the firm, giving his individual money therefor, and, although he cannot enforce it at law in his own name, it is a difficulty attending the remedy only, and not the right, and a third person to whom he indorses it may maintain an action thereon against the firm.

Where a firm of druggists purchase the stock of another druggist for which they give their individual notes secured by a mortgage on their entire stock of drugs, including those thus purchased, and also a mortgage on certain realty of one of the partners, and the other partner, after paying part of the purchase price, sells his interest to a third person describing the amount so paid as a firm debt, and the incoming and continuing partners agree between themselves that any payment on such debt by the former is to be refunded from the business from time to time or on final settlement, and such incoming partner pays the balance of the debt, he will not be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee so as to be entitled to foreclose the mortgage against the land of the other partner, although at the dissolution of the firm a larger amount is coming to him on the settlement, as by his agreement to treat payments by him as a firm debt the right to such subrogation, if it ever existed, was obliterated. Evans v. Rhea, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 224, 14 S. W. 82. The right of subrogation was also disallowed in this case in the Kentucky superior court (9 Ky. L. Rep. 326), on the ground that the incoming partner was seeking to subject the mortgaged property to a sum equal to half the debt paid to the mortgagee, instead of to half the debt itself.

One member of a firm who is to receive a specified share of the profits for his services, the other partner agreeing to furnish the land, building, and capital for carrying on the business, cannot be subrogated to the claims of certain preferred creditors of the firm whom he pays out of his individual means as against other firm creditors, but all he can claim is the right to be paid out of the firm property or its proceeds in preference to the individual creditors of the other partner. Gordon v. His Creditors, 6 Rob. (La.) 328.

One partner who pays firm debts with his individual means does not, in Missouri, the law of which state makes a partnership debt joint and Gatewood v. Gatewood, 75 Va. 415; Clevinger v. Miller, 27 Gratt. 740; Pace v. Pace, 95 Va. 792, 44 L. R. A. 459, 30 S. E. 361.

Cardwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1886, John H. Durham, D. L. Whittaker, and D. A. Early formed a partnership for conducting a mercantile business in Giles county, under the style and firm name of D. L. Whittaker & Co. Whittaker furnished the capital of a stock of goods amounting to $3,000, which he was to get back out of the concern, and they were to be equal partners, dividing equally the profits and losses. The firm, after doing an unsuccessful business, dissolved in October, 1897, by selling out their stock of goods to one G. L. Bane. Judgments had been obtained against the firm, which were unpaid, and there were also many outstanding claims not in judgseveral, become subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts he pays, so as to come into competition with other firm creditors, but has merely the right to bring such payments into his accounts; and after the payment of other firm debts the amounts so paid by him will go to his credit on a settlement as between the partners. Lyons v. Murray, 95 Mo. 23, 8 S. W. 170.

Ex parte Reid, 2 Rose, Bankr. 84, as digested in 2 Mews' Digest, col. 567, holds that where joint creditors of a firm resort to the separate estate of the ostensible partner, thereby exonerating the joint estate so as to produce a surplus of it, the separate creditors of the ostensible partner have a lien on such surplus to the extent to which the separate estate of such partner had been thus diminished, as against the dormant partner or his creditors. See also Conrad v. Buck, 21 W. Va. 396; Re Swayne, 1 Clark (Pa.) 457, infra, II. a.

In Re Foot, 8 Ben. 228, Fed. Cas. No. 4,906, one partner indorsed the firm paper and pledged his individual property as security to obtain money for the firm. Such partner and the firm subsequently became bankrupt, and the separate creditors of such partner claimed that he, as surety for the firm, became subrogated to the claims of the holders of the notes, and entitled to prove their amount against the joint estate which would inure to the benefit of the creditors of the separate estate. The court stated that if such partner, as surety, became subrogated to the rights of the holders of the notes, and entitled to prove their amount, the rule which precludes a partner from proving his individual debt in competition with joint creditors would defeat his separate estate from deriving any benefit through his claim, but held that where the holders of the notes had obtained payment by a sale of the securities pledged after the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings the separate creditors would be substituted to the rights of the holders to enforce payment from the joint estate in bankruptcy, and were entitled to receive any surplus arising from the sale, and to obtain from the joint fund a sum equal to the dividend on the note.

Where one partner mortgages his individual property to secure a firm debt which is also secured by a mortgage on the firm property, he stands as surety for the firm debt, and on paying any part of the same is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee to that extent, and his creditors are entitled to the same rights of subrogation, the partnership property being the primary fund, and the private property the collateral pledged to pay the debt. National Bank v. Cushing, 53 Vt. 321.

ment against the firm. The accounts, notes, etc., were turned over to J. H. Durham for collection. He collected all he could, and applied the collections to the firm debts, and the residue of the judgments against the firm he paid out of his own means. These judgments were duly docketed on the lien docket of Giles county court, and were not marked satisfied. Durham brought this suit in October, 1895, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, and not only to have contribution from his partners, Whitaker and Early, but to be subrogated to the lien of the judgments which he had paid out of his private means to the extent his partners might fall in arrears to him on settlement, and to subject the lands owned by Early at the time of the rendition and docketing of the judgments against the firm to the extent that Early might be indebted to him on the settlement. Early and wife having on the 5th of March, 1890, sold and conveyed to Mrs. Ann J. Sands three small tracts of land in Giles county, five eighths of which belonged to Early, and the remaining three eighths to his wife, complainant claimed the right by subrogation to subject the five-eighths interest in those lands, formerly owned by Early, to the payment of one half of the judgments against the firm discharged by complainant out of his private means, amounting to $4,574.87; the other partner, Whitaker, being insolvent.

The circuit court decreed that Durham was entitled by subrogation to the rights of the judgment creditors whose judgments he had paid off, and subjected, not only the property owned by Early at the time of his death, but the five-eighths interest in the land which he had conveyed to Mrs. Sands in

And where one partner gives a mortgage on his separate property as collateral security for a firm debt he becomes a surety for the firm, and if his separate estate is first applied in payment of such debt he or his separate creditors will be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee as against the partnership funds. Averill v. Louckse, 6 Barb. 470.

And where two members of a firm purchase land in trust for the firm, giving their notes and mortgage back to secure the purchase money, the firm agreeing to pay the same as it falls due, and one of such partners pays the mortgage to save the firm property, he will be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee so as to be entitled to interest on the money so paid. McMillan v. James, 105 Ill. 194.

And in Stebbins v. Willard, 53 Vt. 666, the court says that the principle is too well settled to need the citation of authorities that one partner may pay a mortgage debt and keep the mortgage on foot until reimbursed the moiety paid for the other partner.

Where two of three partners give their bond for a firm debt on which they afterwards confess judgment, they become individually responsible and the partnership nature of the debt is discharged; and if the third partner thereafter pays the judgment having it indorsed for his use the partners against whom the judgment was rendered cannot resist its collection in favor of the third partner on the ground that he was liable for the judgment jointly with them, and that his payment satisfied the judgment. Sydam v. Cannon, 1 Houst. (Del.) 431.

In O'Bryan v. Neel, 84 Ga. 184, 10 S. E. 598, three partners borrowed in their individual names money to be used in the firm business, the lender refusing to make the loan to the firm. One of the partners paid an execution issued on a judgment rendered against the members of the firm taking an assignment of the judgment and execution. The court held that such partner, or his transferee, was subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditor as against subsequent judgment creditors of the firm or the other partners, under Ga. Code, § 3599, providing that when judgments have been obtained against several persons, and one or more of them has paid more than his just proportion of the same, he or they may, by having such payment entered upon the fieri facias issued to enforce the judgment, have full power to use and control the fieri facias, as securities in fieri facias control the same against principal or cosureties, and shall not be compelled, as heretofore, to sue the debtors for the excess of payment on such judgment. The reason given by the court for its holding is that the debt was not in reality a partnership debt, saying that the fact that the money borrowed was used in the firm business made no difference, as the individual members of the firm borrowed the money in their individual names.

II. After dissolution.

a. In general.

While there is a conflict in the authorities as to the right of subrogation where a partner pays a firm debt after dissolution of the firm, the decided weight of authority is in favor of such right.

Thus, SANDS v. DURHAM holds that where a partnership has been dissolved, and the social assets exhausted, and judgments subsequently recovered against the members of the firm on firm debts have been paid by one of the partners, who is not in arrears to the firm, out of his individual means as shown by a settlement of the partnership accounts, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose judgments he has satisfied, against the real estate of his copartner in the hands of a subsequent purchaser, to the extent to which his payments exceeded his proportional part of the liability.

And Rowlett v. Grieve's Syndica, 8 Mart. (La.) 483, 13 Am. Dec. 296, holds that one partner, who has, at the expiration of the partnership, paid all the firm debts, is subrogated to the rights of the firm creditors on the joint property.

And in Re Smith, 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 113, Fed. Cas. No. 12,991, the court said that there was no reason why a partner who had become surety for a copartner, and had paid a joint debt out of his individual means after final settlement of the firm affairs, should not be subrogated to the rights of the creditor of both as against the individual estate of the other partner for his proportion of the joint debt; but held that such right of substitution could not arise where the debt was a social debt, and was paid with social assets, at least as against the creditors of either partner, although a balance which had not been judicially ascertained was due from one partner to the other, and the latter had gone into bankruptcy.

Where a third person pays a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage on partnership property for the benefit and on the procurement of one of the partners, although after the dissolution of the partnership, he is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee for the purpose of procuring payment from the other partner of half the amount so paid, as he occupies the same position which the partner himself would have occupied if he had paid the mortgage. Stebbins v. Willard, 53 Vt. 665.

March, 1890, to the payment of one half of the judgments paid by Durham. From this decree the administrator and heirs of Mrs. Sands, who had died, obtained an appeal to this court.

It is well settled that one partner who has paid out of his own means debts of a partnership of which he is a member may, upon a settlement of the partnership accounts, have contribution from the other partners of their due proportion of the debts so paid. It is also well settled that, where one in the situation of surety pays the debt of him who is primarily liable, equity will put him in the place of the creditor whose debt he has discharged, and give him the benefit of the securities which the creditor has obtained from the principal debtor, and, though no assignment is actually made, equity treats it as having been done. Grubbs v. Wysors, 32 Gratt. 129.

Where, after dissolution of a partnership, one of the partners executed notes to the other to be negotiated for money by sale and transfer for the benefit of the firm, and the latter, without negotiating the notes, paid, out of his own means, firm debts in a large amount, so that, after allowing the amount of the notes, there would still be a balance coming to him from the other partner, he will be regarded as occupying the attitude of an assignee of such notes in case they have been assigned, and will not be enjoined from collecting a judgment recovered by him thereon. Tibbetts v. Magruder, 9 Dana, 79.

Where one partner accepts for his individual benefit a draft in the firm name on which a judgment is obtained against the firm after its dissolution, the other partner, on paying such judgment and receiving a subrogation from the creditor to all his rights thereunder, has the right to recover back from the former partner the entire amount of the judgment. Hall v. Gaennie, 18 La. 442.

Where partners made an assignment for creditors to pay the firm creditors in full, and to pay one half of any surplus to one of the partners, his executors and assigns, and the other half to certain assignees of the other partner to be appropriated to a certain debt due from the latter, and the former partner on the same day made an assignment for creditors and the joint creditors claimed and received a dividend on the funds of the assignee under the latter assignment, and there was a surplus thereby created in the hands of the assignees under the firm assignment after payment of firm creditors in full, the assignees who paid such dividend were subrogated to the rights of the firm creditors as to such surplus to the amount of the dividends paid, so as to be entitled to preference to that amount over the creditor of the other partner to whom his share of the surplus was to be paid. Re Swayne, 1 Clark (Pa.) 457.

But where one partner makes an assignment to trustees for the benefit of creditors, which operates as a dissolution of the firm, and the trustees thereafter, at the request of the partner in charge of settling the firm affairs, pays out of his own funds a note against the firm in order to prevent suit, but which he is under no obligation to pay, he is not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the original holder of the note as against any of the partners except 64 L. R. A.

Subrogation is the equity by which a person who is secondarily liable for a debt, and has paid the same, is put in the place of the creditor, so as to entitle him to make use of all the securities and remedies possessed by the creditor, in order to enforce the right of exoneration as against the principal debtor in the same rank with himself. To entitle a party to subrogation, his equity must be strong and his case clear. It is an equity called into existence for the purpose of enabling a party secondarily liable, but who has paid the debt, to reap the benefit of any securities which the creditor may hold against the principal debtor, and by the use of which the party paying may then be made whole. Bispham, Eq. 393. But says this learned author (p. 396): "The principle of subrogation is a general one, and will apply to every instance (except in the case of a mere stranger) where one man has paid a the one requesting him to make the payment, but becomes a simple contract creditor as to such other partners. Conrad v. Buck, 21 W. Va. 396.

Where a judgment was obtained against two partners as such, and after the dissolution of the firm one of them tendered the amount of the judgment and asked that it be marked to his use, the court held that the remedy of a judgment debtor was by contribution instead of subrogation, and that the Pennsylvania statutes as to settlement after dissolution did not affect the case; and also said that the courts had not generally compelled the plaintiff to mark a judgment for the use of another. Pearce v. Yost, 1 W. N. C. 472.

Where at the time a bill for the dissolution of a firm was filed by one partner the other was individually liable for the goods purchased for the firm, and the receiver required the former to give his notes with security to the receiver for one half the value of such goods for the use of the merchants who sold them, and such partner thereafter conveyed his interest in the firm property, after which the receiver recovered judgment on the notes and levied on and sold his interest in the firm property notwithstanding such conveyance, the other partner purchasing at the sale, the latter will not be subrogated to the rights of the sellers so as to be entitled to maintain a suit to set aside the conveyance, as he occupies the position of an ordinary vendee as to such purchase and not in any sense that of a surety, there being nothing to show that the protection of his interest required or even induced the purchase. Richmond v. Marston, 15 Ind. 134.

Where one partner conveyed his interest in the firm property to the other partner subject to firm debts, and a judgment for an individual indebtedness was soon after recovered against the former, and the conveyance was thereafter declared fraudulent and his interest in the firm property subjected to payment of such judgment, after which the other partner entered into a partnership with two other persons, and the new firm paid off a mortgage and other indebtedness of the old firm, and made extensive repairs, the new firm, which agreed to pay the debts of the old firm, or at least the new members, are not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee and the other creditors whose debts were paid, so as to deprive the judgment creditor of his right to sell, on execution, the interest of the partner against whom he obtained the judgment, as there is no subrogation where one pays his own debts, and that was all that was done in paying the mortgage debt for which another is primarily liable. The right will not, however, exist between parties who are equally bound; as, for example, copartners, co-obligors, and cocontractors, except, of course, by virtue of a special contract. Such special contract may exist, for example, where an outgoing partner takes a covenant from the remaining members of the firm to pay the partnership debts and save him harmless. He stands, under these circumstances, in the position of a surety; and may be subrogated to the remedies of the creditor, if the covenant be not fulfilled."

A partner who retires from the firm, and for a valuable consideration is indemnified by the remaining partners against all debts and liabilities of the firm, will in equity be considered a surety for them, and subrogated to the rights of the creditor to whom he has been compelled to pay a firm debt. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 237. Among the authorities cited in support of this text is the case of Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164.

In that case G., B. & K. were principal obligors in a bond. B. and K. put money in the hands of G. to pay the bond, and he bound himself to pay it, but failed to do so, and became insolvent. A judgment was recovered on the bond against the three, and B. paid it. After the judgment G. conveyed his land to S. to secure a debt due to him and another debt due to C. Upon a bill by B. and K. against S. and C. to subject the land conveyed in the deed to S. to satisfy the debt B. had paid, the court held that it was competent for G., B. & K. to contract that, as between themselves, G. should be the principal, and B. and K. his sureties, and other debts of the old firm. Dill v. Voss, 94 Ind. 500.

b. Debts assumed by one or more partners.

Where one or more partners assume on the dissolution of the firm the payment of specified firm debts or all such debts, the other partners occupy the position of sureties as to them, and on paying the debts are entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts are paid.

Thus, where one of the partners sells his interest in the firm to the other partners, who assume and agree to pay the firm debts, he becomes a surety as to the other partners, and on payment of any of the debts he becomes entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors. Frow J. & Co.'s Estate, 73 Pa. 459. The court also holds that where the old firm had given a note on which the retiring partner was liable, which the holders retained on taking a new note from the continuing partners, and the retiring partner was required, because of his original liability, to indorse a new note given by some of the members of the new firm, he was, on paying the same, entitled to stand in the room of the original creditors, and to a cession of the note of the old firm.

And a partner who goes out and for a valuable consideration is indemnified by his copartners against all debts and liabilities of the firm stands in the attitude of a stranger, as against a creditor of one of the partners, for his individual debt whose judgment has been obtained since he retired, and is entitled to subrogation for a debt of the firm paid by him for which he was not liable as between himself and his copartners at the time he retired. Scott's Appeal, 88 Pa. 173.

And where one partner on the dissolution of the firm assumes for a consideration to pay the firm debts, the other partners are, as between themselves, sureties for him, and those who are thus sureties may advance the money to a creditor obtaining a judgment against all the partners, and have such judgment assigned to a third party to be kept alive for their security, and such transaction will not operate as a satisfaction of the judgment. Chandler v. Higgins, 109 Ill. 602.

And where one partner purchases the other's interest in the firm business, agreeing to pay all the firm debts and liabilities, he becomes the principal and the other partner a surety as between themselves; and the latter is entitled, on paying any debt, to the benefit of all securities in the hands of the creditor, and such creditor cannot object to his right to such securities.

and such partner is released to the extent that the creditor, by his acts, releases the securities which he would otherwise have against his copartner. Johnson v. Young, 20 W. Va. 614.

And where one of the partners on the dissolution of the firm promises to pay a debt due from the firm but fails to do so, and the other partner induces his brother to purchase the claim and take an assignment of it, the debt is not thereby extinguished, and recovery may be had thereon for the benefit of such assignee. Etna Ins. Co. v. Wires, 28 Vt. 93. The court also said that the partner to whom the promise was made became a mere surety for the debt as between the partners, and that it was no want of good faith in him to procure his brother to buy the claim with the latter's own money, and that the cases read by counsel showed that if the money used in the purchase had belonged to the partner himself he might still keep the claim on foot, being a virtual surety, but that it was not necessary to discuss that point.

And where a partnership is dissolved, one partner purchasing the firm assets and agreeing to assume all the firm liabilities, and giving a lien on the firm effects to indemnify the other partner on such agreement and also to secure the purchase money, and both partners subsequently become insolvent, the creditors of the partner whose debts are indemnified against may be subrogated to the rights of the partner indemnified. Buck Stove Co. v. Johnson, 7 Lea, 282.

And where, on the dissolution of a firm, one partner agrees to pay a firm note, and gives a mortgage to the payee as security to him for the indebtedness and also as indemnity to the other partner, the latter, on paying the note or any part of it, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the payee to the extent of such payment. Conwell v. McCowan, 81 Ill. 285. On a prior appeal, 53 Ill. 363, relief by way of subrogation was refused to such partner because it did not appear that he had paid any part of the firm debt, nothing being said as to any partnership relation existing between the parties, the statement being merely that he was surety on the note.

And where on the dissolution of a firm one partner receives from the firm money with which to discharge a firm liability whereby he becomes a trustee, and he, in violation of the trust, uses such money for the purchase of land and the erection of buildings thereon for his own use, which he subsequently transfers to his wife, she receiving the same with notice of the facts, and the other partners are subsequently compelled to pay such firm debt, they are subrogated and that this had been done; that as between B., K., and G. the former were entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the judgment creditor upon the land; and that they were equally entitled as against purchasers from G., who did not show a better equity. The opinion of the court recognizes that partners ordinarily are not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the firm's creditor holding a security for a debt of the firm paid by one of the partners out of his own means, and puts its adjudication in that case whereby B. and K. were subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditor, whose judgment they paid, solely upon the ground that B. and K. and G. had contracted that, as between themselves, G. should be the principal, and B. and K. his sureties, in the debt; for the opinion says: "As between the partners and the creditor, they were all equally bound, and no understanding and agreement as between themselves could change that relation so as to impair his right. But there was nothing in that relation which would prevent the parties, as between themselves, from assuming the relation of principal and securities."

The ground upon which some of the adjudicated cases hold that a partner of a losing concern, paying a debt of a lien creditor of the firm, cannot have subrogation to the rights of the creditor, is that payment by a coprincipal extinguishes the debt, and leaves no right of subrogation. It is more accurately stated by Strong, J., in the well-considered case of McCormick v. Irwin, 35 Pa. 111, thus: "The reason why subrogation is not allowed to one partner as against his copartner, or to one merely a joint to the rights of the creditor to follow the trust fund, both as against the partner and his wife, to whom the property was transferred. Robinson v. Roos, 138 Ill. 550, 28 N. E. 821, Affirming 37 Ill. App. 646.

And where, on a final settlement between the partners, it is agreed between them that one of them shall pay specified debts, and he fails to pay them, and judgments are recovered thereon against both partners which the other partner pays, he occupies, as to the former partner, the position of a surety, and is subrogated to all the rights of the creditors in such judgments, so as to be entitled thereunder to maintain an action against such former partner to set aside a conveyance by him as fraudulent. Swan v. Smith, 57 Miss. 548.

And where, at the dissolution of a firm, one partner assumes all the business, profits, and responsibilities, and agrees to indemnify the other partner against all debts due from the firm, and the latter partner is required to pay a judgment which had been obtained against them, the judgment creditor agreeing that he shall have the benefit of the judgment and use his name to recover the money from the continuing partner, he is to be considered merely as a surety of such continuing partner, and entitled to an equitable lien on his property which was bound by the judgment as against the assignees for the benefit of creditors of the latter. Waddington v. Vredenburg, 2 Johns. Cas. 228.

And where partners enter into an agreement for the settlement of their affairs by which one of them is to pay one of two judgments of equal amount, or procure a release of his copartner from liability thereon, and it is agreed that if he fails to do so the other partner may pay both judgments, and shall in that case have the right to collect from such copartner the amount of one of such judgments, and the second partner is compelled to pay both judgments, he is entitled to use one of them to compel his partner to pay the amount of it, both under the agreement and by virtue of his relation as surety, as, although originally partners, such second partner becomes practically a surety for the other by such agreement. Brown v. Black, 96 Pa. 482.

And where mill property owned by two partners is subject to a mortgage which, as between them, it is the duty of one of them to pay, and he executes a mortgage on a farm received in exchange for the mill property to replace the mortgage thereon, which the mortgagee at first refuses to accept, but afterwards recognizes as an accepted security, taking from the other partner his individual mortgage and assigning the mortgage on the farm to him, an equity arises 54 L. R. A.

in his favor entitling him to ask indemnity through such mortgage. Laylin v. Knox, 41 Mich. 40, 1 N. W. 913.

And where two partners give to the third the money to pay a joint and several single bill of the partners given for a firm debt which he agrees and binds himself to pay but fails to do, and one of the other partners pays a judgment obtained on such bill, the latter is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditor as against the partner making such promise and purchasers from him after the rendition of the judgment, as by his agreement to pay the debt he becomes, as between the partners, the principal, and his copartners are sureties only; and, although the judgment is in fact extinguished by the payment, it is kept alive in the contemplation of equity for the benefit of the surety. Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164.

And where one of two partners agrees with the other to pay for oxen purchased by the firm by giving his note, and the seller refuses to accept such note as payment, and the other partner pays him, it being agreed between them that the seller should retain the note and pay over to the partner paying him anything he may receive from the other partner on such note, and the former partner subsequently pays the latter partner a certain per cent of his indebtedness to him, obtaining a discharge from all further liability, and thereafter makes a payment on the note, the amount so paid belongs to such other partner, as, on paying the debt represented by such note, he becomes entitled by subrogation to all the securities, and avails of securities, which the creditor has or afterwards receives on the debt. Field v. Hamilton, 45 Vt. 35.

And where one of two partners gives collateral security to a surety on a debt due from the firm, and afterwards purchases the interest of the other partner, agreeing to assume such debt and all other firm debts, the latter partner, although continuing to occupy the position of a principal as to such surety and the creditor, becomes a surety as to his copartner; and where a judgment for the debt is levied on and paid from his individual property he becomes entitled, as a cosurety of the original surety, to the collaterals held by him, or a sufficient amount to indemnify him for such payment as against a subsequent judgment creditor of the continuing partner. Butler v. Birkey, 13 Ohio St. 514.

But Griffin v. Orman, 9 Fla. 22, holds that where two partners sell the firm property to a third partner, agreeing that it shall be his exclusive property, and he agrees to pay all the firm debts, giving his bond with security that debtor as against his codebtor, is because, as between them, there is no obligation to pay the debt resting upon one superior to that which rests upon the other." See also Dering v. Winchelsea, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 318, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 1, p. 148, and Sheldon, Subrogation, §§ 170, 171.

Counsel for appellee contends that the rule is changed by the statute (Code, § 2855) passed in 1849, whereby partnership debts are now joint and several; and also cites Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 293, in support of the further contention that, because the partnership debts are now joint and several, one partner who pays off the creditor's debt with his own private means is entitled to be subrogated to the creditor's right. That case only held that a surviving partner, having paid the partnership debts of a losing concern, is entitled to be substituted, for the amount that the estate of the deceased is indebted to him on that account, to the rights of the creditors of the firm whose debts he has paid; that is, the surviving partner paying the debts is entitled to share in the separate estate of the deceased partner. But this, as was said by Sheldon in his work on Subrogation (§ 171, supra), is upon the ground that by virtue of the partnership agreement to contribute to losses the partner paying a firm debt out of his private property may in equity enforce contribution from his copartner, rather than by way of subrogation. In other words, the doctrine of subrogation does not ordinarily apply as between copartners, though the right exists to have contribution from each other, where one has paid out of his private means a debt of the firm, which is not repaid to him out of the

he will do so, and a judgment for a firm debt is recovered against the two retiring partners alone, which they pay, they cannot, on the doctrine of subrogation or substitution, use executions on such judgment to subject the property so sold to the third partner in payment thereof, as the doctrine of subrogation does not apply, and the judgment debtors are not, as to creditors, sureties for the third partner, and the creditors themselves could not subject such property so sold in good faith to the payment of the firm debts until they had exhausted their remedies at law against the partnership.

Where, on the dissolution of a firm, one partner took the stock of goods, agreeing to pay their cost price to the other, who was to take the book accounts and notes and assume the firm indebtedness, and who assigned to one becoming surety for him certain property, including the debt due from the former partner for the stock of goods, and joint judgments were obtained against the partners and the surety by firm creditors which the surety paid, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors as against the former partner who had paid no part of the price of the stock of goods, although his copartner had obtained judgment therefor against him, and by virtue of such rights could impeach a fraudulent transfer of his property made by such former partner. Highland v. Highland, 5 W. Va. 68.

c. Death of partner.

Where the firm has been dissolved by the death of one of its members and either the surviving partner or the estate of the deceased partner has paid more than its share of the firm debts, the one so paying is entitled, according to the weight of authority, to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor for the purpose of recovering the excess so paid.

Thus, where partners give their joint and several obligations for a firm debt and the survivor pays such obligation, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor against the estate of the deceased partner for his proportionate share of the debt thus paid. Morris v. Morris, 4 Gratt. 293.

And where judgments are recovered against surviving partners and the administrators of a deceased partner, and one of the surviving partners pays the judgments in full to protect his own property from sale, the administrator paying no part of the same and procuring a final settlement of his accounts to prevent the filing of claims against the estate, such payment did not extinguish the judgments, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1215, providing that any one of several judgment defendants having paid and satisfied the plaintiff shall have the remedy against the codefendants or cosureties to collect of them the ratable proportions each is equitably bound to pay given by § 1214, which provides that when any defendant surety in a judgment shall be compelled to pay any judgment or any part thereof, or shall make any payment which is applied upon such judgment by reason of the suretyship, the judgment shall not be discharged by such payment, but shall remain in force for the use of the surety, and after the plaintiff is paid so much of the judgment as remains unsatisfied may be prosecuted to execution for his use. Harter v. Songer, 188 Ind. 161, 87 N. E. 595.

Where judgments against a firm, one of the members of which is dead, are satisfied out of the decedent's estate, his representatives are entitled to have the creditor assign the judgments, and to recover thereon against the surviving partner one half the amount of such judgments. Sells v. Hubbell, 2 Johns. Ch. 394. The court says in this case that it would be a thing almost of course for equity to allow the representatives of a deceased partner, who had to pay the whole debt, to be substituted in place of the creditor, in order to recover from the surviving partner or his estate a moiety of what they had paid, and that nothing could stay the proceeding for that purpose but an allegation of the surviving partner that he was the creditor partner, and that the estate of the deceased partner owed him a balance as much as or more than it had been obliged to pay, which would render the taking of an account necessary.

And in Dahlgren v. Duncan, 7 Smedes & M. 280, the court said that if the firm creditors proceed against the estate of a deceased partner, and it pays more than its proportionate share of the firm debts, his representative will stand in the place of such creditors, and be substituted to their rights in reference to the other partners.

And where one partner gives his individual bond and mortgage for a firm debt, which debt is paid after such partner's death from his individual property, his estate is subrogated to the rights of such creditor in the partnership assets, and should be allowed interest on such payments from such assets instead of from the funds of the surviving partner. Gee v. Humphries, 40 S. C. 253, 27 S. E. 101. McIver, Ch. J., and Pope, J., dissented in this case, holding that the estate of the deceased partner was not entitled to interest at all, and in any event only on the amount of the excess received by the deceased partner after deducting from the latter amount the amount of the debt so paid out of his estate.

social assets. To entitle a partner, paying out of his private means debts against the firm, to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts he has so paid, the relations ordinarily existing between copartners must have been changed by an agreement between them whereby they assumed the relation of principal and surety. Buchanan v. Clark and other authorities, supra. There was no such agreement in the case at bar, and appellee was therefore not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditors whose judgments against the firm of D. L. Whittaker & Co. he paid.

Much stress is laid by counsel for appellee upon the constructive notice to Mrs. Sands of the rendition and docketing of these judgments, and the actual notice she is claimed to have had when she bought the land from Early; but leaving out of view the testimony going to show that she was misled by the statements made by appellee to her agent, Hall, who purchased the land for her, and conceding that she had both constructive and actual notice of the judgments at the time of the purchase, it does not alter the case; for she may have actually known of the existence of the judgments on the docket, yet she also knew that they were judgments against the partnership of D. L. Whittaker & Co., that each member of the firm was primarily bound for their payment, and that appellee was solvent. The only risk she ran in taking a conveyance of Early's portion of the land from Early and wife was that the judgments would not be paid by the firm or either of the partners, and could not be made out of either of them. They, however, having been paid by appellant, without a special contract or agreement changing the relations ordinarily existing between copartners, whereby he became surety for the other partners, are no longer enforceable on the lands alienated by Early to Mrs. Sands. Therefore the decree appealed from, in so far as it holds the contrary, is erroneous, and will be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for such further proceedings therein as may appear proper, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Riely, J., absent.

A petition for rehearing, having been granted, Whittle, J., on March 14, 1901, handed down the following additional opinion:

An opinion was handed down in this case in June, 1900, but, this court not being satisfied with the conclusion then reached, a rehearing was granted.

Where the widow of a deceased partner, by whose will the partnership was to be continued, paid off certain notes given by the firm and secured by mortgage with the understanding among all the parties that she should be subrogated to that extent to the rights of the mortgagee, and some two years thereafter she joined with the surviving partner in executing a surety deed to a creditor of the firm to whom the mortgage had been assigned, reciting that the deed was given subject to such mortgage, and stating the amount due on the mortgage, which did not include the amount so paid by her, nothing being said as to her rights by subrogation, and there being a covenant that the premises included in the deed were free and clear of all encumbrances except such mortgage, the right of subrogation, if it ever existed, is thereby waived as against the grantee in such security deed. Ferris v. Van Ingen, 110 Ga. 102, 85 S. E. 347.

Where different judgments for the same firm debt are recovered against the surviving partner and the administratrix of the deceased partner, the administratrix cannot, on paying the judgment, take an assignment of it to herself for the purpose of having execution thereon against the survivor, as under the Alabama statute authorizing suit to be brought against the representatives of a deceased partner the firm debts are a several charge on the survivor and administratrix, although the survivor is primarily liable, and the satisfaction of the judgment against either is the extinguishment of the right against both. Bartlett v. McRae, 4 Ala. 688.

And where a judgment on a firm debt is recovered against the surviving partners, and the amount of it is afterwards paid to the judgment plaintiff by a third person with funds furnished by one of the survivors and the executor of the deceased partner, an assignment of the judgment which is made to such third person for the purpose of keeping the judgment alive and enforcing it against the other survivor is without effect, as the payment from those who were liable to pay satisfied the judgment in full, and it could not be kept alive for the benefit of those paying it, as, if a judgment is paid by one who is a principal and as such bound to pay it he cannot, by taking an assignment of it in his own name or that of another, keep it alive to enforce payment from his coprincipal. Hogan v. Reynolds, 21 Ala. 56, 56 Am. Dec. 236. No question seems to have been made in this case but that the judgment was satisfied to the extent that the surviving partner's money was used in paying therefor.

And in Singiser's Appeal, 28 Pa. 524, the court held that the administrator of a deceased partner could not claim a pro rata dividend from the assignee for creditors of the survivor for one half the amount of firm debts paid by such administrator where the accounts and equities of the parties had not been adjusted, and said that the doctrine of subrogation did not apply in the case of joint debtors or partners, and that the administrator was not a surety.

III. Conclusion.

Where one partner during the existence of the partnership pays a firm debt on which all of the partners are equally liable no right of subrogation exists in his favor according to the weight of authority,—at least until it is shown by a partnership accounting that a balance is due him. But when the partnership has been dissolved by death of one partner or otherwise, and the partnership accounts have been settled, and one partner, or the estate of a deceased partner, thereafter pays a firm debt, the right of subrogation exists, according to the weight of authority. And if one partner has agreed to pay a particular debt or all the firm debts, the partners occupy the position of principal and surety as between themselves, and if the other partner thereafter pays such debt or debts the right of subrogation exists in his favor.

J. H. H.

There is but this single question presented for decision: Where a partnership has been dissolved, and the social assets exhausted, and judgments subsequently recovered against the members of the firm on partnership debts have been paid by one of the partners, who is not in arrears to the firm, out of his individual means, and this is shown by a settlement of the partnership accounts, is the partner who has paid the judgments entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose judgments he has satisfied against the real estate of his copartner, in the hands of a subsequent purchaser, to the extent to which his payments exceed his proportional part of the liability?

The doctrine of subrogation is independent of any mere contractual relations existing between the parties to be affected by it, and involves the equitable principle that where one who is secondarily liable has paid the debt of another, who is primarily liable therefor, he will, in equity, be substituted to all the rights and remedies of the creditor against the party whose share of the joint liability he has been compelled to discharge. Sheldon, in his work on Subrogation, states the doctrine thus: "The usual rule is that one of several joint debtors will, as against his codebtors, ordinarily be subrogated to the securities and means of payment of the common creditor whom he has satisfied, so as to enable him to recover from his codebtors, by means thereof, their proportional shares of the indebtedness which he has discharged; and this, as in other cases of subrogation, arises rather from natural justice than from contract. Each joint debtor is regarded as a principal debtor for that part of the debt which he ought to pay, and as a surety for his codebtors as to that part of the debt which ought to be discharged by them." Sheldon, Subrogation, § 169, citing Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh, 54; Boyd v. Boyd, 3 Gratt. 113.

Subrogation has been denominated as one of the benevolences of the law, created, fostered, and enforced in the interest and for the promotion of justice.

In England, and in a few of the states of the Union which have adopted the English rule, the application of the doctrine is very much restricted. Indeed, prior to an act of Parliament (Stat. 19 & 20 Vict. chap. 97), the courts had held that even a surety who satisfied a judgment against himself and his principal was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor, and to have the judgment kept alive for his benefit (Copis v. Middleton, Turn. & R. 229; Hodgson v. Shaw, 3 Myl. & K. 190); but, by the act of Parliament aforesaid, the doctrine was extended to sureties.

With the exception of the courts of Alabama, Vermont, and North Carolina, the English rule has not been followed in this country.

In most of the other states it has been extended until, in its practical application, it has been deemed broad enough to cover every instance in which one party has been required to pay a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and good conscience ought to be discharged by the latter.

In no other jurisdiction has the doctrine been more firmly adhered to, or more liberally expounded and applied, to meet the exigencies of particular cases, than in Virginia.

In Powell v. White, 11 Leigh, 309, this court expressly repudiated the doctrine of Copis v. Middleton, Turn. & T. 229, and Jones v. Davids, 4 Russ. Ch. 277. In a review of these cases found in a note to Dering v. Winchelsea, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 1, p. 140, it was remarked: "In the more recent case of Powell v. White, 11 Leigh, 309, the decisions in Copis v. Middleton and Jones v. Davids were thoroughly examined in the court of appeals, and the Virginia practice was vindicated against the authority of Lord Eldon, with distinguished and convincing ability."

This court said in Enders v. Brune, 4 Rand. (Va.) 447: "It has nothing of form, nothing of technicality, about it; and he who, in administering it, would 'stick in the letter,' forgets the end of its creation, and perverts the spirit which gave it birth. It is the creature of equity, and real, essential justice is its object."

In Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. (Va.) 428, it was enforced in behalf of the principal debtor against a codebtor, where the former had paid more than his proportion of the debt, by substituting him to the rights of the creditor whose vendor's lien he had discharged; the court holding that, as between themselves, each was a principal debtor for his one half of the debt, and the one paying more than one half was surety as to the excess paid by him.

In Wheatley v. Calhoun, 12 Leigh, 264, 37 Am. Dec. 654, the parties were partners. The original debt was a joint obligation, but not a partnership debt. Subsequently the firm made its notes therefor, and secured them by a lien on the property for which the debt was created. Afterwards one of the partners paid the entire debt, and he was subrogated to the lien of the creditor whose debt he had satisfied.

In Gatewood v. Gatewood, 75 Va. 415, it was declared that subrogation would be enforced in favor of sureties and others who are required to pay in order to protect their own interest.

In Dobyns v. Rawley, 76 Va. 537, the consideration of real estate sold and conveyed by Fulton to Rawley and Davis jointly was $5,000, for the payment of which they executed their joint bonds. In a subsequent division of the land between the purchasers, Rawley's parcel was rated at $3,000, and Davis's at $2,400, and in this proportion they were to discharge their joint indebtedness to Fulton. It was held that the legal effect of the arrangement was that, as between the two purchasers and in relation to each other, they were principal debtors for their respective portions of the purchase money, and each was surety for the other's portion, and that, if either paid more than his agreed share, he became entitled to all the rights and remedies of a surety—to subrogation among the rest—against the other for repayment of such excess.

This principle was recognized in Horton v. Bond, 28 Gratt. 825, as the true ground for substitution to enforce contribution among cosureties. It was there said: "Sureties are not only sureties for the principal debtor for the whole debt, but, as among themselves, they are each surety for the other to the extent of the excess of the whole debt beyond his proportionate part thereof."

In Pace v. Pace, 95 Va. 792, 44 L. R. A. 459, 30 S. E. 361, it was held that the liabilities of a decedent's estate and the rights of his creditors are fixed by his death. If at that time a creditor has the right to prove a debt against a decedent's estate for which the decedent and another are bound as sureties, and subsequently the cosurety pays the debt, he is substituted to the right of the creditor, and may prove the whole debt against the estate of the decedent, and receive dividends thereon until one half of the debt is paid, although the estate of the decedent will not pay his debts in full.

Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164, is relied on as sustaining the contention that subrogation does not obtain among partners. The facts of that case are as follows: K., B., and G., who had formed a partnership for the purchase and sale of cattle, executed a joint bond to C. Cattle were sold, and G. was supplied with money arising from the sales, for the purpose of paying the bond to C. and all other partnership debts. It was agreed that G. should be the principal, and K. and B. sureties only, for said debts. The bond was not paid, and C. recovered judgment thereon against K., B., and G. G. was insolvent, and K. and B. satisfied the judgment. Subsequently to the recovery of said judgment, G. sold certain real estate, and K. and B. filed a bill in equity against G. and his alienees, setting forth the foregoing facts, and praying that they might be subrogated to the rights of C. under the judgment. The court held that it was competent for K., B., and G. to contract that, as between themselves, G. should be principal and K. and B. his sureties; that, as between themselves, K. and B. were entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the judgment creditor; and that they were equally entitled against the purchases from G., who did not show a better equity. The court said: "I do not think, therefore, that there is anything in the objection that the debt when contracted was a partnership debt, and that with respect to the creditor it retained its original character. As between themselves, they occupied the relation of principal and sureties."

It will be observed the court was dealing with a case of "convention subrogation," and confined its decision to the case in hand, without intimation as to whether the general doctrine of subrogation would or would not obtain among partners.

lied on to show that the doctrine does not apply to partners, and that author does say, at § 337: "The right . . . will not, however, exist between parties who are equally bound,—as, for example, copartners, co-obligors, and co-contractors,—except, of course, by virtue of special contract."

His statement is general, is not confined to copartners, but embraces all cocontractors; and, as has been seen from the authorities reviewed, it is not, without qualification, a correct exposition of the Virginia doctrine. Of course, so long as such parties remain equally bound, the right does not attach, but they cease to be equally bound when one obligor discharges an obligation resting upon himself and his co-obligor. Both are bound to the obligee; but, inter se, each is primarily, not equally, liable for his own share, and secondarily liable for the share of the other, and when he pays the share of such other all the conditions essential for the application of the doctrine arise.

In Baily v. Brownfield, 20 Pa. 41, cited to sustain the text, there is an obiter to the effect that a partner who has paid a partnership debt cannot be substituted to the creditors' rights. But in that case there had been no settlement of partnership accounts, and there was nothing to show that the partner asserting the right of subrogation had paid more than his share. It was therefore properly denied.

In the later case of Fessler v. Hickernell, 82 Pa. 150, subrogation was denied one partner against another, for the reason that until there had been a settlement of partnership accounts there was no means of ascertaining whether any, and, if any, what, balance was due to the partner demanding subrogation. But the right of a partner, who had been shown by a settlement of partnership accounts to have paid more than his share, was conceded in that case.

In the still more recent case of Ackerman's Appeal, 106 Pa. 1, subrogation was allowed between principal debtors, the court holding that they were principals so far as their creditor was concerned, but each was surety as to the share of the other.

Thus it appears that the Pennsylvania cases do not sustain the general proposition laid down by Bispham, but are in accord with the decisions of this court.

In Sells v. Hubbell, 2 Johns. Ch. 394, Chancellor Kent said: "The debt of Sells was the debt of the copartnership of Bedient & Hubbell. It was the common equal debt of both partners, and the consideration for which it was created is presumed to have inured equally to the benefit of both, and the contribution ought to be equal. The estate of each partner ought to be charged with the debt in equal portions, provided their interests in the copartnership were equal, and their accounts as between each other were equal. This is the intentment, in the first instance, and it would be a thing almost of course for equity to allow the representatives of a deceased partner, who had to pay the whole debt, to be substituted in the place of the creditor, in order to recover, from the surviving partner or his estate, a moiety of what they had paid. Nothing could stay this proceeding but the allegation of the surviving partner that he was the creditor partner, and that the estate of the deceased partner owed him a balance as much or more than it had been obliged to pay. This would render it necessary to take and state an account between the partners before this court could interfere in any way to enforce the claim for contribution."

In the case under consideration, the partnership had been dissolved, the social assets had been exhausted in the payment of partnership debts, and a settlement of the partnership accounts had been made, from which it appeared that the appellee, J. H. Durham, was in advance to the firm, and with his individual means had paid the judgments against it. Under these circumstances, the circuit court was of opinion and decreed that appellee was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditors whose liens he had discharged, and to subject the real estate owned by his co-partner, D. A. Early, at the date of the recovery and docketing of said judgments, to their satisfaction.

This court is of opinion there is no error in said decree, and that it ought to be affirmed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

S. O. SWACKHAMER, Respt.,

v.

Joseph JOHNSON et al., and

Lee Tung YIN, Appt.

(.....Or.....)

One who hires a gang of workmen and furnishes them to a third person, together with a time keeper, who is to impart to them the latter's orders as to the time and place to work, will not be liable for trespasses committed by them in cutting timber upon a stranger's land under direction of such third person, although he is to pay the wages and has power to discharge the men, where he is ignorant of the trespass, is not interested in the work except as security for his advances, and has no voice in directing the laborers when or where to work.

A PPEAL by defendant Lee Tung Yin from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Union County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin a trespass upon real estate and to recover damages for injuries thereby. Reversed.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This is a suit to enjoin a trespass upon real property and to recover damages for injuries thereto. The facts are that the defendant Joseph Johnson, having conceived the project of building a railroad from Union, Oregon, to Bear, Idaho, and being without means to execute his proposed scheme, certain citizens of Union, on June 8, 1898, to promote that city's growth, entered into a contract with him whereby they agreed to donate a right of way for said railroad through the corporate limits of Union, 6 acres of land therein for depot facilities, and the sum of $3,500 upon the construction of the first 10 miles of railway. The plaintiff agreed with said citizens to donate the depot grounds required by them, but, Johnson having demanded a greater area than specified, the plaintiff on August 13, 1898, in consideration of the sum of $217, paid for Johnson by said citizens, and Johnson's agreement to pay the further sum of $283, executed a deed to him for 12 acres of land in said city, which he deposited with the First National Bank of Union, to be delivered upon the payment of the remainder of the purchase price, if the first 10 miles of said railway were completed within six months. The land so selected for depot purposes and right of way therefrom across plaintiff's premises was covered with valuable timber, which afforded security to his stock as a wind break for their protection against the inclemency of the weather. Johnson on October 5, 1898, entered into a contract with Lee Ching Duck and Lee Tung Yin, partners as the Wing Chin Lung Company, and Ung Cuey, whereby they agreed to furnish him forty Chinese laborers to work upon said railroad for $1.10 each per day, except a bookman or foreman, for whose service they were to be paid the sum of $1.25 per day, the contract providing that the laborers so to be furnished "shall perform work faithfully, and at such times and places upon said line of railway as they may be directed by and under the supervision of the party of the first part (Johnson) and his superintendent or engineer." After this contract was consummated, but before any laborers were furnished, Johnson, to secure Lee Tung Yin, assigned the subsidy agreement and conveyed all his interest in the depot grounds to him, and so notified the citizens' committee, the First National Bank of Union, and the plaintiff; but the latter refused to yield his consent thereto. The laborers were sent to Union in charge of a bookman or foreman selected by the Wing Chin Lung Company, where, in pursuance of Johnson's orders, and without the knowledge of the parties sending them or of the plaintiff, they cut down most of the timber growing upon the land set apart for depot purposes and on the right of way leading therefrom across the plaintiff's premises. The first 10 miles of said railroad were never constructed, and, the project having been abandoned by Johnson, who left the country without paying the Wing Chin Lung Company any part of the expense of about $3,000 incurred on account of the laborers so furnished, plaintiff commenced this suit, but, having served a summons upon Lee Tung Yin only, and the other defendants not having appeared, a trial was had, resulting in a decree perpetually enjoining any further trespass upon plaintiff's premises, and awarding him the sum of $750 as damages, from which Lee Tung Yin appeals.

As to which of two or more persons is the master of another who is conceded to be the servant of one of them, see Hardy v. Shelden Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 37 L. R. A. 38, and Channon v. Sanford Co. (Conn.) 41 L. R. A. 200.

Mr. W. T. Muir for appellant.

Mr. T. H. Crawford for respondent.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is argued by appellant's counsel that the plaintiff consented to the cutting of the timber, and hence, invoking the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, that the decree is erroneous. But the court found that no agreement had ever been entered into by the plaintiff with Johnson, or any other person, for a right of way for said proposed railroad, nor had any license been granted by him whereby said timber might be cut, and, as the preponderance of the testimony, in our judgment, supports such finding, it will not be disturbed. The timber having been cut by the Chinese laborers without any license therefor, the question to be considered is whether Lee Tung Yin was at that time their master, and therefore liable for the damage which they caused, for the principle of respondeat superior is founded upon the maxim, Qui facit per alium, facit per se, and, unless such relation existed at the time the trespass was committed, the appellant is not liable therefor. Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 68 Am. Dec. 345; Blake v. Ferris, 5 N. Y. 48, 55 Am. Dec. 304. It was alleged in the original answer that the laborers who cut said timber were at that time in the employ of the Wing Chin Lung Company and Johnson, but that they were acting under the orders of the latter. In the amended answer it is averred that Lee Tung Yin had no knowledge of the employment in which the laborers, or any of them, were to be engaged, except that they were to be employed in railroad construction; and that all the acts complained of were done by said laborers under the exclusive control and direction of Johnson, and without the knowledge, consent, control, or direction of Lee Tung Yin. The original answer was offered in evidence, and testimony introduced tending to show that by securing an assignment of the subsidy contract and of Johnson's interest in the depot grounds, Lee Tung Yin undertook to build the first 10 miles of railroad, and that the laborers who cut the timber were his servants. Yin, as a witness in his own behalf, testified that the original answer was prepared by his counsel, and that he subscribed his name thereto, and verified the pleading without observing the allegation that he was interested with Johnson in building the railroad. The testimony of C. E. Cochran, called by the plaintiff in rebuttal, would seem to imply that Yin was interested with Johnson in the enterprise; but this witness had theretofore said that he did not understand that Yin was building the road, but that Johnson was constructing it, and that the former had taken an assignment of the subsidy contract and a conveyance of the depot rights in order to secure the payment of the money which it would be necessary to advance to the laborers. We think the evidence clearly shows that Yin never agreed to build any part of the railroad, and that he took said assignment and conveyance as security to indemnify him for the expense which his firm was obliged to incur. "The characteristics of the position of a master," say Roberts & Wallace, in their work on the Duty and Liability of Employers, 3d ed. 82, "are the following: (1) The engaging of the servant; (2) the payment of wages; (3) the power of dismissal; (4) the control of the servant's actions." In commenting upon the fourth distinguishing test of relationship, these authors say: "The power of controlling the servant's actions is undoubtedly the most important element for consideration in determining whether the relationship of master and servant exists between any two persons, and it is the only one which, by itself, can be at all depended upon; the chief value of the three tests above mentioned consisting in the assistance they afford in discovering the person who has this power, for the true principle of a master's liability to the public for the acts of his servants is that the master has control over their actions in their capacity as such, and that it is his duty so to exercise his control that no injury is occasioned by his business infringing upon the rights of third persons." 1d. 68. To the same effect, see Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 3d ed. § 73; 2 Thomp. Neg. 909; Wood, Mast. & S. 2d ed. § 817; Mound City Paint & Color Co. v. Conlon, 92 Mo. 221, 4 S. W. 922. The Wing Chin Lung Company and Ung Cuey engaged the Chinese laborers, selected as their bookman or foreman one Young John, who communicated and interpreted Johnson's orders to the laborers, kept their time, and was to pay them for their labor from money to be furnished by the Wing Chin Lung Company and Ung Cuey. These laborers were undoubtedly the servants of the parties agreeing to furnish them, but such relationship would not preclude them from becoming Johnson's servants; for, as was said by Mr. Justice Morton in Coughlan v. Cambridge, 166 Mass. 268, 44 N. E. 218: "It is well settled that one who is the general servant of another may be lent or hired by his master to another for some special service, so as to become, as to that service, the servant of such third party. The test is whether, in the particular service which he is engaged to perform, he continues liable to the direction and control of his master, or becomes subject to that of the party to whom he is lent or hired." It will be remembered that the laborers to be furnished by Wing Chin Lung Company were to work faithfully, and at such times and places upon the line of railway as they might be directed by Johnson's orders. The court found that Lee Tung Yin had supervision of said laborers, and employed and discharged them. The record fails to show who was authorized to discharge these laborers, but, as the Wing Chin Lung Company engaged them, it may reasonably be inferred that they might dispense with their services; and it may also be inferred that Johnson could discharge such of them as did not correspond with the terms of the agreement in respect to their being able-bodied and willing to work as directed. The supervision of the laborers by Lee Tung Yin, as found by the court, is probably predicated upon the selection of a bookman or foreman by the Wing Chin Lung Company, and from the following clause contained in their contract with Johnson, to wit: "And it is further agreed by the said party of the first part [Johnson] that payments for the work to be done and performed under this agreement shall be made on the 15th day of each month next succeeding the month in which such labor is performed, and that the said party of the first part will supply one of the parties of the second part, or an agent to be selected by the parties of the second part, free of cost of the parties of the second part, with transportation to and from Portland and Union and to the points where said laborers may be employed from time to time, so as to enable the said parties of the second part to oversee said laborers, supervise, and pay them off." Young John, "the bookman or foreman" selected by the Wing Chin Lung Company, as a witness for the defendant testified that he received orders from Johnson, communicated them to the Chinese laborers, who performed work as so directed, and that he kept their time, so as to know what sums to pay them for their labor. We think it cannot be said, from the service rendered by Young John, that Lee Tung Yin thereby "had supervision of the said laborers;" for, while the person so selected is denominated a "foreman," it is evident that he was employed as a "bookman" to keep a record of the labor performed by the Chinese, and that he was powerless to direct the time, place, or manner of service to be performed by them. Nor do we think it is reasonably inferable from the clause of the contract so quoted that Lee Tung Yin "had supervision of the said laborers;" for, Johnson having stipulated that on the 15th of each month he would supply one of the parties agreeing to furnish the laborers, or their agent, free transportation from Portland and Union to the place where said laborers might be employed, from time to time, so as to enable such person to oversee the laborers, supervise, and pay them off, it is evident that no authority was reserved to direct the laborers where to work, or to prescribe the time or manner of their service. It is also manifest, we think, that Young John was not the person contemplated by the parties as the representative of the Wing Chin Lung Company "to oversee said laborers:" for the transportation of the former was stipulated for in another clause of the contract, to the effect that Johnson would pay one half of the fare of the first quota of laborers, including the "bookman," from Portland to Union. This deduction seems to be established by the fact that it was stipulated by the parties that the "bookman" would remain with the laborers during the time they worked for Johnson, while the agent who was to represent the Wing Chin Lung Company was expected to visit Union, or the place where the laborers were working, on the 15th of each month only; and hence we conclude that Lee Tung Yin did not have the supervision of the said laborers, but that, as far as he was able, he had surrendered the control thereof to Johnson, whose orders, as interpreted by Young John, they were bound to and did obey. The decision we have reached in respect to the control of the laborers narrows the inquiry to whether Lee Tung Yin, who was in no manner interested in the construction of the railroad, and had no knowledge of the trespass prior to its commission, and never thereafter ratified it, is liable therefor because the servants engaged by his firm, and to which they looked for their compensation, did the cutting complained of in executing the orders of the person to whom they were hired. Notwithstanding there is a decided contrariety of judicial utterance upon the subject, it may be said, by way of illustration, though not involved therein, that it has been held that a master who hires his servants to another, to whom he has surrendered the entire control, is nevertheless liable for their negligence, upon the assumption that, having the selection of the servants chosen, it is reasonable that he who made the choice of a disqualified or careless person should be responsible for any injury that may result from the negligence or want of skill of the person so employed. Hobbit v. London & N. W. R. Co. 4 Exch. 254; Stewart v. California Improv. Co. 131 Cal. 125, 52 L. R. A. 205, 63 Pac. 177. If it be admitted that the rule just adverted to is applicable in this state, it could have no bearing upon the case at bar; for the injury of which the plaintiff complains did not result from any want of care on the part of Lee Tung Yin, or of the firm of which he was a member, in the selection of the laborers hired to Johnson. In Ames v. Jordan, 71 Me. 540, 36 Am. Rep. 352, the plaintiff hired to the defendant a pair of horses and furnished a driver therefor, who was to use the team in hauling logs, and while so employed the horses were drowned. In an action to recover the damages thus sustained, it was held that, if the loss was occasioned by the negligence of the driver, no recovery could be had, but that if it resulted from the defendant's want of care in providing a safe landing place, he was liable therefor. Mr. Chief Justice Appleton, speaking for the court in deciding the case, says: "It is true, the horses and driver were under the control and management of the defendant, and he was responsible for whatever was done in pursuance of his orders. He was to see that the landing place provided for logs was a safe one, and, if not so, he was responsible therefor. The driver, in obeying his orders, is his servant, for whose acts he is liable so far as within the scope of his employment; but the results of his incompetency the plaintiff must bear, for he should have furnished a suitable servant." Johnson, having directed the laborers to cut the timber, is liable for the injury which resulted from the execution of his order, and, as Lee Tung Yin had no knowledge of the trespass prior to its commission, did not ratify it thereafter, was not interested in the construction of the railroad, and had no voice in directing the laborers how, when, or where to work, he cannot be responsible for the injury which he was powerless to prevent, and hence the decree is reversed, and the suit dismissed.

W. P. HARRIS, Resp't.

(39 Or. 148.)

The right to appropriate the water of a spring which has no natural stream flowing therefrom exists under a statute providing that all ditches constructed for the purpose of utilizing the spring waters of the state shall be governed by the same laws as ditches constructed for the purpose of utilizing the waters of running streams.

(August 5, 1901.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Malheur County in favor of defendant in a suit to enjoin the diversion of the water from a spring. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Will R. King and F. M. Saxton, for appellant:

The act of Congress of July 26, 1866 (14 U. S. Stat. at L. 252, chap. 262) together with the act of July 9, 1870 (16 U. S. Stat. at L. 218, chap. 236), expressly gives to the prior appropriator of water upon the public domain a vested right thereto, and any person afterwards acquiring title to land affected thereby takes the same subject to any vested and accrued water right.

Long, Irrigation, 1901, § 28; De Neocoea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 564, 22 Pac. 198.

This act of Congress is aided by an act of the legislative assembly of Oregon (Sess. Laws 1893, p. 150) relative to the appropriation of "waste, spring, and seepage waters."

At the time appellant made the diversion of the water from the spring in question the land on which the spring arose did not belong to the respondent, and he had no claim thereto. Respondent therefore took said lands subject to the vested and accrued water right of appellant.

Lenormand* (Ariz.) 16 Pac. 268; De Neocoea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, 22 Pac. 198; Basey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. 683, 22 L. ed. 454; Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. Even in the absence of the statutory provisions of our state, water flowing from springs may be appropriated by means of a ditch taking the water from the spring, and the owner of the land on which the spring rises may be restrained from diverting the water therefrom.

Long, Irrigation, 1901, §§ 32, 60; Gross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. 217, 58 Am. Rep. 558, 10 Pac. 409; Ely v. Ferguson, 91 Cal. 187, 27 Pac. 587; Taylor v. Abbott, 103 Cal. 421, 37 Pac. 408; Williams v. Harter, 121 Cal. 47, 53 Pac. 405; De Neocoea v. Waldron, 96 Cal. 243, 31 Pac. 54.

To constitute a valid appropriation, there must be an actual diversion of the water from its source of supply, with intent to apply it to some beneficial use, followed by an actual application of the water to the use designed, or to some other useful purpose, within a reasonable time.

Appellant is entitled to a reasonable time in which to complete his appropriation, and, when perfected, his rights relate back to the date when the first step was taken, and he is entitled to protection in his rights, under the law, during such time.

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit to restrain the diversion of and interference with the water of a certain spring in Malheur county, known as "Fox Spring." Prior to August 4, 1899, the land upon which it is situated was unoccupied public land of the United States. In November, 1898, the plaintiff cut a ditch or trench some 30 feet long through the rim or embankment inclosing the spring, through which, in April, 1899, he conducted its waters into a "kind of a trail or swale that the snow water had made through there, and run it through this channel to" his premises, a quarter to half a mile distant, to be used, and which was used, for watering stock and other purposes, the surplus evaporating or disappearing in the ground without reaching any natural watercourse. In May, 1899, he filed what he intended to be a notice of location of all the waters of the spring, but which proved insufficient for want of a definite description, and soon thereafter contracted with some workmen to enlarge and develop the spring, and lay pipe therefrom to his premises, so as to preserve all the water for use during the summer months, when it was his only natural supply. Before, however, any of this work was done, with the exception of opening out and enlarging the trench previously dug, the defendant took up the land on which the spring is situated as a homestead, and forbade plaintiff from taking or using the water therefrom. The defendant, in his answer and testimony, admits the existence of the spring, and says that at the time he entered upon the premises there was about an inch and a half of water flowing from it through an opening in the rim or embankment down to the plaintiff's premises. The court below decided in favor of the defendant, holding that the waters of the spring were not subject to appropriation, for the reason that there is no natural stream flowing therefrom, and it is not tributary to, nor does it form a part of, any natural watercourse. The argument is, in effect, that the waters of a perennial spring are not subject to appropriation unless they flow in a natural channel or form part of a watercourse. There seem to be but few cases in which the rights of the appropriator of the waters of such a spring, as against a subsequent grantee of the government, have been considered. If the water rises to the surface so as to form a stream, it may, of course, be appropriated (De Neccochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, 22 Pac. 198), even by the construction of ditches up to the spring (Ely v. Ferguson, 91 Cal. 187, 27 Pac. 587). And in Cross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. 217, 58 Am. Rep. 558, 10 Pac. 409, the right to acquire title to percolating waters by appropriation is recognized, so far, at least, as to entitle the grantee of the water right to hold the same against a subsequent grantee of the mining claim on which the water was brought to the surface. But it was subsequently held that no right can be acquired by appropriation to the waters of a spring formed by percolation. Southern P. R. Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615, 19 L. R. A. 92, 30 Pac. 783. In the latter case, however, the question was as to the sufficiency of an alleged appropriation of water on state land under the statute of California, and may, perhaps, on that ground, be distinguished from the case in hand. A decision directly in point is that of Sullivan v. Northern Spy Min. Co. 11 Utah, 438, 30 L. R. A. 186, 40 Pac. 709, in which it is held that the discoverer of a flow of percolating water on public lands may, by digging wells and improving them, and constantly using the water for beneficial purposes, acquire a right to take it from such wells as against one who, by subsequent location acquires title to the land. The principle upon which this decision is grounded is that, where one goes upon public, unoccupied land of the United States, and diverts the water thereon from its natural source, and puts it to some beneficial use, he thereby acquires a right (which has been recognized by the legislation of Congress,—U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2339, 2340) to continue such diversion and use as against a subsequent settler upon the land; and it is unimportant whether the diversion is from a natural watercourse, or a spring, or a well formed by percolation. Whatever doubt may exist elsewhere upon the question, it would seem that the right to make such an appropriation of waste, spring, or seepage water finds recognition in the legislation of this state. The act of 1893 (Sess. Laws 1893, p. 150) governing the right of priority to waste, spring, and seepage waters provides that all ditches now constructed, or hereafter to be constructed, for the purpose of utilizing the waste, spring, or seepage waters of the state, shall be governed by the same laws relating to priority of right as ditches constructed for the purpose of utilizing the waters of running streams. Under this provision there would seem to be no distinction between the right to appropriate the waters of running streams and those of springs.

The decree of the court below is therefore reversed, and one will be entered here in plaintiff's favor.

George CONN.

(39 Or. 30.)

1. The right of a riparian proprietor to use the water for irrigating purposes is not limited to the tract of land bordering on the stream, as first segregated and sold by the government, but extends to lands lying back of such tract and purchased by him from other persons.
2. Irrigation of riparian land cannot be prevented by the fact that it is divided from the stream by a natural ridge over which the water will not flow through ditches wholly on the proprietor's own land, and which will prevent its return to the stream.
3. A lower riparian proprietor cannot complain of the use by an upper proprietor of water for irrigating purposes, if the amount taken is not sufficient to materially injure him or to interfere in any substantial way with his right as a riparian proprietor.
4. Water cannot be taken from a stream to irrigate riparian land, in such quantities as to materially injure lower proprietors on the stream.

On rehearing.

5. A suit to enjoin threatened diversion of water to a certain amount for irrigating purposes, under a claim of absolute right, through a ditch already constructed, will not be dismissed merely because that amount has not been used and the complaining party has not proved actual injury.
6. Costs may be awarded against one who has constructed a ditch with the avowed purpose of diverting a certain quantity of water from a stream, in an action to enjoin him from so doing, although at the time of trial he has not done so and in fact has caused no injury to the complaining party.

stream for irrigation purposes to the injury of the rights of riparian proprietors on the stream below; the plaintiffs appealing from so much of the decree as refused to enjoin the use of the water on certain land, and defendant appealing from so much as refused to dismiss the bill and awarded costs against him. Affirmed.

Statement by Con, Ch. J.:

This is a suit to enjoin the defendant, Conn, from diverting the waters of Chewaucan river through a ditch recently constructed by him. The plaintiffs are riparian proprietors on the river, and the owners in severalty of divers tracts of arid land, aggregating several thousand acres. These lands are level, and, when irrigated, very fertile, but valueless without. The defendant is an upper riparian proprietor, owning 875 acres, through which the river flows a distance of 1½ to 2 miles, dividing on his premises into two main channels, flowing north-easterly and southeasterly, which in turn subdivide into numerous channels and sloughs, through each of which the waters of the river have been wont to flow from time immemorial. The greater portion of defendant's land is elevated from 75 to 80 feet above the river. Three hundred and twenty acres of it are contiguous to, but acquired by different conveyances from, land immediately bordering on the stream. In the fall of 1896 and spring of 1897 the defendant constructed the ditch in question for the purpose of irrigating his upland, and furnishing better power to a grist mill, situated on the river a short distance below its forks, which he had theretofore owned and operated with water conveyed through a ditch about ½ mile long, located on his own premises. The new ditch taps the river 1½ or 2 miles above his property, and has a carrying capacity of about 2,500 inches. The upland he proposes to so irrigate is somewhat lower than the bluff between it and the river, and slopes slightly away therefrom, so that it is contended that any water used thereon for irrigation cannot find its way by percolation back into the river. The object of this suit is to enjoin the defendant from using water through this ditch, on the theory that it is a wasteful and unnecessary means of supplying power to his mill, and that the land he proposes to irrigate is nonriparian. The defendant avers that all his lands are riparian, and that, as a riparian proprietor, he is entitled to 2,675 inches of water for domestic, stock, irrigating, and manufacturing purposes; that all of his land is arid, and capable of being irrigated from the river, which carries a large amount of water during the irrigating season; that the amount he proposes to take and consume therefrom is reasonably necessary for the purposes indicated, and will not be of any material injury to the plaintiffs, or any of them. The court below found that the defendant was entitled to take water through the ditch in question, but not to use it for the irrigation of lands contiguous to, but acquired by different conveyances from, land abutting directly on the stream, when such use will actually and sensibly affect the rights of the plaintiffs as riparian proprietors, and entered a decree perpetually enjoining and restraining him from diverting any of the waters of the river to irrigate such land, "to the actual and perceptible injury of the plaintiffs as riparian proprietors upon their riparian lands." From this decree both parties appeal.

Messrs. E. D. Sperry, E. M. Brattain, and Austin S. Hammond, for plaintiffs:

The waters of permanent running streams and of inland lakes are sacred to the common use, alike, of all the riparian owners upon their borders, and "even the state, by its power of eminent domain, cannot give any more extensive or exclusive rights to one proprietor under color of a public use, without making provisions for compensation to all the proprietors whose natural rights would thus be invaded."

Beam, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a controversy between riparian proprietors upon a natural watercourse. There is virtually but one question involved in the case, and that is whether the lands which the defendant seeks to irrigate are riparian in character. It is practically conceded that up to the commencement of the suit the plaintiffs had not been substantially injured or damaged on account of the use of the water by the defendant, and, as a consequence, are not entitled to an injunction if the lands are riparian; but the contention is that they are nonriparian, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction restraining the use of the water thereon without proof of damage. It is common learning that every person through whose premises a stream of water flows has a right to its use and enjoyment as it passes through his land; but, as all other proprietors have a similar right, it necessarily follows that one cannot use or divert the water to the injury of another. The right of each must be exercised in subordination to that of all the others. Within these limits, each proprietor is entitled to such use of the stream as may be conformable to the usages and wants of the community. It is often said that a riparian proprietor has a right, inseparably annexed to the soil, to have the water of a stream flow down to his land as it is wont to run, undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality; and that, if an upper proprietor takes it from the stream, he must return substantially the same quantity again before it leaves his premises. This rule, however, is subject to the limitation now well established that each proprietor is entitled to a reasonable use of the water for domestic, agricultural, and manufacturing purposes, and such use is not to be denied him on account of the loss necessarily consequent upon its proper enjoyment. In short, he has a right, in the language of Vice Chancellor Bacon in Sandwich v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 707, 712, "to make all the use he can—to derive every benefit he can—from the stream, provided he does not abstract so much as prevents other people from having equal enjoyment with himself;" or, as said by Lord Kings-down in Miner v. Gilmour, 12 Moore, P. C. C. 131, 156: "By the general law applicable to running streams, every riparian proprietor has a right to what may be called the ordinary use of the water flowing past his land; for instance, to the reasonable use of the water for his domestic purposes and for his cattle, and this without regard to the effect which such use may have, in case of a deficiency, upon proprietors lower down the stream. But, further, he has a right to the use of it for any purpose, or what may be deemed the extraordinary use of it, provided that he does not thereby interfere with the rights of other proprietors, either above or below him. Subject to this condition, he may dam up the stream for the purpose of a mill, or divert the water for the purpose of irrigation. But he has no right to interrupt the regular flow of the stream, if he thereby interferes with the lawful use of the water by other proprietors, and inflicts upon them a sensible injury." The right of a riparian proprietor to the use of the water of a stream flowing through his premises, and its limitations, are well expressed in a Maryland case, where the court says: "The right of every riparian owner to the enjoyment of a stream of running water in its natural state in flow, quantity, and quality is too well established to require the citation of authorities. It is a right incident and appurtenant to the ownership of the land itself, and, being a common right, it follows that every proprietor is bound so to use the common right as not to interfere with an equally beneficial enjoyment of it by others. This is the necessary result of the equality of right among all the proprietors of that which is common to all. As such owner, he has the right to insist that the stream shall continue to run uti currens solebat; that it shall continue to flow through his land in its usual quantity, at its natural place, and at its usual height. Without a grant, either express or implied, no proprietor has the right to obstruct, diminish, or accelerate the impelling force of a stream of running water. Of course, we are not to be understood as meaning there can be no diminution or increase of the flow whatever, for that would be to deny any valuable use of it. There may be, and there must be allowed to all of that which is common, a reasonable use; and such a use, although it may, to some extent, diminish the quantity, or affect, in a measure, the flow, of the stream, is perfectly consistent with the common right. The limits which separate the lawful from the unlawful use of a stream it may be difficult to define. It is, in fact, impossible to lay down a precise rule to cover all cases, and the question must be determined in each case, taking into consideration the size of the stream, the velocity of the current, the nature of the banks, the character of the soil and a variety of other facts. It is entirely a question of degree, the true test being whether the use is of such a character as to affect materially the equally beneficial use of the stream by others." Baltimore v. Appold, 42 Md. 442, 456. It is accordingly now quite generally held in this country and in England that, after the natural wants of all the riparian proprietors have been supplied each proprietor is entitled to a reasonable use of the water for irrigating purposes. Washb. Easements, 2d ed. *240; Gould, Waters, 3d ed. § 217; Long, Irrigation, § 11; Black's Pom. Riparian Rights, § 154; Kinney, Irrigation, § 273; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 487; Coffman v. Robbins, 8 Or. 278; Low v. Schaffer, 24 Or. 239, 33 Pac. 678; Weston v. Alden, 8 Mass. 136; Lus v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 394, 10 Pac. 674; Blanchard v. Baker, 8 Me. 253, 23 Am. Dec. 504; Benton v. Johncoo, 17 Wash. 277, 39 L. R. A. 107, 49 Pac. 495; Baker v. Brown, 55 Tex. 377; Davis v. Gatchell, 79 Am. Dec. 636, 643, note (50 Me. 602). The doctrine, as applied to the arid regions of the west, is thus stated by Mr. Justice McFarland in Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 680, 29 Pac. 326: "According to the common-law doctrine of riparian ownership as generally declared in England and in most of the American states, upon the facts in the case at bar the plaintiffs would be entitled to have the waters of Harrison cañon continue to flow to and upon their land as they were naturally accustomed to flow, without any substantial deterioration in quality or diminution in quantity. But in some of the western and southwestern states and territories, where 54 L. R. A.

the year is divided into one wet and one dry season, and irrigation is necessary to successful cultivation of the soil, the doctrine of riparian ownership has by judicial decision been modified, or, rather, enlarged, so as to include the reasonable use of natural water for irrigating the riparian land, although such use may appreciably diminish the flow down to the lower riparian proprietor. . . . Of course, there will be great difficulty in many cases to determine what is such reasonable use; and 'what is such reasonable use is a question of fact, and depends upon the circumstances appearing in each particular case.' . . . The larger the number of riparian proprietors whose rights are involved, the greater will be the difficulty of adjustment. In such a case the length of the stream, the volume of water in it, the extent of each ownership along the banks, the character of the soil owned by each contestant, the area sought to be irrigated by each,—all these and many other considerations must enter into the solution of the problem; but one principle is surely established, namely, that no proprietor can absorb all the water of the stream so as to allow none to flow down to his neighbor." For the protection of the rights of the several riparian proprietors it has even been held that a court of equity may in a proper case apportion the flow of the stream, after the natural wants of the several proprietors have been satisfied, in such a manner as may seem equitable and just under the circumstances. Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 680, 29 Pac. 326; Wiggins v. Muscupiabe Land & Water Co. 113 Cal. 182, 32 L. R. A. 667, 45 Pac. 160; Smith v. Corbit, 116 Cal. 587, 48 Pac. 725.

The plaintiffs admit the rule that, after the natural wants of all the riparian proprietors have been supplied, each is entitled to a reasonable use of the water for irrigating purposes, but insist that the exercise of the right must be limited to the tract of land through which the stream flows as first segregated and sold by the government of the United States, and that, even in such a case, where there are natural barriers within the tract which would prevent a portion of the land from deriving any benefit from the flow of the stream, the portion lying beyond the barrier should be excluded. But, as we understand the law, lands bordering on a stream are riparian, without regard to their extent. After a considerable search, we are unable to find any rule determining when part of an entire tract owned by one person ceases to be riparian. The discussions in the books are restricted to a definition of riparian proprietors and their respective rights. A riparian proprietor is one whose land is bounded by a natural stream, or through whose land it flows, and riparian rights are those which he has to the use of the water of the stream. They are derived entirely from the ownership of the land, and not from its area or the source of its title. Mr. Angell remarks: "The owners of watercourses are denominated by the civilians riparian proprietors, and the use of the same significant and convenient term is now fully introduced into the common law." Angell, Watercourses, 6th ed. § 10. Gould says: "Riparian rights proper depend upon the ownership of land contiguous to the water." Gould, Waters, 3d ed. § 148. And Kinney says that "the rights of riparian proprietors are such as grow out of, or are connected with, their ownership of the banks of the streams and rivers." Kinney Irrigation, § 57. And, again (§ 58): "Whether riparian rights attach or not, the principal question depends upon the ownership of the land which is contiguous to and touches upon the water. And as to whether the land is in actual contact with the flow of the stream, whether that contact be lateral or vertical, it is necessary that it should exist." Bouvier defines riparian proprietors as "those who own land bordering upon a watercourse." Mr. Long, in his recent work on Irrigation, in discussing this question, says: "Some questions have been raised as to what lands are to be considered riparian, within the sense of the preceding section. Literally, of course, riparian lands are lands bordering upon a stream, but it is sometimes a question as to how far back from the stream the land may be considered riparian. There is very little judicial authority on the question. It is plainly not possible to define the distance to which the riparian proprietor's right to use the water for irrigation or other purposes extends, but this will depend upon the circumstances of each case. The only general rule that can be laid down is that the distance and use should be reasonable." Long, Irrigation, § 14. It would seem, therefore, that any person owning land which abuts upon or through which a natural stream of water flows is a riparian proprietor, entitled to the rights of such, without regard to the extent of his land, or from whom or when he acquired his title. The fact that he may have procured the particular tract washed by the stream at one time and subsequently purchased land adjoining it, will not make him any the less a riparian proprietor, nor should it alone be a valid objection to his using the water on the land last acquired. The only thing necessary to entitle him to the right of a riparian proprietor is to show that the body of land owned by him borders upon a stream. This being established, the law gives to him certain rights in the water, the extent of which is limited and controlled less by the area of his land than by the volume of water and the effect of its use upon the rights of other riparian proprietors. By virtue of the ownership of land in proximity to the stream, he is entitled to a reasonable use of the water, which is defined as "any use that does not work actual, material, and substantial damage to the common right which each proprietor has, as limited and qualified by the precisely equal right of every other proprietor." Kinney, Irrigation, § 276. In the determination of what will be considered such a use in a particular case, the character and extent of the land, its location, and the time of acquiring the title may all become, and are, no doubt, important factors to be considered; but they are not controlling, and each case must depend entirely upon its own facts and circumstances. The case of Boehmer v. Big Rock Irrig. Dist. 117 Cal. 19, 48 Pac. 908, would seem to make the extent of riparian rights depend upon the source of title, rather than the fact of title; but in Alta Land & Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 645, it was expressly held that all land bordering upon a stream which is held by the same title—in that instance consisting of 1,280 acres—is riparian, and no distinction was made on account of the source of title. Again, in Wiggins v. Muscupia-be Land & Water Co. 113 Cal. 182, 32 L. R. A. 667, 45 Pac. 160, and Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442, the right of a riparian proprietor to use the waters of a stream for irrigation was limited to the watershed. But, as we understand these cases the court in each instance was determining the rights of the parties then before it, and not attempting to lay down an inflexible rule as a guide in all cases. Nothing more was held or decided than that under the claim alone of riparian rights the owner of land cannot, to the injury of another riparian proprietor, take the water beyond the watershed, or onto lands held by a title different from the title of those through which the stream flows; and this all will concede. The right to make a reasonable use of the water of a stream is a right of property, depending on the ownership of the land abutting on or through which the stream flows; and whether a given use is reasonable or not is a question of fact, to be determined under the circumstances of each particular case. The right to use the water belongs to the owner of the land, and the extent of its exercise is not to be determined by the area or contour of his land, but by its effect upon other riparian proprietors.

A reference to a few of the adjudged cases will illustrate this principle. In Norbury v. Kitchin, 9 Jur. N. S. 132, the defendant, a riparian proprietor, erected pumps and conduit pipes to conduct the water of a stream across a hill into a reservoir, to await the use of a house built by him on property he had acquired subsequently to his riparian property. It was held that the question whether his use of the stream was reasonable under all the circumstances was properly left to the jury. In one of the opinions it is said: "The defendant has built himself a house on the side of a hill, and he formed a reservoir to supply his house with water from the stream. This exercise of his right seemed somewhat strong, and the plaintiff's counsel were at one time inclined to rely upon the distance of the house from the stream, but, probably, on reflection, they found it immaterial. The real question in the case is whether a man who has 321,000 gallons of water coming down to him, can complain if 10,000 are taken before." Elliot v. Fitchburg R. Co. 10 Cush. 191, 57 Am. Dec. 85, was an action to recover damages for the diversion of water by a railroad company, an upper proprietor, for the use of its locomotives, engines, and other similar purposes. It was contended at the trial that, if the jury were satisfied of the existence of the stream and the diversion of the water by the defendant, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for nominal damage, without proof of actual damage; but the presiding judge instructed the jury that, unless plaintiff suffered actual perceptible damage in consequence of the diversion, the defendant was not liable in the action, and this direction was held to be right by the entire court. In the course of the opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Shaw says: "The right to flowing water is now well settled to be a right incident to property in the land. It is a right publici juris of such character that, whilst it is common and equal to all through whose land it runs, and no one can obstruct or divert it, yet, as one of the beneficial gifts of providence, each proprietor has a right to a just and reasonable use of it, as it passes through his land; and, so long as it is not wholly obstructed or diverted, or no larger appropriation of the water running through it is made than a just and reasonable use, it cannot be said to be wrongful or injurious to a proprietor lower down. What is such a just and reasonable use may often be a difficult question, depending on various circumstances. To take a quantity of water from a large running stream for agriculture or manufacturing purposes would cause no sensible or practicable diminution of the benefit to the prejudice of a lower proprietor; whereas taking the same quantity from a small running brook passing through many farms would be of great and manifest injury to those below, who need it for domestic supply, or watering cattle; and therefore it would be an unreasonable use of the water, and an action would lie in the latter case, and not in the former. It is, therefore, to a considerable extent, a question of degree. Still the rule is the same, that each proprietor has a right to a reasonable use of it, for his own benefit, for domestic use, and for manufacturing and agricultural purposes." In Garwood v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 83 N. Y. 400, 38 Am. Rep. 452, a riparian proprietor was allowed to maintain an action to recover damages against a railroad company for diverting the waters of a stream and conveying them by pipes to reservoirs, where its locomotives were supplied with water, the proof showing that the water so diverted was sufficient "to perceptibly reduce the volume of water" in the stream, and to "materially reduce or diminish the grinding power of plaintiff's mill," in consequence of which he sustained damage to a substantial amount. In Gillis v. Chase, 67 N. H. 161, 31 Atl. 18, it is held that a riparian owner is not liable for a reasonable use of water passing his land, whether for his own purposes or for sale to others, and the reasonableness of his use is a question of fact. In this case it is said: "Each riparian proprietor having the right to a just and reasonable use of the water as it passes through and along his land, it is only when he transcends his right by an unreasonable and unauthorized use of it that an action will lie against him by another proprietor whose common and equal right to the flow and enjoyment of the water is thereby injuriously affected. And as the reasonableness of the use is, to a considerable extent, a question of degree, and largely dependent on the circumstances of each case, it is to be judged of by the jury, and must be determined at the trial term as a mixed question of law and fact." In Fifield v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 130 Cal. 552, 62 Pac. 1054, it was held by the supreme court of California that a lower riparian proprietor, who is not injured by the diversion of water by a corporation conducting and carrying on the business of supplying the inhabitants of a city with water, cannot restrain such diversion. In Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co. 86 Ala. 587, 4 L. R. A. 572, 6 So. 73, a riparian proprietor filed a bill to enjoin the diversion of water from the stream by an upper riparian proprietor, a water company, for the use of its waterworks, constructed to supply the inhabitants of a city with water. The testimony in the case established that the diversion of water for the purpose mentioned would result in a sensible diminution in the flow of the stream itself in the dry season or summer months, but that the complainant was making no particular use of the stream, and therefore suffered no special damage by the act of the defendant; and it was held that as the defendant was taking the water for the purpose of supplying the wants of a neighboring town, and not returning it to its natural channel, the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction in vindication of his rights, without any special proof of damages; but, as he was not making any particular use of the water, the injunction should be so framed as only to restrain its use "to the sensible injury or damage of the complainant for any purpose for which he may now or in the future have use for it."

It is apparent, therefore, that the rule, so often stated and reiterated in the books, that a riparian proprietor is entitled to have the entire flow of the stream come down to his premises, is subject to the important limitation that an upper riparian proprietor may make such a use thereof as does not work any actual, material, and substantial damage to the common right which each proprietor has; and, whether a proposed use is of the character referred to, and therefore reasonable, does not depend so much upon the area of the land of the offending proprietor, or the place of the use, as upon the effect it has upon the correlative rights of the other proprietors. Under this doctrine the defendant was not a wrongdoer when he used the waters of the stream for the purpose of irrigation, nor does the fact that his land lies above the level thereof, so that it cannot be irrigated by means of ditches wholly on his own premises, affect his right to the use of the water. Charnock

v. Higuera, 111 Cal. 473, 32 L. R. A. 190, 44 Pac. 171, although it might have a material bearing upon the reasonableness of the use, if that question was here for decision. Gould, Waters, 3d ed. § 217. But there is no reason shown by this record why the defendant should be confined in the use of the water to any particular portion of his land. The amount of water taken and used by him before the trial was not sufficient to materially injure the plaintiffs, or to interfere in any substantial way with their rights as riparian proprietors. There seems to have been abundant water left in the stream after his diversion for the use of all the other riparian proprietors. There is some conflict in the authorities as to whether a riparian proprietor can enjoin the use of water for the irrigation of nonriparian lands without showing damage (Modoc Land & Live Stock Co. v. Booth, 102 Cal. 151, 36 Pac. 431; Gould v. Eaton, 117 Cal. 539, 38 L. R. A. 181, 49 Pac. 577; Fifield v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 130 Cal. 552, 62 Pac. 1054); but it is clear that a court of equity will not restrain the use of water by a riparian proprietor to irrigate his lands unless it is shown that such use will injure the other riparian proprietors (Gould, Waters, 3d ed. § 214). The plaintiffs, therefore, were not entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from using the waters of the stream for the purpose of irrigation, because such use was no injury to them. But, as the defendant has set up in his answer, and attempted to maintain by his testimony, the absolute right to sufficient water to irrigate his land, regardless of the effect it may have upon the other proprietors, the plaintiffs are entitled to such a decree as will prevent his use from ripening into an adverse title. Gould, Waters, 3d ed. § 214; Kinney, Irrigation, § 329; Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co. 86 Ala. 587, 4 L. R. A. 572, 6 So. 78; Neuchall v. Ireson, 8 Cush. 595, 54 Am. Dec. 790.

It is suggested that the court ought to ascertain and determine the rights of the respective parties, and fix them in the decree, so that hereafter there may be no controversy concerning the matter. In the very nature of things, however, it is impossible in a case of this character to make such a decree. The rights of the several riparian proprietors are equal, each being entitled to but a reasonable use of the water for irrigating purposes, and what constitutes such use must necessarily depend upon the season, the volume of water in the stream, the area and character of the land which each riparian proprietor proposes to irrigate, and many other circumstances; so that it seems to us there is no basis upon which the court could frame any other decree than one enjoining and restraining the defendant from diverting the water from the stream to the substantial injury of the present or future rights of the plaintiffs, and, as the decree of the court below is to that effect, it will be affirmed.

Petitions for rehearing having been filed,

Beam, Ch. J., handed down the following response:

Both parties have filed petitions for rehearing. The plaintiffs insist that the court erred in not holding that the right of a riparian proprietor to use the waters of a stream for irrigating purposes does not extend beyond the watershed, or to lands not first segregated and sold by the government. This question was examined with great care before the opinion was formulated. No authorities are cited or arguments advanced in the petition for rehearing not then fully examined and considered, and therefore the conclusion heretofore reached will be adhered to. The defendant contends that the court erred in affirming that part of the decree which restrained him from using the water to the actual and perceptible injury of the plaintiffs, and in not decreeing that he recover costs and disbursements in the court below. The argument is that since the court held that he is entitled to use the water to irrigate all of his land if he does not thereby interfere with the correlative rights of the other riparian proprietors, and as the evidence did not show that he had actually so interfered up to the time of the trial, the complaint should have been dismissed. This position overlooks the fact noted in the original opinion that the defendant sets up in his answer an absolute right to divert 2,675 inches of water from the stream, and had actually constructed a ditch for that purpose tapping the stream $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 miles above his premises, through which he was threatening to take the water at the time the suit was commenced. It was to prevent any future contention that this claim or the use of the water thereunder had ripened into an adverse right as against the plaintiffs that the decree was so framed. And such a decree is manifestly within the power of a court of equity. The fact that defendant had not used the entire amount of water up to the time of the trial, and that plaintiffs did not prove actual damage, constitutes no objection to the maintenance of the suit or the form of the decree. Cache La Poudre Reservoir Co. v. Water Supply & Storage Co. 27 Colo. 532, 62 Pac. 420. It was this avowed determination of the defendant, no doubt, that influenced the trial court to decree that he pay the costs, and its conclusion will not be disturbed, as there does not seem to have been any abuse of discretion. Dimmick v. Rosenfeld, 34 Or. 101, 55 Pac. 100.

The petitions for rehearing are therefore denied.

1. Charter power to declare what shall

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to right of municipality to declare what shall con-constitute nuisances will not authorize a municipal corporation to declare generally that to inter a dead body in any portion of the inhabited district of the city shall be a nuisance, when such interment may be made in the usual way in some of such sections without giving offense to the senses of any human inhabitant, or endangering in the least measure the health of the community.

2. Neither the general police power, nor charter authority to provide for the health and cleanliness of the city, will authorize a municipal ordinance prohibiting all interments within the city limits, unless such prohibition is reasonable.
3. The prohibition of the interment of dead bodies within the city limits is unreasonable where they include large tracts of land used exclusively for farming purposes, some of which contain several hundred acres on which interments could be made, which would be distant a half mile or more from any human habitation or thoroughfare.
4. An ordinance prohibiting the interment of dead bodies within the city limits, which is unreasonable as applied to sparsely inhabited sections, and general in its scope and operation, must fall in its entirety.

APPEAL by respondent from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County releasing petitioner under a writ of habeas corpus from the custody of respondent, to which he had been committed for alleged violation of a municipal ordinance. Affirmed.

Statement by Wolverton, J.:

The plaintiff was convicted in the municipal court of the city of Portland of a violation of city ordinance No. 9,188, and sentenced to pay a fine of $35, in default of the payment of which he was committed to jail under a commitment issued, directed, and delivered to the defendant, McLauchlan, who is the chief of police. The complaint upon which the conviction was had charged the plaintiff with a violation of the ordinance by wilfully and unlawfully interring and causing to be deposited a certain dead body within prohibited territory in the city of Portland, "thereby creating a nuisance," contrary to the ordinance, etc. The ordinance under which the complaint was drawn provides, by § 1, that it shall be unlawful, and it is declared a nuisance and misdemeanor, for any person or persons, at any time after the 1st day of April, 1895, to dig, or cause to be dug or opened, any grave, or to inter or deposit, or cause to be deposited, in such grave, any dead body, within the city of Portland, except within certain specified districts; and, by section 2, that no person or persons shall, after the day named, dig, or cause to be dug or opened, any grave, or cause to be deposited or interred in such grave any dead body, except in those portions of the city designated in § 1. Section 6 prescribes a penalty for a violation of the ordinance. The charter empowers the city to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, etc., and "to provide for the health, cleanliness, ornament, peace, and good order of the city," and, by a subsequent clause, to prevent and remove nuisances, and to declare what shall constitute the same." Section 32, subds. 6, 9. The plaintiff, being imprisoned, sued out a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he is unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the defendant, to which the latter made return that he is lawfully detaining the plaintiff under and by virtue of the commitment to him issued and directed. The judgment being favorable to the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Messrs. J. M. Long and Ralph R. Duniway, for appellant:

The city had the authority to pass the ordinance in question by virtue of the police power. This authority is specially given to the city by its charter, passed in 1898, in § 32, subdvs. 6, 9, 17.

The city has the power to declare burials within the city to be nuisances, and detrimental to the health and welfare of the city.

Messrs. Stott, Boise, & Stout for respondent.

Wolverton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff bases his argument in support of the judgment of the circuit court upon the ground that ordinance 9,188 is invalid, for the reason that the charter does not authorize the city of Portland to declare the burial of the dead within the city limits, outside of the excepted districts, to be a nuisance, or to punish persons for doing the acts thereby declared to be offenses against the city. It may be premised that a cemetery is not a nuisance, except conditions be present which corrupt or foul the atmosphere by unwholesome or noxious stenches, or impregnate the water of wells or springs in the vicinity by percolation through the soil, thereby endangering the public health; hence the authorities agree that it is not nor can it be regarded a nuisance per se. Wood, Nuisances, § 6; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 373; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 791; Kingsbury v. Flowers, 65 Ala. 479, 39 Am. Rep. 14; Henry v. Perry Twp. 48 Ohio St. 674, 30 N. E. 1122; Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71. And whether the act of depositing a dead body in its place of sepulture is the commission of a nuisance depends entirely upon its proximity to the habitations of the living and the manner in which it is accomplished. In so far as the language of the charter conferring power upon the city to declare what shall constitute a nuisance is involved by the contention, the case of Grossman v. Oakland, 30 Or. 478, 36 L. R. A. 593, 41 Pac. 5, is precisely in point. Within the scope of the doctrine there announced and settled, the city is not thereby authorized to declare that to be a nuisance which is neither such per se nor under the common law, nor made so by statutory enactment. It would seem to follow, therefore, that the city council was not authorized to declare generally that to deposit a dead body in any portion of the inhabited district shall constitute a nuisance, when it is conceded, as here, that such an interment may be made in the usual way in some sections thereof, without giving offense to the senses of any human inhabitant, or endangering in the least measure the health of the community.

Defendant's counsel insist, however, that the authority requisite for excluding burials from within the city limits may be referable to the general police power incident to all municipal corporations, and, beyond this, it is urged that the words of the charter, "to provide for the health, cleanliness, ornament, peace, and good order of the city," are commensurate for the purpose. The power thus conferred is no doubt ample to authorize the city to adopt reasonable measures prescribing rules and regulations, as it respects the place and manner of burials within the city limits; but the city cannot arbitrarily prohibit them, unless such prohibition be a reasonable exercise of the power. The legislature, in its wisdom, may, by express delegation of authority, empower the city to adopt measures of a specified and defined character, and the exercise of such authority cannot be questioned on the ground of its unreasonableness. People, Oak Hill Cemetery Asso. v. Pratt, 129 N. Y. 68, 29 N. E. 7; Cronin v. People, 82 N. Y. 318, 37 Am. Rep. 564; Oates v. New York, 7 Cow. 585,—are illustrative of the principle. In the first, the authority delegated was "to make, modify, and repeal ordinances and by-laws to regulate the burial of the dead;" and it was held that the power to regulate was tantamount to the power to prohibit, the court referring to Cronin v. People, which involved the authority to prohibit the operation of slaughterhouses in certain portions of the city of Albany as conclusive of the point. So, in the last case cited, the authority extended to making by-laws "for regulating or . . . preventing the interring of the dead" within the city, which language is so express and explicit as to leave no doubt touching the power to prohibit. But where the authority to adopt specific measures is referable merely to the general power, or where the authority to legislate with respect to a given subject is conferred and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, there goes with it the condition that the exercise thereof, to be valid and efficacious, must be reasonable, and not oppressive. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 328; State, Trenton Horse R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L. R. A. 410, 20 Atl. 1076; Haynes v. Cape May, 50 N. J. L. 55, 13 Atl. 231; A Coal-Float v. Jeffersonville, 112 Ind. 15, 13 N. E. 115; Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 33 Am. Rep. 239; Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405; Kirkham v. Russell, 76 Va. 956. It is for the court to determine, in view of the facts of each particular case as it arises, whether or not an ordinance is reasonable. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 248. The prevailing presumption, however, is in favor of its reasonableness, which must be overcome by legal and competent proof to the contrary before its invalidity can be declared. State, Trenton Horse R. Co. Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L. R. A. 410, 20 Atl. 1076; Com. v. Patch, 97 Mass. 221; Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85.

We are thus brought to the question whether the ordinance involved evinces a reasonable exercise of the general police power vested in the city, or of such as is attendant upon the power accorded to provide for the health, cleanliness, and good order thereof. The court may take judicial knowledge of the acts of incorporations and charters of municipal corporations, and as a logical consequence of the territorial limits of such municipalities, especially where they are fixed and defined by the acts giving them life, or acts amendatory thereof. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 936, 938; Fauntleroy v. Hannibal, 1 Dill. 118, Fed. 54 L. R. A.

Cas. No. 4,691; Binkert v. Jansen, 94 Ill. 283; Hornberger v. State, 47 Neb. 40, 66 N. W. 23; De Baker v. Southern California R. Co. 106 Cal. 257, 39 Pac. 610; Kansas City v. Smart, 128 Mo. 272, 30 S. W. 773.

Now, it is an admitted fact that there are considerable tracts of land, comprised within the limits of the city, which are sparsely inhabited. As was said by the court below, "there are within the corporate limits of the city of Portland several large tracts of land, which are used solely for farming purposes, some of them containing several hundred acres, and on some of them interments could be made which would be distant a half mile or more from any human inhabitant or public thoroughfare." Under these conditions, it is assuredly not a reasonable regulation, as a police provision, or for the conservation of the health or good order of the community, to exclude burials from the whole territory, save the districts enumerated by the ordinance. If, however, as before indicated, the legislature had granted special and express power to exclude burials from within the city limits, the adoption of such an ordinance would be a legitimate exercise thereof, and no one could question its validity, yet, when the nature of the power delegated enjoins upon the city the duty of adopting such measures only as are reasonable, that becomes the measure and limit of the power, and any act in excess thereof is without legal efficacy. The ordinance being unreasonable as applied to those sparsely-inhabited portions of the city, and general in its territorial scope and operation, it is invalid as to the whole, and must fall in its entirety. As sustaining the conclusions here reached, see Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 121; Kneidler v. Norristown, 100 Pa. 308, 45 Am. Rep. 384; Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71; Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 33 Am. Rep. 239. This statement of the law is not impinged upon by the doctrine maintained in State, Pennsylvania R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 47 N. J. L. 286; State v. Sheppard, 64 Minn. 287, 36 L. R. A. 305, 67 N. W. 62, and other cases cited by counsel. One of the primary essentials of a valid ordinance is that it must be general in its operation; that is, it must affect all persons alike, under like circumstances and conditions. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 322. It may, and often does, become a question whether certain persons or corporations, acting in peculiar capacities or special emergencies, come within the legitimate purview or spirit of the ordinance, and such was the question presented and determined by the above cases. The ordinance in each case was general in its scope, affecting all persons alike, but in the first the business of the railroad concentrated in a small compass, but had grown to such proportions that the ordinance became unreasonably embarrassing and burdensome, and it was held, therefore, that it should not be enforced against the company as to the particular locus in quo. So, in the latter case, the ordinance prohibited the driving of animals in the street at a rate of speed exceeding 6 miles an hour, and it was held that a fireman, acting in the discharge of his duties in hastening to the scene of a conflagration, did not come within the inhibition. The doctrine is operative in the establishment of an exception rather than that of a general rule, and can have no application in the case at bar.

Reliance is had upon the case of Portland v. Terwilliger, 16 Or. 465, 19 Pac. 90, as being an adjudication sustaining the power of the city to exclude burials from within the city limits. The court there had under consideration the effect of an ordinance prohibiting the burial of the dead within the city, and consequently upon an estate conceded, for the purpose of the case, to have been vested in the municipality upon a condition subsequent as to the continued use and occupation thereof by it for cemetery purposes. The power to adopt the ordinance in that case seems to have been taken for granted, or at least, it was not a matter of controversy in the course of the hearing. In announcing the opinion, Mr. Justice Strahan incidentally says: "That power was delegated by the state to the city of Portland under the general description of police power;" referring, we presume, to the power of prohibiting burials within the city limits. The learned justice then proceeded to an elaboration of the idea that every citizen holds his property subject to the proper exercise of the power, but the question whether the charter did or did not confer the power to adopt the ordinance was not mooted, so far as we are informed by the record, much less can it be said to have been decided. The idea of declaring the act of burial a nuisance, and the power commensurate to that particular purpose, does not seem to have been suggested at any time during the proceeding. The case is therefore not controlling as a precedent. If, however, it ever had any vitality in the direction claimed for it, it must be considered as overruled in its general scope by the subsequent case of Grossman v. Oakland.

There will be an affirmation of the judgment.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Charles L. FLACCUS

v.

1. Injunction will be granted at the instance of the manufacturer whose apprentices are under express contract not to join a labor union, to restrain representatives of such union, who are not employed by him, from enticing his apprentices to break their contracts and become members of the union to the injury of the business.
2. Statutory authority to workmen to form associations for mutual aid, and to refuse to work for any employer under certain conditions without being subject to prosecution for conspiracy, will not justify members of a labor union in enticing employees to break their contracts not to become members of such unions to the injury of their employer's business.

(April 15, 1901.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Allegheny County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin defendants from interfering with plaintiff's apprentices. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Johns McCleave, D. T. Watson, and W. J. Brennen, for appellants: Under the act approved May 8, 1869, § 1 (P. L. 1260), it is provided as follows: It shall be lawful for any and all classes of mechanics, journeymen, tradesmen, and laborers to form societies and associations for their mutual aid, benefit, and protection.

And the act approved June 14, 1872, § 1 (P. L. 1175), provides: It shall be lawful for any laborer or laborers, workingman or workmen, journeyman or journeymen, acting either as individuals or as the members of any club, society, or association, to refuse to work or labor for any person or persons whenever in his, her, or their opinion the wages paid are insufficient, or the treatment of such laborer or laborers, workingman or workmen, journeyman or journeymen, by his, her or their employer is brutal or offensive, or the continued labor by such laborer or laborers, workingman or workmen, journeyman or journeymen, would be contrary to the rules, regulations, or by-laws of any club, society, or organization to which he, she, or they may belong.

It is one of the indefeasible rights of a mechanic or laborer in this commonwealth to fix such a value on his services as he sees proper, and under the Constitution there is no power lodged anywhere to compel him to work for less than he chooses to accept.

No minor can, by the provision of the acts of assembly, be bound as an apprentice longer than until the age of twenty-one.

Bonnel v. Brotsman, 3 Watts & S. 178.

A minor bound as an apprentice may abandon the master's service when he attains full age, although the term has not expired.

NOTE.—For earlier cases in this series as to liability for inducing servant to break his contract, see cases in note to Boysen v. Thorn (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. on page 238; also cases in note to Chambers v. Baldwin (Ky.) 11 L. R. A. on page 548.

Plaintiff had provided for failure to comply with the conditions of indenture by the forfeiture of certain sums of money held by him, which were his liquidated damages.

Where the damages are incapable or very difficult of being ascertained except by mere conjecture, they will usually be considered liquidated if they are so denominated in the instrument.

2 Sedgw. Damages, p. 248.

Equity will not enjoin an act that is not in violation of any legal right, or that is not an actionable wrong at law. At law no action lies for inducing a servant to leave his employment or to break his contract with his master, whether he is an apprentice under indenture or otherwise, where the master has recovered from him a stipulated penalty for leaving the service, or where the time for which he was hired has expired, though he had no previous intention of leaving.

Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 487; Bird v. Randall, 3 Burr, 1352; Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, 16 Am. Rep. 780; Nichol v. Martyn, 2 Esp. 734; Boston Glass Manufactory v. Binney, 4 Pick. 425.

It has never yet been held that inducement to join a labor organization, without any suggestion of abandoning the service of the master, is an actionable wrong, though the servant has undertaken with the master to the contrary.

No case can be found where a court of equity has assumed jurisdiction to enjoin a third party from inviting or inducing one of the parties to a contract to violate its terms. This is extending government by injunction to a point that the courts have not yet reached.

Reynolds v. Everett, 67 Hun, 294, 22 N. Y. Supp. 306.

Messrs. J. S. Ferguson and E. G. Ferguson, for appellee:

Statutes relating to apprenticeship rest largely upon the idea that a minor is incapable of having a will of his own before reaching maturity, and, having no will in the matter, is to be cared for and protected in such a way as in the judgment of the state will best subserve the interests both of himself and the public.

Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U. S. 298, 41 L. ed. 732, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 326.

The whole course of legislation on the subject shows that to a large extent apprentices are regarded as wards of the commonwealth.

The acts of 1869 and 1872, and all kindred acts, have nothing to do with the question in this case.

If precedent precisely in point were necessary for every exercise of equity jurisdiction, equity jurisprudence would never have grown to its present high estate.

If the remedy at law falls short of that which the party is entitled to, that founds a jurisdiction in equity.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee is the proprietor of glass works at Tarentum, in the county of Allegheny. In his complaint he sets forth that he has been engaged in the business of manufacturing glass bottles of various kinds, and, in and about their manufacture, has been compelled to employ divers workmen and apprentices; that the appellants and others are members of an association known as the American Flint Glass Workers' Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor; that for a long time prior to the year 1894 he had been greatly hampered and annoyed in his business by the control sought to be exercised over his workmen and apprentices by the said American Flint Glass Workers' Union and the American Federation of Labor, with which it is affiliated; that in the year 1894 he established his factory on an independent basis, employing no workmen or apprentices who were connected with either of the associations named, and expressly requiring his said workmen and apprentices not to be connected with the said American Flint Glass Workers' Union, and from that time until the filing of his bill of complaint he had conducted his factory as an independent one, with mutual satisfaction to himself and the men and apprentices employed by him; that the appellants knew his factory was so being conducted as an independent one, and that his workmen and apprentices were not connected with the said American Flint Glass Workers' Union, and had agreed not to connect themselves with the same, and, particularly, that his apprentices were under agreement not to so connect themselves; that his workmen and apprentices were working in harmony until about September 15, 1899, when the said appellants, acting under orders of the said American Flint Glass Workers' Union, claiming the right of declaring strikes and otherwise interfering with the employment of labor, well knowing that his apprentices were under covenant and agreement not to be connected with the said American Flint Glass Workers' Union, began to entice, and did entice, a number of them to break their covenants or agreements and to become members of the said union, and to become subject to the orders thereof, paramount to his orders as their employer; and that the appellants, by so enticing and endeavoring to entice his apprentices to break their covenants with him by becoming members of the said union, have done that which is contrary to equity, for which he has no adequate remedy at law. On the answer to the appellee's bill of complaint, and upon testimony taken, the court below found that Skelley, one of the appellants, had gatherings of the apprentices of the appellee at his room in a hotel and persuaded them to join the union referred to; that he knew the character of the appellee's works as an independent factory, in which members of the union were not employed, and that his apprentices were bound in their indentures not to join or become subject to the rules or regulations of any such organization as he represented; that he knew these facts at the time he swore in these apprentices as members of the union; that the apprentices who joined the union violated the covenant of their indenture and subjected themselves to the orders of the union, which made obedience to it paramount to obedience to their employer; that the object of Skelley was to break down the appellee's factory as a nonunion factory, either by preventing the operation of his works or compelling him to join the union; that the apprentices who joined the union, enticed and persuaded so to do by Skelley, violated an express covenant of their indenture, which was one of great importance to the appellee, and Skelley so knew at the time he so enticed them; that Skelley's conduct and actions were very injurious to the appellee and his business, and, if repeated and persisted in, would in all probability utterly ruin his business; that Skelley's codefendants, by their counsel, openly and boldly justified him in all he did, contending that, as an officer or agent of the union, he had a perfect right to interfere with plaintiff's apprentices, persuade them to join the union, and secretly swear them in as members; that, if the union had that right, either Skelley or some other agent could go to Tarentum at any time and interfere with the appellee's apprentices and business until it would be destroyed. To this last finding there is no exception.

This is not a controversy between the employer and his employees, but between him and certain individuals associated as a labor union, unfriendly to the employment of independent labor, and seeking to induce the apprentices of the employer to violate the terms of their indentures with him. No question is here raised by the employer as to what his employees may or may not do, and the complaint sets forth no misconduct by them for which relief is asked. The appellants, outsiders, having no connection with the business of the appellee, are charged with enticing and endeavoring to entice the young men employed by him to violate the covenants of their apprenticeships with him, and protection is prayed for against the threatened ruin of his business, as found by the court below. Having reviewed all the evidence, we are not persuaded that any of the court's findings of fact ought to be disturbed, and, with them before us, the only question to be determined is whether the injunction should go out. In the several statutes called to our attention by the learned counsel for appellants, we can find nothing to aid us. The act of September 29, 1770 (1 Smith's Laws, 309), simply provides that a minor may enter into a valid contract of apprenticeship; by that of May 8, 1869 (P. L. 1869, p. 1260), the legislature properly declared that "it shall be lawful for any and all classes of mechanics, journeymen, tradesmen, and laborers to form societies and associations for their mutual aid, benefit, and protection, and peaceably meet, discuss and establish all necessary by-laws, rules, and regulations to carry out the same;" and the act of June 14, 1872 (P. L. 1872, p. 1175), is that "it shall be lawful for any laborer or laborers, workingman or workmen, journeyman or journeymen, acting either as individuals or as the members of any club, society, or association to refuse to work or labor for any person or persons, whenever, in his, her, or their opinion, the wages paid are insufficient, or the treatment of such laborer or laborers, workingman or workmen, journeyman or journeymen, by his, her, or their employer, is brutal, or offensive, or the continued labor by such laborer or laborers, workingman or workmen, journeyman or journeymen, would be contrary to the rules, regulations, or by-laws of any club, society, or organization to which he, she, or they might belong, without subjecting any person or persons so refusing to work or labor to prosecution or indictment for conspiracy under the criminal laws of this commonwealth." But nowhere does it appear in the foregoing enactments that these intermeddling appellants had warrant for their interference between employer and employed, as charged in the complaint against them; and with no apprentice, even if he is to be regarded as a "laborer" or "workingman," within the meaning of the last two acts, complaining that his employer has denied him any right under either of them, further demonstration of the inapplicability of any one of these statutes to the question before us is certainly not needed. The appellee had an unquestioned right, in the conduct of his business, to employ workmen who were independent of any labor union, and he had the further right to adopt a system of apprenticeship which excluded his apprentices from membership in such a union. He was responsible to no one for his reasons in adopting such a system, and no one had a right to interfere with it to his prejudice or injury. Such an interference with it was an interference with his business, and, if unlawful, cannot be permitted. The court found that the interference was injurious to him, and, if allowed to continue, would utterly ruin his business. The damages resulting from such an injury are incapable of ascertainment at law, and justice demands that specific relief be furnished in a court of equity. The test of equity jurisdiction is the absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law to the injured party, depending upon the character of the case as disclosed in the pleadings. If equity alone can furnish relief, the injunction must be issued. Watson v. Sutherland, 5 Wall. 79, 18 L. ed. 582. With this test applied to the pleadings and the facts found by the learned judge in the court below, the decree which he made was proper.

It is now affirmed, and the appeal from it is dismissed at the costs of the appellants.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Stella W. WINTER

v.

Lewis L. HARRIS.

(.....R. I.....)

The macadamized portion alone of a street 40 feet wide, of which about 25 are paved with cobble stones and the remainder macadamized, cannot be treated as the traveled part within the meaning of a statute requiring travelers by carriage to keep to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road, and therefore a traveler injured by collision while needlessly on the left of the center of the whole width of road cannot absolve himself from fault by showing that he was to the right of the center of the macadamized part.

APPPLICATION by plaintiff for a new trial after verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by a collision in a highway through the negligence of one in charge of defendant's horse and carriage. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. O. Pierce, for defendant:

The statute of this state provides:

Chap. 74, § 1. "Every person traveling with any carriage or other vehicle, who shall meet any other person so traveling on any highway or bridge, shall seasonably drive his carriage or vehicle to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road."

One who violates the law of the road by driving on the wrong side of the way assumes the risk of all such experiments, and must use greater care than if he keeps upon the right side of the road.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 830.

By "the traveled part" of the road is intended that part which is usually wrought for traveling.

Rogers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case for the alleged negligence of the defendant through his servant's so unskillfully and carelessly driving and managing his carriage on a public highway, in the outskirts of the city of Providence, as to cause it to collide with the plaintiff's buggy, whereby said buggy was damaged, and the plaintiff herself was thrown out and injured, while claiming to be in the exercise of due care. It appeared from the evidence that the accident occurred on Broad street, in Cranston, just over the city line, on March 9, 1898, between 6:30 and 7 o'clock P. M., when the plaintiff, accompanied by Mrs. Helen R. Herrick, was driving a horse and Goddard buggy down Broad street, away from the city, and the defendant's horse and carriage, also a Goddard buggy, was being driven towards the city by his coachman, Edward Ford, who was the sole occupant thereof; that Broad street at the place of the accident is a curbed street, 40 feet wide from curb to curb, running northerly towards Providence, and southerly towards Edgewood, in Cranston; that the westerly portion of the driveway for 24 feet 8 inches is paved with cobblestones, while the remainder of the width of the driveway, 15 feet 4 inches, is macadamized; that the paved surface of Broad street is traversed by double tracks for electric cars, the space between the separate rails of each track being 4 feet 10 inches, and the space between the separate tracks (i. e. between the west side of the east track and the east side of the west track) being 4 feet 2 inches; that all the space, being 9 feet 4 inches, between the west rail of the west track and the west curb of the street, is paved, while extending along the east side of the east rail of the east track is a paved strip 1 foot 6 inches wide; that the width of a Goddard buggy between the outside rims of the hubs is 5 feet 5 inches; that the defendant's coachman was driving on the right-hand (or east) side of the road, near the east curb, but as to how near the evidence is contradictory; that the plaintiff was driving upon the macadamized part of the road, and consequently was driving, as to her, on the left-hand side of the center, measuring from curb to curb; that it was dark, and the street lights were lighted; and that at the time of the accident no electric cars were approaching that were in sight. The evidence showed that the easterly or macadamized portion of the road was the favorite side for travelers, but that the whole width of the street was in order and condition for travel, and was used more or less, though not so much as the macadamized portion. Only the occupants of the two buggies witnessed the accident, and their statements are utterly variant. The plaintiff swore that she was driving on her right, being the westerly portion of the macadamized part of the street, though on the left of the center from curb to curb; that her horse was walking; that Ford was driving recklessly and unsteadily,—“this way and that,” to use her own expression, “but just which way he was driving when I first saw him I cannot say.” Mrs. Herrick supports the plaintiff in her claim that her horse was walking, and also that Ford was not keeping a straight course, and she testified: “As I remember it, Mrs. Winter pulled her right rein to the car track. I do not know how he pulled his, but his horse ran right into our shaft.” Ford, the defendant’s coachman, swore that he first noticed the plaintiff’s carriage 40 feet away, coming onto him. “They simply run in and locked wheels,” to use his own words. “I hollered to them first, and saw them coming directly towards the horse. I was away out then to the gutter.” In reply to the question how he came to drive into the gutter, he swore: “Because I saw they were coming into me, and I could not get over. If I could get on the sidewalk I would. I did not have time. I could not get on that high bank there. I drove in the gutter, and tried to avoid them.” He also swore that his horse was walking, while the defendant “was going as fast as she could, and did not let up any.” After a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff petitioned for a new trial, upon the sole ground that is now urged, of error in the charge of the justice presiding at the jury trial.

The plaintiff requested the court to charge as follows: “(1) The plaintiff was not bound to turn her horse and vehicle across the car track and tracks if that portion of the street where the car tracks were located was not ordinarily and habitually traveled, and if, at the same time, the macadamized portion of the road was ordinarily and habitually traveled, and if, on this occasion, the plaintiff seasonably turned her horse and vehicle to the right of the center of the macadamized portion of the street, leaving ample room for the coachman to pass with his vehicle and horse on her left-hand side. (2) The traveled part of the highway means that part which is regularly and ordinarily used by travelers with carriages, vehicles, and horses.”

and to the varying character of highways, and especially to highways in the country that were not traversable throughout their whole width, he charged as follows, to which the plaintiff objected, viz.: “The traveled part of Broad street for carriages is between the curbstones on the east and west; there is the traveled part of that road. It includes the macadamized part of it, and it includes the paved part of it, over into the center, and over to the curbstone of the other side. That is the traveled portion of said Broad street, and to the right of the traveled portion of that it was the duty of Mrs. Winter to turn her team seasonably. In regard to the traveled portion of the way, I have stated that that portion of the highway which was laid out between the curbstones was the traveled portion of that highway. No matter how frequently or how infrequently people traveled over the paved portion of it, that makes no difference. Where a cart goes it was the traveled way, and some point past the center was the traveled part, and so there was a portion that was traveled on the westerly side of the center of the road, if the testimony is not misunderstood by me.”

The sole question now before us is whether the charge, or the refusal to charge, as above set forth, in the circumstances of the case, affords sufficient ground to entitle the plaintiff to a new trial. R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 74, § 1, provides as follows: “Every person traveling with any carriage or other vehicle, who shall meet any other person so traveling on any highway or bridge, shall seasonably drive his carriage or vehicle to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road, so as to enable such person to pass with his carriage or vehicle without interference or interruption.” The plaintiff admits that she was driving on the left-hand side of the center, as measured from curb to curb, but claims that she was traveling on the right-hand side of the center of the macadamized portion of the road, and that the macadamized portion alone constituted the traveled part of the road, as used in the statute above set forth. In Olark v. Com. (decided in 1826) 4 Pick. 125, which was a criminal prosecution for a penalty under a statute requiring travelers in carriages who meet in a road to drive their carriages seasonably to the right of the middle of the traveled part of the road, the court said: “By the ‘traveled part’ of the road is intended that part which is usually wrought for traveling. A traveler is not obliged, because a track happens to have been made on one side of the part so wrought, to turn to the right of the center of this track. If he turns to the right of the center of the wrought part, so that there is room on the wrought part for the other traveler to pass, it is sufficient, and the penalty is not incurred.” In Com. v. Allen (decided in 1846) 11 Met. 403, 405, and which was a criminal prosecution for a penalty, the court, without anywhere referring to Olark v. Com. 4 Pick. 125, says: “So far as any question is raised, in the present case, as to the duty of persons traveling, when they are about to meet, to drive to the right of the middle of the traveled part of the road,—in distinction from the wrought part of the road,—where the traveled way is of less width than the wrought way, the statute seems very plain and direct in its provisions, and prescribes, as the duty of the traveler, the turning to the right of the middle of the traveled path." In Daniels v. Olegg (decided in 1873) 28 Mich. 32, which was an action for damages caused by a collision on the highway, the supreme court of Michigan, in construing the statute of that state, held that the "traveled part of the road," referred to in the statute, meant that part which is wrought for traveling, and is not confined simply to the most traveled wheel track; and the court, through Christiancy, Ch. J., delivering the opinion, in referring to the Massachusetts cases, after citing Clark v. Com. 4 Pick. 125, with approval, uses this language (p. 44), vis.: "And though the supreme court of that state seem to have since, in 1846 (Com. v. Allen, 11 Met. 403), adopted the contrary interpretation now contended for by the plaintiff in error, we are not satisfied with the correctness of the decision, and think such an interpretation of the statute, as applied to common roads in this state, would be extremely pernicious, and contrary to the legislative intent." The law of the road is thus laid down in Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 649: "It is a universal custom in America for travelers, vehicles, and animals under the charge of man to take the right hand of the road when meeting each other, if it is reasonably practicable to do so; and this rule is enforced by statutes in many states, so far as it relates to travelers in vehicles or on horseback. The statutes upon this subject generally prescribe that travelers shall pass to the right of the 'center of the road.' This means the center of the lawfully worked part of the road." And to the same effect see Elliot, Roads & Streets, § 830.

The case at bar well illustrates the reasonableness of the construction that the traveled part of the highway means the part worked and in order and condition for travel. Broad street, a main avenue leading from a large city to thickly-settled suburbs, with a driveway 40 feet in width from curb to curb, paved or macadamized, and usable throughout its whole width, is sought to be contracted to a passage 15 feet 4 inches wide on its extreme easterly or macadamized strip. As a Goddard buggy is 5 feet 5 inches wide, two such buggies, passing abreast, would take up 10 feet 10 inches, so that if the plaintiff's buggy was crowded as closely as possible to the paving on the west, and the defendant's buggy was scraping the curbstone on the east, there would remain between them but 4 feet 6 inches, or a yard and a half,—not a very liberal space to allow in the nighttime in passing a stranger the steadiness of whose horse, and the expertness of whose driving, are unknown; and yet there remained of said driveway over 24 feet on the plaintiff's right, taking her evidence as strictly correct, which was obstructed by no other team or car, and was available for her to use.

If it is objected that the car track was undesirable or unsafe to travel on, as compared with the macadamized portion of the street, the answer may be fitly given in the words of Sutherland, J., in Earing v. Lansing, 7 Wend. 185, 187, vis.: "It is not the center of the smooth or most traveled part of the road which is the driving-line, but the center of the worked part, although the whole of the smooth or most traveled path may be upon one side of that center, unless the situation of the road is such that it is impracticable or extremely difficult for the party to turn out. No such difficulty existed in this case. The road on the defendant's side was rough, from having been rutted and frozen, but not so much so as to present any serious obstacle to his riding or driving over it." In Goldrick v. Union R. Co. 20 R. I. 128, 37 Atl. 635, this court, through Matteson, Ch. J., delivering the opinion, said: "If it be conceded that the railroad company has a paramount right to use that portion of the street occupied by its track, since its cars are necessarily confined to its rails, and cannot turn to the right or left, the public, nevertheless, also have the right to use the street, including the portion occupied by the track; and it is incumbent on the railroad company, notwithstanding its paramount right, to exercise due care, in the operation of its cars, not to injure those who may be traveling on the street." We think that the weight of both reason and authority favors the construction that the traveled part of Broad street, at the time and place of the accident, was the whole width from curb to curb, and it is admitted that the plaintiff's buggy at the time in question was on the left of the center of said traveled part as thus construed. In Angell v. Lewis, 20 R. I. 391, 393, 39 Atl. 521, this court, through Tillinghast, J., delivering the opinion, says: "In thus taking the wrong side of the road, the defendant took the risk of the consequences which might arise from his inability to get out of the way of another team approaching on the right side of the road, and is responsible for injuries sustained by the latter while exercising ordinary care. In other words, one who violates the 'law of the road' by driving on the wrong side assumes the risk of such an experiment, and is required to use greater care than if he had kept on the right side of the road, and, if a collision takes place in such circumstances, the presumption is against the party who is on the wrong side. And this is especially true where the collision takes place in the dark. . . . In Brooks v. Hart, 14 N. H. 307, 311, the court says: 'It is legal negligence in anyone to occupy the half of the way appropriated by law to others having occasion to use it in traveling with teams and carriages, and he is chargeable for any injury flowing exclusively from that cause.'" The plaintiff showed no sufficient cause or excuse for being on the wrong side of the road at the time of the accident, and the injuries she complained of were attributable mainly, if not wholly, to her own failure to exercise due care; hence, under the circumstances of this case, we find no error in the charge of the justice to which exception was taken.

New trial denied, and case remitted to the common pleas division, with direction to enter judgment on the verdict.

v.

UNION RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....R. I.....)

A woman suing to recover damages for the negligent killing of her husband, for the benefit of herself and her minor children by him, cannot be compelled to testify on cross-examination to the fact that she has given birth to an illegitimate child since his death, for the purpose of affecting her credibility as a witness.

(June 3, 1901.)

PETITION by plaintiff for new trial after judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her intestate. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George R. Macleod and John W. Hogan, for plaintiff:

Treating the plaintiff purely as a witness in the case, and her misconduct as fornication, it was a misdemeanor which could be shown, for the purpose of affecting her credibility as a witness, only after conviction of the offense. No suggestion of such conviction was made or attempted.

Gen. Laws, chap. 244, § 40; State v. McGuire, 15 R. I. 23, 22 Atl. 1118; State v. Conway, 20 R. I. 270, 38 Atl. 656.

The character of a female witness for chastity can be impeached in only two instances, to wit: (1) In a criminal proceeding, where the witness is prosecutrix against a man for a sexual offense against her; and, (2) in a civil proceeding, to affect damages in a case where the amount of the damages depends upon the character or conduct of such female witness.

1 Thomp. Trials, § 525; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 372-375; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 214; McKelvey, Ev. §§ 112, 115; Rapalje, Witnesses, § 197.

Where the law permits the character of a witness for truth and veracity to be impeached, the impeaching evidence is strictly limited to the reputation of the witness for truth and veracity, and it has been uniformly held that evidence of particular acts upon that point is never permissible.

Evidence of bad character of a female witness is inadmissible.

Weathers v. Barksdale, 30 Ga. 888; Gilchrist v. M'Kee, 4 Watts, 380, 28 Am. Dec. 721; Com. v. Moore, 3 Pick. 194; People v. Yslas, 27 Cal. 630; State v. Smith, 7 Vt. 141; Spears v. Forrest, 15 Vt. 435.

The admission of irrelevant testimony which would be likely to prejudice the jury against one of the parties to a suit, and may have injuriously affected him in the trial of the cause, is a sufficient ground for granting a new trial.

Graham v. Coupe, 9 R. I. 478; King v. Colvin, 11 R. I. 582.

Messrs. David S. Baker, Lewis A. Waterman, and Arthur M. Allen, for defendant:

Witness on cross-examination may be interrogated as to his past life for the purpose of discrediting him and impeaching his credibility.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the grounds relied on by the plaintiff in her petition for a new trial in this case is that the justice presiding at the jury trial thereof erred in the admission of certain testimony. The action was brought by the plaintiff, who is the widow of Gottlieb Kolb, for the benefit of herself and her three minor children by said Gottlieb living at the time of his decease, and all of whom were living when this action was begun, which was nearly two years after his decease. The declaration alleges that the action was brought for the benefit of the plaintiff administratrix, as widow of the deceased, and also for the benefit of John Kolb, George Kolb, and Julia Kolb, all surviving minor children of said Gottlieb Kolb, deceased, living at the time of his decease, and now still surviving. At the trial of the case the plaintiff was called as a witness for the purpose, among other things, of proving her marriage, her qualification as administratrix, and who, as beneficiaries in this action under the statute, were entitled to the damages, if any, which should be recovered for the death of her husband. Upon her examination in chief, she was asked about the members of her family at the date of her husband's death, January 3, 1894, and also at the date of the commencement of this action, December 30, 1895, which was nearly two years after his decease. The questions asked, in so far as they are pertinent to the present inquiry, were these:
